from the prisoner who escaped; and if he cannot prove that any debt was due, he can recover nothing. Alexander v. McCauley, 4 Term Rep. 611; Ravenscroft v. Eyles, 2 Wils. 294; 4 Vin. Sup. 96, 82 pl. 2. And if an *attorney or agent were sued for failing to collect a debt, he would not be liable to any recovery, unless it were proved that the debt was due. It is a maxim of law, that there is no right without a remedy; and especially, when a statute gives a right and does not prescribe the remedy, the Courts are bound to devise the proper remedy, which, in general, is an action on the case founded on the statute. To give effect to this maxim, general rules of law, introduced for the sake of convenience, yield to cases of necessity, in which injustice would be done by adhering to the general rule. Thus, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, as a general rule the plaintiff can only recover damages for the first entry and eviction, and not for the detention of the possession, unless he has regained the possession by entry or action. But, if the estate of the plaintiff is expired, so that he cannot regain the possession, he may recover the profits accrued from the time of eviction till his title expired, without regaining the possession, notwithstanding the general rule. The rule that an executor could not be sued for a devastavit, until there was a judgment for the debt against him as executor, was a rule of convenience, and to avoid mischiefs which would arise, when the suit for a devastavit was against him, and which do not exist in the case of a suit against his executor or administrator. If, however, there was any inconvenience in allowing a suit for the devastavit of the executor against his representative, without a previous judgment for the debt against the executor, that must be submitted to, rather than that the right given by the statute should be unavailing. But, I can see no inconvenience in this remedy, although the fact that no debt was due, or that the executor had not wasted, or that the administrator of the executor has no assets of his testator, would each have been a complete defence for the representative of the executor, and before the statutes allowing double pleading, he could only put his defence on one of those points. This was an inconvenience common to all cases, in which a party

83 might *have several good pleas, but was confined to one; as, an executor, although a plea that no debt was due, or that he had no assets, would have been a bar to the action, could plead but one of those pleas. The statute allowing double pleading has remedied this inconvenience; and the representative of an administrator, sued for his intestate's devastavit, may plead that no debt was due, and that his intestate did not waste or convert the assets, and that he has no assets of his intestate. Although I have found no case of an action against the administrator of an executor for the devastavit of the executor, without a previous judgment against the executor, yet such suits have been common against executors of executors. The opinion which I have suggested on this point, is supported by that of Sergeant Williams, 1 Saund. 219, e; and by the doctrine of the Court in 4 Vin. Supp. 196, pl. 2, Rivett v. Jeffries, &c.

If I am wrong in this opinion, then the creditor, who would have no remedy at law under the statute, would be remitted to his remedy in equity, as before the statute, against the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator; and it would not follow, that the administrator de bonis non was entitled to any remedy.

It is, however, argued, that a creditor who has not obtained a judgment against the executor or administrator, establishing his demand, cannot, on general principles of law, maintain an action for that purpose, against any but the proper representative of the testator or intestate, because no other can have the means of ascertaining whether the demand be proper or not. But the cases are quite common, in which such suits may be maintained against one not representing the testator or intestate, as against an executor de son tort; and when a wrongful administration has been revoked, a creditor may sue the displaced administrator, and he can only defend himself by shewing that he has legally administered all the assets, except those delivered over to the succeeding administrator or executor; and if any remain in his hands, not so delivered over, or, *if he has committed a devastavit, by paying debts of inferior, before those of superior dignity, the creditor will recover. 6 Rep. 18, b, Packman's Case; 11 Vin. Abr. 119, pl. 5.

The cases of temporary administrators, who are responsible to the executor or administrator who succeeds them, have been relied upon; and it is said, that for the same reason that they are responsible to their successors, the representative of a deceased executor or administrator should be responsible to the administrator de bonis non. But the cases are wholly different. The commission of the latter gives him only the goods not administered; whilst in cases of an infant executor or administrator, or where one entitled to administration, or as executor, is absent, or is obstructed by a pending suit; whenever the impediment is removed, a general probate or administration is granted to him for the whole estate, and the administration is granted in the mean time to the administrator durante minoritate, or durante absentia, or pendente lite, for the use of the executor or administrator, to whom a general probate or administration may be afterwards committed. They are only the bailiffs of such general executor or administrator, and therefore responsible to them. So, if administration is granted to an improper person, or by an improper Court, and afterwards revoked, the administrator to whom administration is afterwards properly granted, has, in such cases, a general commission of administration, and is thereby entitled to call the displaced administrator to account. 11 Vin. Abr. 117, pl. 4. The latter is, indeed, as to the former, an executor de son tort.

I am satisfied upon the whole, that in England an administrator de bonis non never had any such right as is claimed for him in this suit; and our law is to the same effect unless changed by statute.

The Act of 1661-2, chap. 45, provides that if an administrator die before he hath given an account of the estate and obtained his quietus, the Court should have power 85 to *grant the administration of the estate not so accounted for, to some other person, who may, by virtue thereof, call the heirs, executors or administrators of the former administrator to an account, who shall pay out of the deceased administrator's estate all such debts as shall be found due to the estate he administered upon, in the first place. This statute also directed distribution to the wife and children, and only applied to the case of a deceased administrator not having accounted; and in that single case, authorised a commission to the succeeding administrator, for the estate not accounted for, and to call for an account; instead of an administration de bonis non, which gave no right to an account of the goods wasted and converted; and the only object of that provision in the law, was, to enlarge the rights of the succeeding administrator, in that single case only, beyond the rule of the common law, and to make the debt due from the administrator in that case only, of the first dignity. The reason why the same rights were not given to an administrator succeeding an executor, was, that it would have defeated the executor's right to the surplus of the assets administered by him. The effect of this statute was, to enable creditors to recover their debts, after the estate not accounted for came to the hands of the succeeding administrator, out of that fund which they could not reach before; but this only in the case of an administration after an administration, and not in the case of an administrator de bonis non, after an executor; and in effect, placed the rights of the distributees against the estate of the first administrator, in that single case, upon the footing of a debt of the highest dignity.

The Act of 1705, chap. 33, sec. 13, provided, that when any person shall be chargeable as executor or administrator, or otherwise, with the estate of any person deceased, or with any orphan's estate, and shall die so chargeable, the estate of such person so dying, shall be liable to pay and satisfy such other deceased person's or orphan's estate, before any other debt whatever. This Act, in connection 86 *with that of 1661-2, made, in effect, a legacy due from an executor, and the claim of the second administrator after another administrator, claims of the first dignity; but made no provision for creditors, in the case of an executor dying testate or intestate, nor in the case of an administrator, except incidentally as aforesaid.

The Act of 1711, chap. 2, sec. 3, provided that, "if it should so happen, that any executor shall die intestate, not having fully performed his executorship, or any administrator shall depart this life, not having fully administered the goods of the intestate, it shall and may be lawful for the Court that granted the certificate for obtaining such probate, or commission of administration, to hear and determine the right of administration, and to grant certificate for obtaining letters of administration of the goods not administered, to such person as by this Act shall have a right thereto." This was the precise form of the administration de bonis non at the common law; and this Act, which repeals all Acts concerning any matter or thing coming within the purview of that Act, repeals the Act of 1661-2, which directed an administration of the goods not accounted for by the first administrator.

In 1730, an Act passed, which has been re-enacted into our last Code, subjecting executors and administrators of executors and administrators, who had wasted or converted the assets, to the same liability, as the executor or administrator was subjected to. I have already observed how this liability directly to the creditors, conflicted what a supposed liability to the administrator de bonis non. Creditors, to whom a remedy was given by this Act, were entitled to claim against the assets of the executor or administrator, as for debts of the highest dignity, by virtue of the Act of 1705. But, the dignity of all the debts was equal in that respect, and a simple contract creditor, recovering first, would have the preference over a specialty creditor; whereas, if the fund went into the hands of an administrator de bonis non, and was not sufficient to pay all the debts, *it would be paid to the creditors, according to the original dignity of their debts. This would be a palpable inconsistency. The Act of 1785, which was re-enacted at the last revision, modified that of 1705, so far as to make the estate of the deceased executor or administrator liable, as for a debt of the first dignity, to legatees and distributees only. But, it is, in effect, the same; since the legatees would be responsible to creditors, to the amount recovered by them. The Act of 1661-2, if not repealed by that of 1711, is clearly repealed by the Act of 1819, repealing all Acts not re-published in the Revised Code.

The only other statutes, which can be supposed to affect this question, are those which provide for the indemnity of the sureties of an executor or administrator, and the safety of creditors, legatees and distributees. The Act of 1785, (now repealed,) only extended to the indemnity of the sureties, and was, I think, only intended to enable the Court, if the executor or administrator failed to give counter security, if required, to give the same relief to sureties, which creditors, legatees and distributees already had in equity, to compel the executor or administrator to pay the money in his hands into Court, or to a receiver, and to deliver the assets remaining unconverted, to a receiver. 12 Ves. 4. And this, under the statute, might be done in a summary way, by compelling the executor or administrator to settle, pay and deliver, by attachment.

The only remaining Act is that of 1814, re-enacted at the revision. If this Act really introduced a new description of administrators, (an administrator of the goods not administered, who was entitled to claim those which were converted,) it would only apply to the particular cases provided for by the Act; but I do not think that the statute has this effect. Taken altogether, I think the fair construction of it is, that the administrator de bonis non was intended by the Act, to have only the goods not converted, and not the proceeds of those converted. It provides, that at the instance of the sureties, the Court

88 may revoke *the authority of the executor or administrator, in whole or in part, and appoint an administrator de bonis non, as if the executor or administrator were dead; or to put the unadministered estate into the hands of the surety or other curator; or make any other order essential to the protection of the surety, having due regard to the interests of creditors, legatees or distributees. If, under this Act, an administrator de bonis non were appointed, he would have the same rights as, and no more than, an administrator de bonis non had at common law; for, he is described to be appointed as if the executor or administrator were dead; and the statute defines, in effect, the unadministered estate as something which might be taken from one, and put into the hands of another; a definition perfectly appropriate to assets remaining in kind, but not to an unliquidated debt due from the executor or administrator. If the administrator de bonis non, or surety, or curator, appointed under this Act, had a right to claim of the executor or administrator, an account of the converted assets, and to have them put into their hands by a summary proceeding of the court, then there would have been little or no use for the additional authority given to the Court, to make any other order upon the subject. That provision I consider as having the same effect, as the Act of 1785 upon the same subject; to enable the Court to secure the fund, by compelling the payment of it into Court, or into the hands of a receiver, by summary process. Upon this construction of the Act, a due regard would be had to the interests of creditors, legatees and distributees. They might still proceed against the executor or administrator, and reach the fund so secured, as if his authority had not been revoked; for, the provision that the suits depending might be continued against the executor, or the name of the administrator de bonis non, or curator, substituted for him, at the election of the creditor, was intended to enable the creditor, if he pleased, to pursue the administrator de bonis non or curator, without losing the benefit of his suit; 89 and *does not preclude the other creditors who had not sued, from proceeding against the displaced executor or administrator for the goods wasted or converted; as a creditor had a right at common law, to proceed against an administrator whose authority was revoked, and who could only defend himself effectually by pleading and proving that he had duly administered all the assets which came to his hands, except what he had delivered over to the succeeding administrator; whilst the construction that such administrator de bonis non, surety or curator, had a right to claim the assets converted, would impair the rights of creditors, legatees and distributees in various ways; some of which only will be alluded to. A double commission would be chargeable upon so much of the estate as was converted. The creditors, legatees and distributees, at least the two latter, would be delayed, until after a frequently tedious litigation, the administrator de bonis non, or surety, or curator, had recovered the fund, and until they could, by another tedious suit, recover it from him, and the surety, who was liable to account for the waste of the executor or administrator, would frequently be the person charged with the duty of calling his principal to account. He would be called upon to assert the interests of persons, whose interests were the very reverse of his. The manner in which this duty would frequently be performed, is easily conjectured; and if the executor or administrator died, the remedy given by statute to creditors against his representative, would either be frustrated, or materially varied, as to their effect, as has been before observed. I do not think that this statute has any influence upon the question under consideration.

It was said in the argument, that the proceeds of the testator's or intestate's perishable goods, directed by statute to be sold, ought not to be considered as assets converted; since the executor or administrator, in this respect, acts by direction of the law, and cannot be supposed to have intended by such sale, to convert the goods to his own use. *If that be so, it would not affect the question under consideration; for, if the administrator de bonis non were entitled to claim the proceeds, it would be upon the ground that the sale was not in such case a conversion, not being the merely voluntary act of the executor or administrator, and not intended by him as a conversion. I am inclined to think that such a sale, although a conversion at law, would not be considered as a conversion in equity, so long as the debts remained uncollected; so that if the executor or administrator died before the debts were collected, the bonds uncollected at the time of his death, and which, by the statute, might be assigned to the legatees or distributees, or the money recovered upon them by the administrator of the executor or administrator, might be claimed in equity by the administrator de bonis non; upon the ground above stated, on which the cases of a judgment by the executor for the testator's goods, not enforced by the executor in his life-time, and the stocks changed by the executor for the benefit of the estate, were held to be unadministered assets in equity. If, however, the executor had collected such debts in his life-time, and failed to keep the money separate as the money of the testator, so that it might be identified, and had applied it to his own use, this would, both at law and in equity, amount to a complete conversion.

It was also said in the argument, that the general impression in the Commonwealth had long been, that an administrator de bonis non was entitled to call the representative of a deceased executor or administrator to account; and that it was common, if not a matter of course, for such representatives to account for, and pay over, to the administrator de bonis non, all the assets converted by the executor or administrator; and that the Acts of the Legislature already referred to, shew that such has been the impression of the Legislature.

The review already taken of the statutes, shews, I think, that nothing is to be found in any Act since that of 1711, 91 *indicating any thing as to the Legislative understanding on this subject, and that Act, compared with the Act of 1661-2, shews that the Legislature then had distinctly in view, the difference between a commission of administration of the estate not accounted for, and one of the estate not administered; and that clause of the Act of 1711 was unnecessary for any purpose whatever, but to repeal the Act of 1661-2, and put all administrations de bonis non upon the same footing, as well those granted after the death of an executor, as after the death of an administrator. A general power to grant administrations would have embraced administrations de bonis non, to be granted in all cases, as at the common law; but, such a general grant would have left the Act of 1661-2, in force, and applicable to the case of an administration after an administration. The clause was therefore necessary in that Act, to repeal the Act of 1661-2, and for no other purpose; and accordingly, it has never been thought necessary, in the various revisals of the law, to re-enact that clause.

That the general impression of the country has been such as is stated, is, I think, very probable; and the origin of that impression is easily traced. Commissions of administration were originally granted by the Governor and Council forming the General Court, and signed by the Governor, upon the certificate of the County Courts, that the party was entitled, and had given proper security; and finally, they were made out by the Clerk of the County Court, and signed by a justice of the peace, upon a similar certificate of the County Court. The practice of actually making out the commission in form, has been, for a great length of time, discontinued; the certificate of the Court, upon which the commission might issue, being sufficient for all practical purposes. No defendant can claim the production of the commission, at law or in equity. Indeed, I have never seen a commission of administration given in Virginia. The form of a commission of administration de bonis non is almost

92 forgotten; and added to this, all attention to pleading *having for a long time been discontinued in practice, except in the use of short sentences, as "nil debet," "non assumpsit," "fully administered," &c. the idea was naturally adopted, that since upon the plea of "fully administered," an executor or administrator could not defend himself against the claim of a creditor, by shewing that he had converted the assets to his own use; therefore, such a conversion was not an administration; and consequently, the assets so converted, must go to the administrator de bonis non administratis. The reason why evidence of a conversion does not support the plea of fully administered, is not because such conversion is not an administration, but because it is, as to the creditor, not a legal administration. As to him, it is a wrong, but not as to any other. The question of devastavit is not put in issue upon that plea; but the replication puts in issue the amount of assets which came to the hands of the executor or administrator, and their application to the payment of debts of equal or superior dignity, in a legal course of administration, and nothing more. The jury can only find against the defendant the amount of assets in his hands, liable to the creditor's demand. 11 Vin. Abr. 312, pl. 7. They do not find that he has not fully administered, but that he has not legally administered, so as to bar the creditor.

It was said in the argument of the cause, that if the administrator de bonis non cannot claim an account of the assets converted by an executor or administrator, against his representatives, then in all cases where the representatives of deceased executors and administrators have accounted with administrators de bonis non for, and paid over to them, such assets, the estates of such executors or administrators will be still liable to creditors, legatees or distributees, as if no such payment had been made. It is not proper to decide this question, before it shall be presented in a shape to enable the Court, upon full consideration, to decide it conclusively. If such would be the consequence, it would afford no reason for 93 deciding otherwise *than according to our convictions of what the law is.

If any loss should fall upon a party, by acting under a mistake of the law, this Court has not the power of relieving him. I think it however, not amiss, to state now, that I am strongly under the impression, that the estate of an executor or administrator would not be liable to creditors, legatees or distributees, for the assets so paid over, unless they had, before payment, asserted their claim against his estate, by suit; upon the ground, that such payment was an admission by the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator, that the assets had not been converted; as in the case of the money kept separate by the executor or administrator, as the property of his testator or intestate, and the other cases in equity before referred to. But, if the executor or administrator had been guilty of a devastavit by paying debts of inferior, before those of superior dignity, or had otherwise committed waste, for which his representative had not so accounted; in the first case, the estate of the executor or administrator would still be liable, to the extent of such devastavit, to creditors, and for the other waste, to creditors, legatees and distributees. Packman's Case, 6 Rep. 18, b; 11 Vin. Abr. 119, pl. 5.

If the practice of the country has been contrary to these views, I do not find that it has ever been deliberately sanctioned by this Court; nor do I consider it as a question of practice liable to be varied and moulded, according to the discretion of the Court; but, as a question of legal right, depending upon the commission of administration, which alone gives any right to the administrator de bonis non, and which gives him a right only to "the goods, chattels, rights and credits, which were of the testator or intestate, at the time of his death not administered by the former executor or administrator;" which, in terms, does not embrace the value or proceeds of goods converted by the executor or administrator; such proceeds not being any part of the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of the testator or intestate at the time of his death.

94 This *construction and effect of the terms of the commission, is perfectly settled by the common law, and by all the legislation which has any bearing upon the question, here or in England, and which is in conflict with any other construction. The statute giving a remedy to creditors against the executor or administrator of an executor or administrator, for assets of the first testator or intestate, wasted or converted to his own use, by the first executor or administrator, gives to all creditors an equal right to claim under the statute, whether that be in respect to the assets of the executor or administrator, as for a simple contract debt only, or as for a claim of the first dignity; so that the creditor getting the first judgment, would have the prior right to satisfaction, without regard to the original dignity of the debt, and that, whether his claim was asserted in a Court of Law or Equity; which equality of right amongst the creditors, given by the statute, would be utterly frustrated, by allowing the administrator de bonis non to recover the funds; since the debts would, in that case, be payable by him, out of the funds, according to their original legal priorities.

If the administrator de bonis non has not this right, the creditors have an immediate remedy against the executor or administrator of the first executor or administrator; in which it is only necessary to prove a waste or conversion to an amount sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's demand, and not to settle accurately the accounts of the administration of the executor or administrator; and without the intervention of the administrator de bonis non, all creditors, to the extent of the fund in question, would be secured by bonds given by the legatees to the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator, to indemnify him against debts of the first testator, which may appear and be recovered against him. He alone being responsible to the creditors for the fund for which his testator or intestate was responsible, he is the proper, and only proper person, to whom those bonds should be given; whereas, if the administrator de

95 bonis non has a right to recover this fund, *it will be burthened with two commissions instead of one; which would be paid in the other case, or even more than two, if there were several successive administrators de bonis non. The creditors would be delayed, until after a tedious litigation, the accounts of the first executor or administrator were finally settled in the suit of the administrator de bonis non, and he had been enabled to coerce the payment of the money, and their rights would be varied as aforesaid. They might further be delayed by the necessity of a suit against the administrator de bonis non; and so the legatees and distributees would also be delayed, not only by the first suit by the administrator de bonis non, but by their suit against him for a settlement of his accounts; and the hazard of loss to creditors, legatees and distributees, would be doubled, trebled or quadrupled, according as there were one or more successive administrators de bonis non, from the possible, and indeed common, insolvency of executors and administrators and their sureties. The hazard of the insolvency of the first administrator is unavoidable; but the funds would be lost by the insolvency of any of the administrators de bonis non, if they received them, even although the estate of the first executor or administrator were good. Many mischiefs, in respect to delay, expense and hazard, would arise from giving to the administrator de bonis non, the right to call the representative of the deceased executor or administrator to account, without one solitary advantage to any party concerned, which they would not have upon the contrary doctrine; and if this was a question, not of legal right, (as to which we are bound to administer the law,) as it is, but a mere question of practice, and we had authority to control it at pleasure, I should not hesitate to say, that every consideration of convenience and justice should induce us to adopt the principles, which I have supposed to be the settled principles of law on this subject.

bonis non has a right to call 96 *the representative of a deceased administrator to account. Wernick died intestate, and Marks administered on his estate in 1782, and gave an administration bond, with Coleman as his surety. The latter being anxious to get an indemnity, Marks deposited in the hands of Douglas $1500, (which was not equal to the amount of the assets,) to be held by him for the indemnity of Coleman. Marks dying, Coleman took administration de bonis non on Wernick's estate, and sued the representative of Marks, and the executor of Douglas, in order to recover the $1500, in his character of administrator de bonis non. Douglas's executor answers, that the advances made by his testator to Marks, after the deposit of the $1500, exceeded that sum. There is no intimation in the proceedings, that there is any creditor or distributee of Wernick, who claims any thing against Wernick's representative; and if the administrator de bonis non has the right contended for, such an allegation is not necessary to entitle him to recover. Coleman died pending this suit; and the plaintiff took administration de bonis non of Wernick's estate. Upwards of forty years having elapsed since the death of Wernick, and no creditor or distributee now claiming, there is the strongest reason to believe that none will ever claim. This at least is possible; and if so, and the present plaintiff could recover the $1500; then, after his death, the next administrator de bonis non could claim it with interest, from his representative; and so it would devolve from administrator de bonis non, to administrator de bonis non, forever, to the exclusion of all other creditors of the deceased administrators de bonis non; the claim of each administrator de bonis non, upon the estate of the preceding administrator de bonis non, being preferred in dignity to any other debt; a more perfect perpetuity than was ever before devised.

The scire facias to revive the appeal should be quashed, as improvidently awarded.

97 *JUDGE COALTER.

This case brings, for the first time, before this Court, the propriety of a practice, which, it seems to be admitted, has heretofore prevailed without objection, of an administrator de bonis non calling to account the executor or administrator of the first administrator, in relation to the goods wasted or converted by that administrator. The practice, which also seems to have existed, of the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, calling the administrator or executor of the executor to account for such goods, has also been incidentally debated, as one standing on the same grounds.

The British doctrines and authorities have been brought fully to the view of the Court, and will be first examined, in regard to the practice there; and if such a course would not be permitted there, I will then enquire whether there is anything in our laws, which would make it inexpedient, if not unlawful, to change the practice here.

It is said, that in that country executors were entitled to the surplus, where there was no residuary clause in favor of some one else, or something else in the will, shewing that the executor was not entitled to it; and that, except as to creditors, every thing which had been converted by the first executor, belonged to his estate when he was entitled to the surplus; and though he would stand as trustee for creditors, and his estate be responsible to them, they only had a right to charge the fund in the hands of his representatives; *for, if the administrator de bonis non got it, whether necessary for creditors or not, that which might belong to the estate of the executor would thus be taken from it; and that therefore, the commission of the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, only authorised him to take possession of the goods of the testator remaining in kind, or unconverted: that as to the administrator, inasmuch as before the Statute of Distributions, he was entitled always to the surplus, the like injustice

98 *would follow, if his executor or administrator should be liable to account, except as to creditors, for the assets converted, and that consequently, the commission to the administrator de bonis non only gave him a right to the assets remaining in kind, or unconverted.

Whether the Statute of Distributions itself ought to make any change in relation to the powers of the administrator de bonis non, under his commission, and especially in the case of intestacy, may be worthy of enquiry. One thing, however, I suppose must be admitted: that if any positive statute, or one or more, which could not be fully carried into effect, without enlarging his rights under his commission, so as to extend them to such a subject, had been enacted, either directly extending the power thereto, or, by necessary implication, doing so, the commission, though issued in the usual form, would extend to, and enable them to claim, the fund, as fully as if, from the beginning, such fund had been considered unadministered assets. If it is declared by statute, to be unadministered assets, the administrator's right to it, under the commission, would necessarily be extended to it.

Before the Statute of Distributions, I believe it was admitted, that where there was no residuary clause in favor of some one else, the executor of course took the surplus; but, after that statute, as the law provided a successor to an undisposed of surplus, if it appeared not to be the intention of the testator to give it to the executor, but to leave it undisposed of, the executor was held a trustee of that surplus, for the next of kin, according to the statute; and so, in like manner, was the administrator, in all cases. Whenever the executor or administrator then converted the goods or any part of them, and died leaving a surplus in their hands, not administered, in payment of debts, and the executor was not entitled to the surplus, they were considered as trustees of that fund, as well for creditors as next of kin, and their estates answerable therefor. This fund, before the statutes which gave a suit to creditors

99 *against the representatives of executors or administrators, was a mere trust to be enforced in equity in favor of creditors and next of kin, &c.; and it would seem to me, ought regularly to pass into the hands of the administrator de bonis non, for their benefit; and that his commission ought to be held to extend to it, as it sometimes does to subjects, which are not considered in equity as having been converted. It seems, however, to have been the practice in England, either for the creditor or next of kin to go into equity, and there reach the fund, and have it applied as by law it ought. Whether this can be done in all cases, without calling into Court the administrator de bonis non, I am not well advised. I incline to think it has been done in many cases without doing so. As to creditor suing, without making him a party, it may be that they could do so, in cases where they had established the debt against his predecessor; but where that was not the case; and unless it appeared that there was no dispute or difficulty as to that matter, I presume he must make the administrator de bonis non a party; for neither he, nor the distributees, would be bound by a decree charging the estate with a debt, in a suit to which they were no parties. There may be some peculiar cases, such as actions for escapes, on mesne process, before a debt has been established, in which the debt must be proved, in order to shew the injury that has been done; but if there are such, it proceeds from the necessity of the case, and because the party who has done the wrong, is not, in this way, to shield himself from the consequences of his own acts; but it will be, to me at least, a new doctrine, if a decree or judgment can be recovered, so as to charge an estate with a debt, without a representative of the estate being before the Court. If such decree would not charge the estate, so as to end the matter, it would be for want of the necessary parties; and if it did not end the matter, such decree would be wrong.

When the next of kin come, I presume they must all come, and they of course being entitled to the administration, 100 *would be entitled to the fund, subordinate always to creditors, who can pursue the fund in their hands, and to secure whom a Court of Equity in England will require bond to refund, whenever it is deemed necessary. But, if some of them only have been appointed administrators de bonis non, or it has been granted to a stranger, then if the suit is by the next of kin, the administrators themselves would be parties plaintiff, with others. But whether, in the case of the stranger, they can proceed without making the administrator de bonis non a party, may be a question; for he represents creditors, may have paid debts himself, and this fund may be necessary to reimburse him, &c.; and there being such a representation of the estate, of which this fund is a part, it may be and probably is necessary, that he should be a party.

Be this as it may, there are certainly many cases in England, in which the next of kin have recovered against the executor himself such fund, when he was not entitled to the surplus, but claimed to hold it.

In the case of Corden v. Noden, Prec. in Ch. 12; Ibid. 92, the testator gave legacies to his relations, amounting to nearly the whole of his estate, and also gave legacies to his executors, and lived several years, during which he increased his estate considerably. In a suit by the next of kin against them, they were decreed to distribute it.

So in Farrington v. Knightly, Ibid. 566, there was a similar decree, and it was there said, that since the Statute of Distributions, the succession to a personal estate is as much established, as to real before the statute; and that the executors should claim to have the surplus to their own use, because they are made executors, would be to construe the will by a rule which probably the testator did not understand; for, he might be ignorant of the import of the word executors, or never intended, by making them such, to give them his personal estate; and that here it would be more unreasonable, because they had legacies given them. So that executors, says the 101 Judge, are but trustees, and *are to have nothing more to their own use, than what the testator plainly intended them as legatees or devisees, and not the whole residuum by virtue of the executorship. The Lord Chancellor then puts this case: If A. and B. severally make their wills, and make C. executor; and A. gives him the surplus, but B. does not, and then C. dies intestate; in this case, the personal estate of A. and B. shall go several ways. For, the administrator of C. is admitted to the administration of the personal estate of A. but the next of kin are to have administration to him; which proves that C. as to that, was but a trustee. Now, although the next of kin of B. might come into equity, according to the British practice, without taking out administration de bonis non to B. and get this surplus, or the administrator of C. might retain the surplus of A's estate, without taking administration de bonis non to A. (that being considered there the shortest way, as creditors could still pursue the fund,) yet they might take the administration de bonis non, and it is their right to do so; which gives them the right to claim immediately, and without this form.

This doctrine is exemplified also by the case of Rachfield v. Careless, 2 P. Wms. 158, where a legacy of 5l. was given to the executor for his care in fulfilling the will. He notwithstanding claimed to hold the surplus, and the next of kin sue for it. It was there declared, that the bequest of 5l. amounted to a declaration of the trust, especially considering that it is a fundamental rule in a Court of Equity, that an executor is but a trustee; and, on his dying intestate, so much of the testator's personal estate as remains unadministered, must go to the testator's next of kin, to wit, to the administrator de bonis non, and not to the administrator of the executor. I will here remark, that in both these cases, the Judges, when speaking of the right to the thing, speak of it as belonging to the administrator de bonis non, as distinguished from the administrator of the executor.

102 As to the jurisdiction of *equity to give it immediately to one who may ultimately be entitled to receive it from the one having the right to receive it in the first instance, it is another question.

I take it that the Judge in this last case, could not have intended to say, that the unconverted assets went to the administrator de bonis non. No one could doubt that; for, no one else could get them. The next of kin, unless they administered, could not. They remained without an owner, until administration; when the legal, not the equitable right to them, would vest in the administrator de bonis non. This was not a suit to recover such unadministered assets, or no such decree could have been given; and it cannot be supposed, I presume, that if the next of kin had taken administration, they could not have recovered this subject, not administered in payment of debts, in that character; but must sue merely as next of kin. It is because they would be entitled to it in that character, and because it is an equitable subject in the hands of a trustee, that they may come at once into equity, where substance alone is regarded, and call the trustee to account, without the form of taking administration.

So, too, before the statute of Charles, creditors were also relieved in equity, and indeed in one case in the Exchequer, they were sustained at law before that statute, on the principles of the civil law. 3 Keb. 517. But that case seems not to have been approved of, or followed up.

Thus, in Chamberlayne v. Chamberlayne, 1 Ch. Cas. 257, a few years before the statute of Charles, it was ruled, that if an executor make devastavit and die, his executor is liable to make it good to the creditors, if he has assets from the executor.

So, in Vanacre's Case, Ib. 303, the same was ruled, and the creditors directed to come to account, and have satisfaction proportionably; and it is there said, that an executor, in case of devastavit, is to be considered in the nature of a trustee of an estate.

103 *So, in Price v. Herbert, 2 Ch. Cas. 217, the Lord Chancellor said, "Although, by the common law, when the executor wastes, his executor shall not be liable, because it is a personal wrong, it is otherwise here; and the common law will come to it at last;" and it was decreed that the executor should answer for the waste, as far as he has assets.

These cases would seem to be founded on the waste by the executor, which happens when judgment has been recovered against him, and nulla bona returned. I have seen no case, nor have I searched sufficiently to say that there are none, where a debt has, in the first instance, been set up in a suit charging such waste in a bill in equity; but, I am content for the present to say, that it may, if proper parties are before the Court.

But, as was predicted by the Judge, the common law did, in a short time thereafter, come to it to a certain extent, by the statute of 30th Char. 2, explained and extended by that of William & Mary. Those statutes in substance provided, as ours has since done, that all and every the executors and administrators of any person or persons, who, as executor in his own wrong, and the executor or administrator of an executor or administrator of right, who shall waste or convert to his own use, goods, chattels or estate, of his testator or intestate, shall be liable and chargeable in the same manner, as his testator or intestate might have been.

It is contended, that this statute gives a right to the creditor to sue the executor or administrator of an executor, or the executor or administrator of an administrator, when the executor or administrator has wasted, not only in the case where the creditor has recovered a judgment against the executor or administrator, and had a return of nulla bona, so as to fix the devastavit on him; but to sue on a bond or other chose in action; and not only to set up that debt at law against the estate, but to suggest and prove a devastavit in the executor or administrator. I doubt 104 this; *and if this is not the case, but if he can only sue under this statute for a devastavit, when he could bring such suit against the executor, then a large class of creditors could not sue under this statute.

It becomes necessary, therefore, in the first place, to enquire, under what circumstances the executor himself was liable to an action for a devastavit, and see the reason why he was so liable; and then see how far those reasons and others will bear me out in supposing, that his executor or administrator ought not to be liable in any other manner, or in any other case.

The case of Wheatley v. Lane, 1 Saund. 216, is, perhaps, the first case but one, which clearly decided this question. There the creditor had obtained a judgment against the executor, who, he alleges, had wasted the assets, &c.; and the action is in the debt, suggesting this waste, &c. It was tried on a demurrer to the declaration, and many objections were made; amongst others, that it was an action of debt for a tort, which dies with the person; and if debt will lie, it may be brought against his executor; and that for the same reason that this action is brought on a judgment against him, it might be brought on a judgment against the testator, or on a bond entered into by him, &c.; that in case the action would survive, it would be doubtful whether it would be debt on a judgment or simple contract, &c. But, the action was sustained.

It will be found, however, that though attempts were made to carry it further, this action of debt for a devastavit against the executor himself, has never been sustained, except where a judgment has been first obtained against him, in which assets have been admitted, or found to be in his hands, and where, on a return of nulla bona, it appeared that he had wasted them. It was held, too, that it did not survive against his executor or administrator; and therefore, the statutes giving the suit against them, were enacted. It was also held that this action for a waste by the executor, did not lie against him on a 105 judgment against, or *on a bond executed by, his testator, notwithstanding the privity between them, because of the difficulty of pleading and making a proper defence, &c.; and because it was with difficulty the action was introduced, and the Courts would not carry it further.

All the reasons why it should not be sustained, in such case, against the executor himself, apply, if possible, with ten-fold force, to shew that it ought not to lie against his executor or administrator; and hence it no doubt has followed, that we see no case in which this action has been sustained, since the statute, against the executor or administrator of an executor or administrator, except on a judgment against the executor or administrator, establishing the debt, and fixing a devastavit on him. It is founded on the tort, and though there is also a judgment, it nevertheless ranks only as a simple contract claim; and notwithstanding Sergeant Williams, in his note on the above case in Saunders, seems to intimate that it may be sustained against the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator, without a previous judgment establishing a devastavit, yet he cites no case to support his position; and I therefore take it for granted, that none such had then occurred. I feel confident that he had not examined the matter with reference to the pleadings, or he never could have come to that conclusion.

How an administrator of an executor can be privy to the first testator, so as to defend himself against a suit brought on a bond executed by the testator, I cannot perceive. The only case which looks at all that way, is that of Trivett v. Jeffries, given to us in 4 Vin. Supp. 192, pl. 2; and which was a suit against the executors of an administrator, on the bond of the intestate, and was prosecuted on this ground, as I understand the case. The administrator, at his death, had goods of the intestate, not converted or wasted, enough to pay the debt. These came to his executors, and were in their hands at the institution 106 *of the suit. There was no waste by the executor, charged. There was no administrator de bonis non; and the question was, whether these goods could be charged in the hands of the executor of the administrator, as they might have been in his hands. It was held that the action could not be sustained, though there was a verdict finding that there were assets, as alleged; for, there was no privity between the executor and intestate.

It was said that it could not be maintained at common law for that reason; that it could not be under the statutes of Ch. 2, and Wm. & Mary, for there was no devastavit in the executor charged; and hence it has been supposed that this was impliedly saying, that such devastavit might have been charged in that case, so as to bring it within the statute. But I do not think so. What was meant was this; that a devastavit must be charged to bring the case within the statute; but here it was not only not charged, but it was not a case in which such charge could be made; for, it is on a bond of the intestate, not on a judgment against the administrator.

It surely could not have escaped the Court in that case, that a charge of a devastavit would not have created any privity between the executors and the intestate, so as to have enabled them to defend that suit; to plead that it was not the act and deed of the intestate, obtained from him by duress, or that he had paid it in his life-time, &c. How could such debt, in the first instance, be set up against them, so as to charge the estate of the intestate in their hands? Did the statute mean to alter the common law, which requires that the suit which is to establish the debt, shall be brought against him who is privy to, and represents as well the person, as the estate, of the intestate? It never has been so held, and never can be. It has only been held to continue the action which once accrued against the executor or administrator for a devastavit, and which, if not given against his executor or administrator, would die with him.

107 *In addition to the above cases on this subject, I refer to the cases of Berwick v. Andrews, reported in 1 Salk. 314, and 2 Ld. Raym. 971; to an anonymous case in 1 Vent. 292; to Ent v. Withers, Ibid. 321, which will be found also more fully stated in 3 Keb. 797, and 825; to Bathurst's Case, 2 Vent. 40; and to Brown v. Collins, 3 Keb. 462.

But, the administrator of an executor is sued on a bond of the testator, charging a devastavit in the executor, and he pleads that the executor fully administered, and it turns out that he did pay away, in discharge of debts, the whole of the assets which he had converted, but they are debts of inferior dignity to the bond. Still, I maintain that this is not necessarily and per se a devastavit; for, he may have left assets enough in kind to pay the debt, and which have gone over to the administrator de bonis non, and which would have been rendered in execution, had judgment been recovered against the executor. Surely this would be a good defence; otherwise, however large the estate, no executor ought to pay debts of inferior dignity, without first converting the whole of the assets; for, if he does, and dies, and the unconverted assets go to the administrator de bonis non, who wastes them, the estate of the executor will be answerable. Any course of decision, leading to such injustice, can never have my support. He has a right to make the defence, or he has not; and if he has, how is it to be tried in this suit at law on the bond? Assets enough, or some assets, may have gone to the administrator de bonis non. He may have wasted or paid debts of inferior dignity; and if he has, who is to sustain the loss? And how is this to be established in a suit to which he is no party?

Again, in England, this claim, as before said, is but in nature of a simple contract; and there, if the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator, pays out debts of any dignity, he stands safe; but here, the claim, if sued for by the administrator de bonis non, if he can sue for it, or by the legatees or 108 next of kin, is a debt of *the first dignity. But if, in a suit at law by the creditor, it would only rank as in England, there will be difficulties and dangers here on all sides, which would not beset the road to justice in England. I incline to think that would be its rank at law. It is founded on the tort, according to the very terms of the statute giving the suit; and which leaves it at law, as in England. How a Court of Equity would consider it, on principles of substitution, and permitting the creditor to stand, as it were, in the shoes of the next of kin, &c. is another matter.

Restrain the cases, then, to those in which a debt has been established in a suit against the executor or administrator, and the devastavit fixed, and all those difficulties vanish. This fixes a debt against the executor, and there is no plea of fully administered, except as to his estate.

Thus far, then, I am willing to admit that in England, the practice has been for the creditor to sue under these statutes, where a devastavit had previously been fixed by judgment as aforesaid; and when that was not done, they went into equity, either against the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator, or the legatees or distributees, &c. as the case might be; inasmuch as the Courts of Equity were open to them, as well before as since the statutes. But, our practice has been different. Here the administrator has gone for the fund, as has been first stated.

This practice will be found to have originated, in the first instance, in positive statute, passed upwards of a century and a half ago; and even if that statute has been repealed, or its policy changed by a subsequent statute, (which I will hereafter deny,) still it will be found that our laws on the subject of executors and administrators, and of the estates of testators and intestates, have, from time to time, during that whole period, undergone so many changes and alterations from those of England, all concurring to shew the propriety of our practice, and enacted under a full knowledge 109 of its existence, and many of which laws, it seems to me, cannot *well stand or be executed under the proposed change of practice; that I think that practice, if not now sanctioned by positive law, has an equally legal and sure foundation. Hence it has followed, that there being no necessity for creditors to resort to their remedy at law under the statute, even where they had judgments, or to equity where they had not, inasmuch as the administrator de bonis non got in the fund, we hear of no suits either of the one kind or the other by creditors.

As to legatees or distributees coming into Court directly, and where there is no administrator de bonis non, or where there is, without bringing him in as a party, in order to reach such fund and distribute it, the principles of our decisions, as I understand them, are opposed to such pretension. Here, it is considered, as I understand, that every fund that is subject to debts, must go into the hands of one who can be sued at law for the debt, who gives bond and security, can be ruled to counter-security or displaced, and the fund taken from him; and it is not enough that the party may be entitled, after debts are paid. Hays v. Hays, 5 Munf. 418. We have, it is true, made some exceptions to this; as where a suit has been long pending, no debts appearing, &c. on the party giving bond and security. But, bond from such a party is not like that of an administrator. He can be displaced in a summary way, &c. but the legatee cannot. The structure of our laws, then, arising from the situation of our country, is different in this respect, as in many others, from those in England; and hence the propriety, and indeed the necessity, of a different practice.

But, suppose that in England, (as I incline to think it is here, at least since the Act of 1785,) there was no such thing as an executor having the surplus, except by express residuary bequest; and let us go further, and suppose that no such thing had ever existed there, either as to executors or administrators; can it be supposed, that it ever would have been doubted that the administrator de bonis non was entitled 110 to get into his hands every thing to which creditors *and next of kin were entitled? The reason for the contrary opinion and practice never would have existed, and we cannot presume the practice would. But, our early laws expressly gave the right to the administrator de bonis non, to call in this fund.

The Act of 1661, 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 92, provides, that where an administrator dies before he has given an account of the estate and obtained his quietus, the Court may grant the administration of that estate, so not accounted for, to some other person, who may, by virtue thereof, call the heirs, executors or administrators of the former administrator to an account, who shall pay out of the deceased administrator's estate, all such debts as shall be found due to the estate he administered on, in the first place.

Again. By the Act of 1705, 3 Hen. Stat. 371, sec. 13, it is provided, that where any person is chargeable as executor or administrator, or otherwise, with the estate of any person deceased, and shall die so chargeable, the estate of such person shall be liable to pay and satisfy such other deceased person's or orphan's estate, before any other debt, &c. Thus, the provisions of the other Act, are extended to executors as well as administrators, not only as to the dignity of such debt, but as to the accountability to the administrator de bonis non; for, in no other way can it come to the estate; and it was not until long after this, (viz. in 1730,) that we had a statute, 4 Hen. Stat. 285, similar to those of Char. 2, and Wm. & Mary, empowering creditors to sue. Mark the phraseology of this law. The estate of the trustee shall be answerable. How? Not by suit against the heir, legatee, &c.; but the representatives of the personal estate most certainly. To whom answerable? To the deceased person's estate; not to the heir, distributee, &c., but to him who has a right to the personal estate, to wit, the administrator de bonis non. Our Courts of Equity, then, as early as 1661, had jurisdiction at the suit of the administrator de bonis non, to call 111 *the representatives of the first administrator to account; and since 1705, to call the executor or administrator of an executor to account; and it has been constantly the practice to do so.

Shall an after statute, then, giving a right to creditors to sue in a particular case, be considered as operating more than to give a remedy cumulative, as it were, to creditors in such cases; or shall it be considered as abrogating a practice, which that great feature in the law, in relation to the priority of such claims, seems to me to require a continuance of, merely because subsequent Acts may not repeat and continue, in the precise terms of the Act of 1661, the liability to the administrator de bonis non? And this, under the idea of a legal right in the creditor to be protected from the effects of a statute, passed twenty-five years before the Act, under which he claims this right. This statute, then, cannot repeal or alter that of 1705.

Our Courts are full of cases of suits by the administrator de bonis non claiming such a fund. This is one of them, in which no one thought of the objection until it came here. On the other hand, where are the cases of suits by creditors against the representatives of executors or administrators, either at law or in equity? How have they been prosecuted? Have they set up the debt in such suit, or have they first sued the administrator de bonis non for that purpose?

But, suppose the administrator de bonis non says to the creditor, "I have no assets; go against the representative of my predecessor; he wasted assets enough to pay your debt." But, the creditor says, "True, I have found that out; but your predecessor left no estate beyond enough to pay his own bond debts. My claim is in the nature of a simple contract, and of inferior dignity. Your's would stand higher; you must go;" or "I cannot go, because I have no judgment establishing a devastavit." What could the administrator de bonis non say to this? If he failed, would or would it not be a devastavit?

112 *All these inconveniences may be avoided by adhering to the present practice; for, if the administrator de bonis non has a right to call for all the assets not administered, that is, not paid away in debts, by the executor or first administrator, and the creditor establishes his debt against him, and he has properly administered all the effects which have come to his hands; and this creditor cannot be paid, and if the executor or first administrator has paid debts of inferior dignity, not leaving enough to pay this debt; then, the way is open and plain for him to go into equity against the estate of that party who has done him this injury.

Whether the executor, in this State, has been entitled to the surplus, since the Act of 1785, has never been brought before this Court, and ought not to be decided incidentally: but as some reasons have been given to shew that he may, I will merely observe, that as before shewn. Courts of Equity, ever since the Statute of Distributions, have treated them, whenever they could, as trustees. Our early statutes, before cited, clearly treated them as such, and gave the surplus to the administrator de bonis non. All our laws, in short, requiring them to give bond, holding them to counter security, &c. have placed them more in that character, than they stood in England. It is just too, that in all cases they should be so. And it was on a view of those ancient statutes, that I said in Dykes v. Woodhouse, 3 Rand. 312, that if this question was res nova, I would have serious doubts about it, even before the Act of 1785.

When the Act of 1785 was about to provide for the succession to intestate's estates, and provides that when any one shall die intestate as to his goods and chattels, or any part thereof, what did the Legislature mean by the words or any part thereof? If they intended a partial intestacy as it regarded an executor, by making an executor only of a part, it was unnecessary to use those words; for, the general law, as it before stood, distributed in such cases. So too, of a total intestacy, as it regarded the appointment *or qualification of an executor, either because no executor is named, or because the executor refuses. In these cases, although there is a will bequeathing the whole or greater part of the estate, there is a technical intestacy; inasmuch, that an administration with the will or testament annexed, is to be granted. But, in all these cases, the surplus would be distributed under the law as it before stood. To confine the words, then, to those, or like cases, might seem to impute to the Legislature a work of supererogation. The matter in hand was to provide how estates shall go by law, if the owner has not declared his wish on the subject. If he has, that wish must stand, although he has not appointed an executor, and in legal phase, is intestate. It did not mean, then, that kind of intestacy; for, it does not dispose of the estate in that case. But at present, it seems to me, that it intended to provide, that when the owner gave no other destination to his property by will, with or without an executor, he was to be considered as intestate in that sense of the word, as to such property, and that it should be distributed. This gives an operation and meaning to the words, and would introduce something new, or settle what might have been before doubtful; and in this way, we can account for their introduction.

If my impressions are right as to this matter, it is surely an additional reason why we should adhere to the present practice, as one reason for not giving the fund to the administrator de bonis non no longer exists.

But it is said, that the Act of 1711, repealing all Acts within its purview, not having re-enacted the provisions above noticed in former laws, as to the right of administrators de bonis non to call for the account as above mentioned, repealed those Acts; at least, that it repealed the Act of 1661. But, there are many other important provisions in former Acts, in relation to estates of testators and intestates, which are not embodied in this Act, such as that declaring the right of the Common-114 wealth to the surplus, in *case there be no next of kin; the exemption of an executor or administrator from a personal judgment, until a devastavit is proved; 1 Hen. Stat. 446; the liability of the justices for failing to take bonds; the priority given to claims against the estates of executors or administrators above mentioned, and which is in the same clause; provisions for counter security; the right to demand a refunding bond, &c. Must it, in short, be considered a repeal of every provision thereafter existing on the subject of deceased persons' estates, not again provided for in that Act? It would seem to me, that this would be giving an unreasonable latitude to this repealing clause.

The former laws had confined the probate of wills and granting administrations, &c. to the County Courts. This Act extends it, in certain cases, to the General Court, and subjects them, in case of neglect in taking bonds. Could it be supposed that they were to be subjected, and the County Courts not? The evident object of this Act was more clearly to define the manner of granting probates, letters of administration, and of administrations de bonis non, and how to be authenticated, &c., prescribing the forms of the bonds to be given, oaths to be taken, &c.; and as it regards this particular question, it would be strange to suppose that it was intended to take away the right of the administrator de bonis non, to call for the accounts in question, when the same Act, in the 4th and 9th sections, (speaking of the effect of probates and administration prescribed by that Act, and which includes of course those of administrators de bonis non,) declares that it shall empower and enable them to sue for, recover and receive, by all lawful ways and means whatsoever, all and singular the goods and chattels, real and personal, and all and every, the estate or estates, as any executor or administrator might lawfully do, by any ways or means whatsoever. Now, in what way, and how far, could executors and administrators, and administrators de bonis non then recover? They could then recover the very fund now in question.

115 *But, it is contended, that the terms on which the commission as administrator de bonis non is to issue, confines him to what is technically and at common law unadministered assets. Those terms are, "And if it shall so happen that any executor shall die intestate, not having fully performed his executorship, or any administrator shall depart this life, not having fully administered the goods of the intestate, it shall be lawful, &c. to grant certificate for obtaining letters of administration of the goods not administered." Then follows the clause declaring the effect of probates and administrations, as above mentioned. It is said, that these terms bring the case within what is technically an administration de bonis non in England, and the clause was intended to repeal, and did repeal the Act of 1661; so that thenceforth the administrator de bonis non should not call for the accounts, as by that Act directed, and as had been done for fifty years.

In the first place, I am not clear that it is brought within the technical language of the commission of an administrator de bonis non.* But, if the policy of the 116 Act of *1661, so far it provided for the accountability now under consideration, was extended to executors, as well as administrators, by the Act of 1705, then it will not follow that the Act of 1711 repealed or altered that policy, unless it also repealed the Act of 1705; and I supposed that this would also be contended for, but it has not.

*Note by JUDGE COALTER. It is not clear to me, that if an executor had converted every thing to his own use, and had paid neither debt nor legacy, and dies, that he has performed his executorship; or that an administrator, if he has in like manner converted and died, without paying debts or making distribution, that he has fully administered the goods of his intestate; though it may be that he has technically administered them. There are no words confining the grant of administration to this technical administration: as, that it shall be granted of the goods which were of the intestate, and which remains unadministered. No. The object was, that the administrator de bonis non should, as theretofore, possess himself of the means to perform the will, as the executor ought to have done, and to administer fully, not technically, the estate of the intestate. This was conformable to the spirit of the law of 1661, and of 1706, which then had been long in force and practised under, and the policy of which is thus impliedly sanctioned, not repealed.

suppose, sues the executor of an executor, to recover the fund in question, under the Act of 1785, in order to pay debts; but, it is alleged by the executor of the executor, that the Act does not authorise such suit. I think it would have been answered by the Court in such case, "Here is the Act of 1661, under which, for fifty years, the administrator de bonis non has recovered a similar fund from the executor or administrator of the administrator. It was the intention of the Legislature to extend the policy of that law, not only to the case of an executor as well as that of an administrator, but to other cases of persons having orphans' estates. This Act was not intended to repeal that of 1661, except so far as re-enacting its policy, and extending it, as aforesaid, repeals it. They must, therefore, be considered as Acts in pari materia, and as having the same object; and, therefore, the action will lie. It ought to lie for another reason. If an executor wastes and dies, it is a wrong which dies with him, and creditors may be injured; and as the Legislature has not provided that this action shall survive, we will consider that they have made this provision, so as in that way to secure creditors; and we will not presume the contrary; especially as the case of the administrator is combined in the same clause with that of the executor, and the words themselves cannot bear any reasonable interpretation but this. For, how is this fund to go back to the estate of the deceased; except it goes to him who has a right to that estate, to wit, the administrator de bonis non?"

Suppose that there was such a decision of the Courts of that day reported, or found in their records; could we say it was a bad decision, or a wrong construction of these Acts; and that this fund ought to stand out, until the Legislature might thereafter make some provision to enable creditors to sue for it, or until legatees and distributees came of age and recovered it, and against whom creditors could go? I would say, that it was a most correct decision, a most fair and just interpretation of the laws, and an advancement of justice, not only for the reasons which may thus be supposed to have influenced such Court, but for this further reason. Not only the law of 1661, but that of 1705, makes this claim against the estate of the executor or administrator,

But, if a mere technical common law commission was intended to be issued, still I do not think that would necessarily be a repeal of that branch of this section, which relates to the priority of the claim, or the accountability of the representative of the administrator, even if neither of them had been incorporated in the Act of 1705. To bring that subject within the purview, it must appear that there is something in the body of the Act opposed to the policy of the previous law, that it was intended by the Act to operate on this matter. That is attempted, by insisting that a technical common law commission is opposed to it; but that is not so. If the law had theretofore declared that goods wasted should no more be considered as administered, than goods remaining in kind, the common law commission would as well enable the administrator de bonis non to go into equity for these, as for assets that have been converted at law, though not in equity. But this was in fact the law, as it then stood, and which, I think this very clause recognizes as the law. The repeal, then, only went to that branch of the law, which imperfectly gave administration de bonis non, and which was there more fully and completely provided for.

one of the first dignity; and if it is to remain unsettled, whether the estate of such executor or administrator is or is not chargeable, on account of the trusteeship, until children of tender years shall be able to assert their claims, (for creditors, if there be any, and if they could, are not obliged, to resort to that fund,) no debts due from that estate can be paid with safety. The executor of the executor must come in by bill of conformity, bring in the creditors, the administrator de bonis non, the infants by their guardians, &c. in order to ascertain what is the sum so due, and to be first paid.

Suppose he does, and that sum is ascertained, to whom will it be decreed? To the guardian of the distributees, when the administrator de bonis non wants it to pay debts, to reimburse his own advancements for the estate, &c.? Or to him, for these purposes, and afterwards for distribution? Surely, I think, it would be decreed to him.

118 *If this was the law in 1710; if the executor or administrator of an executor, could then be called to account by the administrator de bonis non; then nothing is gained to the present question, by proving that the Act of 1661 is repealed by that of 1711. That must also repeal the Act of 1705, or the accountability still continued.

It is true there is no reported decision, as early as 1710, on this subject; nor have I examined the records of the Courts to see that such has been the practice. But this, I can say, I believe with confidence; that from 1661 until 1705, (44 years) if any administrator died in Virginia, not having obtained his quietus, and there was a second administration granted, that administrator called the executors and administrators of the first administrator to account for any assets converted, and not paid away in debts: that as creditors had not then, nor for many years thereafter, any remedy at law reaching such fund, it was a just and salutary law and practice; and I believe I may also with like confidence say, that from 1705 until 1825, (a space of 120 years more,) it has been the constant practice for the administrator de bonis non to call, as well the executor or administrator of an executor, as the executor or administrator of an administrator to account; and that such right never has been disputed, until the argument of this cause; and I think that these facts must be equal to a reported case, under the Act of 1705, of such decision as I have above supposed.

For these reasons, then, the Act of 1711 did not repeal or alter that feature of the Act of 1661, now under consideration; and of course, could not repeal the same feature as re-enacted in 1705.

But the Act of 1711 is not to be construed, at this day, as repealing those Acts, for another reason. The compilation of 1733, made under the sanction of the Legislature, (as the title page shews,) contains in it as well the Act of 1705 as that of 1711, as subsisting laws. It is true, the Act of 1661 is noted by its title, and said to be repealed, "and by the Act of 1711. But, this note is not to be considered as a statute repealing it because of its improper policy; otherwise, its policy in declaring the dignity of the demand in question, would be repealed. It is no more a repeal or alteration of the policy in this respect, than a similar note in the compilation of 1752, opposite the Act of 1711 above mentioned, repealed its policy. That statute is there marked "Rep'd." and by the Act of 1748, which also has a repealing clause, and may be said to have repealed the Act of 1711; but it is repealed merely on the ground, that this latter statute embraced its provisions as to granting probates and administrations; and in this same way, that of 1711 may be supposed to have repealed that of 1661, as to administrations de bonis non, but no further. All laws which may thus be considered as virtually repealed, are always taken into construction as in pari materia, in case of any doubt. Suppose the Act of 1705 had not contained in it a provision in relation to the priority of these claims, and that had stood on the Act of 1661. Would the statute of 1711 have repealed that provision? Certainly not; for, it would not have been within the purview of the Act. That Act merely intended to point out "the manner of granting probates," &c., not to prescribe the remedies of executors or administrators. This matter of priority of claim, as well as of accountability, regards their remedies, and would not have been repealed, or the Act of 1705, which continues the same matter in this respect, ought also to have been considered as repealed.

That branch, then, of the Act of 1661, was either re-enacted or repealed by the Act of 1705, not by the Act of 1711; though the other branch of the Act, and which fell within the purview, was repealed, or rather its policy re-enacted and enlarged by that Act. This, I think, is the only sound construction that can be put on those statutes.

It is a little remarkable, that even the power to grant a commission of administration de bonis non seems not expressly to be given since the Act of 1748, 120 though it is occasionally *incidentally spoken of. But the constant practice has been, and is, to grant them. Could it be said, at this day, that this power in the Courts does not exist?

So in 1748, (to be found in the compilation of 1752, p. 229,) a similar statute to that of 1705, is passed, extending its provisions to the case of a guardian, who had not been named before. So, also, in the compilation of 1769, this same law of 1705, and the one last mentioned, are both inserted as subsisting laws; and so the matter stood until 1785.

If I am correct, then, in my understanding and interpretation of the Act of 1705, as well the executor or administrator of an executor, as the executor or administrator of an administrator, was accountable to the administrator de bonis non, from 1705 until 1785, (a space of 80 years,) as the latter had been for 40 years before, and were so constantly sued and brought to account. This, I understand, to be admitted to have been the practice; whilst, at the same time, though there may be a case, yet I can find no trace of any, where a creditor has taken his remedy under the statute in his favor.

In the Act of 1748, chap. 5, sec. 22, which impliedly repealed that of 1711, as before mentioned, it is declared that all commissions, probates, &c. issued, &c. and signed by the Governor, &c. shall empower and enable executors or administrators to possess themselves of the estates of their testators or intestates, by any lawful ways or means whatever. If the amount due from a former executor or administrator, is a part of the estate of the deceased, as understood in our laws, and subject to pay debts, legacies, and for distribution, the payment and performance of all which belong to the duties of the administrator de bonis non, (as appears by the Statute of Distributions, which directs that after debts, funeral, and just expenses, &c. the surplus of all and singular the goods and personal estate shall be distributed, &c.) how can it be said that such commission cannot extend to it? I confess I am utterly unable to say that it shall not.

121 *Although the Act of 1785, chap. 61, which extends the principle so as to embrace not only executors, administrators and guardians, but committees of idiots and lunatics, makes a change in the phraseology, by declaring that the executor or administrator of the person so chargeable, shall pay so much as shall be due to the ward, idiot or lunatic, or to the legatee or person entitled to distribution, before any proper debt, &c.; it cannot be supposed that the object was to change what had theretofore been considered the settled law and practice. I say so, because no such change is indicated, except by a slight change in phraseology. It was not intended, surely, to cut out creditors; and if that law was intended to take away the surplus from executors, and thus to remove one reason why the administrator de bonis non should not have the action, it can hardly be supposed to intend any change in the practice on this subject, as to him. I say so the more confidently, for this further reason, that so far from any grievance under the former practice existing, which that Act may be said to remedy, that same practice has gone on yet forty years more, since that Act, without mischief or complaint, that we have heard of: successive Legislatures, after distant periods, re-enacting and extending the principle, without any declared intention to alter a practice, which must have been so well known and understood.

This Act of 1785, also introduces a feature into our laws, which has been, from time to time, much extended, and which seems to me to have a strong bearing on the other branch of the enquiry; as it seems to me to cut up almost every suit at law, which might have been brought by creditors under the statute aforesaid. It declares that no surety of an executor or administrator shall be answerable for any omission or mistake in pleading, &c.; and the Act of 1806 provides, that the executor or administrator himself shall not be liable for false pleading, non-pleading, mispleading, &c. in any action then pending or thereafter to be brought, &c.; provided that judgment may be given, so far as 122 assets *may be found in his hands.

This provision is not only in the Act of 1819, but it further provides a remedy, which surely is better than that given before, if that was restricted to a suit on a judgment as I have before contended, by enabling a creditor, after obtaining a judgment against an executor or administrator, to bring suit on the official bond against the executor or administrator, and his sureties, or either of them, or the executors or administrators of either of them, &c.

If an executor of an executor is not liable to be sued, except when a devastavit has been established by a judgment fixing such devastavit, (as I hold to be undoubted law;) and as there will be few cases indeed, in which such devastavit will hereafter be established by the first judgment; this last Act, giving a remedy on the official bond, will, I think, forever put an end to any use, which the creditors might wish to make of the statute, and which, even without this alternate remedy, has remained, I believe, a dead letter in our statute book, for upwards of a century.

Thus, at a period of our legislation, when every reason for a change of practice has, from time to time, been more and more taken from under us, and when the remedy of the creditor under our former statute always doubtful and surrounded by difficulties, has become entirely useless and unnecessary, (a better one being given to him) we are to interpose on some supposed legal right that he has to our interposition, so as to uphold his claim under a statute never to be resorted to, and change a practice of 150 years standing, which, to say the least of it, has some plausible ground of law to stand on.

But say that an executor may, notwithstanding the Act of 1785, be still entitled to the surplus, and that he also is entitled to our protection. If so, and the administrator de bonis non calls on his representative for the fund in question, and which he would necessarily do by a suit in Chancery; might not that Court only, and 123 from time to time, *decree what was necessary for the payment of debts?

If a creditor sues for it at law, he will recover the fund, although there may be enough in the hands of the administrator de bonis non to satisfy him. It would therefore be more just, even on this score, that the administrator de bonis non, and not the creditor, should get the fund.

On the whole. I can see no reason for changing our practice; and it seems to me, it is one of those cases, in which it may be better to do too little than too much. In Dykes v. Woodhouse, we did not go according to what may be the British practice; but looking to our own statutes, and the reason and nature of the case, gave the scire facias, or action of debt, to the administrator de bonis non.

I think, therefore, the process was properly issued, and ought not to be quashed.
JUDGE CABELL.

This case was elaborately and ably argued by the counsel, and has been fully discussed by the Judges who have preceded me. I also have considered with very great attention, the arguments and authorities adduced; but, I must acknowledge that I have not experienced any difficulty on the subject; which appears to me to depend on a few plain and obvious principles.

The powers of an administrator de bonis non, must depend on his commission. That commission, in England, is confined to the goods not administered by his predecessor. Bac. Abr. vol. 3, p. 19, 20. Now, although, in some cases, a question may be raised as to what shall, or what shall not amount to an administration, yet it never has been doubted in England, that when an administrator wastes the goods of his intestate, or converts them to his own use, that is an administration. Being an administrator of the goods by the former administrator, it is without the commission of the administrator de bonis non. And, accordingly, it is admitted on all hands, that the 124 practice *in England, (founded no doubt on this principle,) has invariably been for the creditor and distributee of the first intestate, and not the administrator de bonis non, to prosecute the representatives of the first administrator for any waste or misapplication of the assets by that administrator.

Such being the law and the practice in England, let us see whether our Legislature has adopted the same or a different system. It is true, that at a very early period of our history, (in the year 1661,) when our Code afforded nothing like a matured system of legislation on the subjects of the probate of wills, and grants of administration, there was a law, 2 Hen. Stat. 92, which provides, that if an administrator died before he had given an account of the estate, and obtained his quietus, the Court should be "empowered to grant the administration of that estate so not accounted for, to some other person, who may, by virtue thereof, call the heirs, executors, or administrators of the former administrator to an account, who shall pay out of the said deceased administrator's estate, all such debts as shall be found due to the estate he administered upon, in the first place."

If this law were now in force, there could be no doubt that the administrator would have the power contended for. But, that law was repealed more than a century ago, and has never been re-enacted.

In the year 1711, the Legislature matured and adopted a complete system upon the subject of the grant of administrations, and instead of the provision in the Act of 1661, above referred to, adopted the following: (See 4 Hen. Stat. 14,) "And if it shall so happen that any executor shall die intestate, not having fully performed his executorship, or any administrator shall depart this life, not having fully administered the goods of the intestate; in every such case, it shall and may be lawful for the Court that granted the certificate for obtaining such probate or commission of administration, to hear and determine the right of administration, and to grant certificate for obtaining letters of ad-

this Act shall have right thereto." That it was intended, by this law, to repeal the Act of 1661, is a subject on which I cannot doubt. In the first place, the two Acts (relating to the power of the administrator de bonis non,) are inconsistent with each other; and in the second place, all former laws "coming within the purview of this Act," are expressly repealed. In fact, there could have been no other object for introducing this provision in the Act of 1711, but to repeal the Act of 1661; for, the power to grant administrations de bonis non, would necessarily result from the general power to grant letters of administration. And accordingly, we find, that in the edition of the laws published under the authority of the Legislature, about twenty years afterwards, viz: in 1733, the Act of 1661, is given by its title only, as one that was repealed by the Act of 1711.

It is very worthy of remark, that our Legislature, in repealing the Act of 1661, and in providing for the appointment of a second administrator, have adopted the very terms used in England, as descriptive of the administrator de bonis non. This was not an accidental circumstance. It was the effect of a design to make our laws conform to those of England, the policy of which has been tested by long and approved experience. By this law, the commission of an administrator de bonis non is, in this country, precisely the same that it is in England. It is this commission that must determine his rights and powers; and looking at this commission, I cannot see how it is possible to claim for him greater rights and powers, than have been assigned to him by the decision of the English Courts. Those decisions have my entire approbation.

It is said, however, that a different practice has always prevailed in this country. This may be so, or it may not be so; for, the evidence on the subject does not enable me to pronounce any positive opinion upon it. It is true, that in the case of Spotswood v. Dandridge, the Special Court 126 *of Appeals said that an administrator de bonis non had the powers now claimed for him. But I well remember that the point was not considered by the Court. This is the first time that the propriety of any practice on the subject, has been brought to the deliberate consideration of the Court; and I cannot sanction any practice that is against the law, however long it may have been pursued.

I am clearly of opinion, that an administrator de bonis non has no right to call to account the representative of a deceased administrator, for a waste or misapplication of the assets; and consequently, that the scire facias heretofore awarded in this case should be quashed, as having been improvidently awarded, and that the appeal should be abated.

Hunter v. Fulcher.

A law of another State is sufficiently authenticated under the Act of Congress, if it has the Seal of the State affixed thereto; and the particular officer entitled to affix the Seal, depends upon the regulations of the several States, respectively. Evidence—Law of Another State—Whole Law Unnecessary.—Where a party in a suit in Virginia, relies on the law of another State, to support his claim, he may produce an authenticated copy of the section only on which he relies, without a copy of the whole law.

Hunter, a man of colour, brought an action of assault and battery against Fulcher, in the Court of Hustings of the City of Richmond, to recover his freedom. An issue being made upon the plea of not guilty, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

At the trial, the plaintiff offered in evidence, a paper purporting to be the first section of an Act of Assembly of 127 *Maryland, entitled, "An Act relating to negroes, and to repeal the Acts of Assembly therein mentioned." This paper was authenticated by Thomas Harris, Clerk of the Court of Appeals for the Western Shore of the said State, who affixed the seal of the said Court of Appeals. Then followed a certificate by John Buchanan, "Chief Judge of the State of Maryland, for the Court of Appeals," that "Thomas Harris is Clerk of the said Court of Appeals for the Western Shore, and that the annexed attestation by him is in due form and by the proper officer." After this, there is a certificate by "Thomas Culbreth, Clerk of the Council of the State of Maryland," that John Buchanan aforesaid was, at the time of signing the foregoing certificate, Chief Judge of the said State for the Court of Appeals, &c. Ramsay Waters, Register of the Court of Chancery, certifies, that Thomas Culbreth is Clerk of the Executive Council of the State of Maryland; and he affixes the great seal of the State aforesaid. To the introduction of these certificates, the defendant objected, because they were not proved and certified according to law, and because the first of them, or that part of it which purported to be an Act of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, was not a full exemplification or copy of that Act. But, the Court refused to exclude the said papers from the jury, and permitted them to be read in evidence; to which opinion, the defendant excepted.

The plaintiff also offered in evidence the commission to two justices of the peace of the county of Washington in the District of Columbia, to take the depositions of sundry witnesses; and a statement by the said justices, that they met and sat at the office of the Mayor of Georgetown, on Saturday, the 8th day of October, and thereafter on Friday and Saturday, the 14th and 15th days of the said month, and thence by adjournment from day to day till Tuesday, the 18th day of the said month, for the examination of the witnesses mentioned in the commission, and the said Fulcher, the defendant, did not appear before 128 them, either in *person or by attorney. He also introduced a witness, who swore that on Tuesday evening previous to the 8th day of October, 1825, he delivered to the defendant Fulcher, a notice to take the depositions of the said witnesses: that he did not recollect on what day the notice stated that the depositions would be taken; but that upon reference to the said depositions, and to the minutes of the Court, the fact is brought distinctly to his mind, that the day fixed in the notice for taking the said depositions, was on the Saturday previous to the October term of the Hustings Court, which was on the 8th day of October, 1825; but, that the notice itself had been mislaid or lost, &c. The Court permitted the said evidence to go to the jury, and the defendant excepted.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed to the Superior Court of Henrico. That Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Hustings, because the Act of the Legislature of the State of Maryland aforesaid, ought not to have been permitted to go to the jury, as it was not proved or certified according to law.

French and Southgate, for the appellant. Daniel, for the appellee.

It was contended for the appellant, that the Maryland Act was duly authenticated, according to the Act of Congress. L. U. S. 1 vol. 115, chap. 11. In the case of the U. States v. Johns, 4 Dall. 416, it is decided, that no particular officer of a State is required to attest a copy of a law; but that it is sufficient, if the great seal is affixed. This doctrine is confirmed by the case of Ferguson v. Harwood, 7 Cranch. 412. Foreign laws may be proved by exemplification under the great seal, and by the laws printed by the public printer. Norris's Peake, 109, 110; U. States v. Palmer, 3

129 Wheat. 624. As to the objection that *part of the law only was certified, that rule only applies to judicial proceedings. But, with regard to laws, every section is a distinct fact. If the opposite party thinks that there is something in another part of the law, which operates in his favor, it is incumbent on him to produce it. Dive v. Manningham, 1 Plowd. 60; Neues & ux. v. Lark and Hunt, Ibid. 408.

For the appellee, it was said, that this law was not authenticated, either according to the common law or the Act of Congress. By the common law, foreign laws must be proved by a witness on oath. Talbot v. Seaman, 1 Cranch, 1; Church v. Hubbard, 2 Cranch. 237. The Act of Congress has not been complied with; for, the great seal is not affixed to the law, but to the certificate that "Thomas Culbreth is clerk of the Executive Council."

But the whole Act is not certified, which was necessary according to all the principles which govern evidence. 1 Phill. Evid. 289. Statutes should be taken all together. 4 Bac. Abr. I. tit. Statutes. The cases from Plowden relate to pleading, and not to evidence.

The notice for taking depositions was too short, and no place was appointed for taking them. They were taken, too, without a regular adjournment from day to day.

March 22. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

In this case it seems, that a written notice of the place of taking the depositions, was given to Fulcher; but, that being lost, the person who gave it is introduced to prove the notice. He swears, that on the Tuesday before the Saturday on which the Justices first met, he gave Fulcher a notice to take the depositions, but he no where states in his affidavit a notice of the place of taking them. It is not unlikely that this was stated in his evidence before the Court, but omitted in taking down that evidence. We, however, must go by the record, and this seems 130 to be a *defect. But this is not the worst. In the certificate of the magistrates, they state that they had met at the Mayor's Office of Georgetown on Saturday the 8th day of October, 1825, and "thereafter, on Friday and Saturday, 14th and 15th of same month, and thence by adjournment, till Tuesday, 18th, for the examination of the witnesses," &c. and "that no person appeared for Yeatman or Fulcher." The 8th of October was the day on which Fulcher had notice to attend. On that day, it seems, there was a mere meeting. How long it lasted, we are not told; nor did the magistrates adjourn to any further day. How then could Fulcher know that they would meet again on that business? Or, what power had they to do so, without adjournment? The meeting on the 14th and 15th, was quite a distinct thing, and required a notice as much as the first meeting. I consider the depositions, therefore, as taken wholly without notice, and improperly admitted.

As to the Maryland law, it is objected, first, that it is not properly authenticated. I think it is. The Act of Congress says, that the Acts of the several Legislatures shall be authenticated, by having the seal of their State affixed thereto. This is the whole that is required. Here the seal is certainly affixed, and to this law, and with the sole view of authenticating the law. The mode seems somewhat roundabout; several officers attesting the authenticity of the Acts of each other. But, this is the mode which the State authorities have settled, and to them the Act meant to leave the matter. In the U. States v. Johns, 4 Dall. 412, the Court, composed of Judges Washington and Peters, say, "The Act of Congress does not require the attestation of any public officer in this case; although in all the other cases provided for, such an attestation is required. There is good reason for the distinction. The seal is in itself the highest test of authenticity; and leaving the evidence upon that alone, precludes all controversy as to the officer entitled to affix the seal, which is a regulation very different in the different 131 States." Here we have the great "seal of the State affixed; and all controversy as to the proper officer to affix it being precluded, we must take it that it is properly affixed.

The next objection, to wit, that this evidence ought not to be admitted, because it is one section only of the Act, has a greater show of reason in it, but yet is not sound, as I incline to think. The objection rests on this ground; that the whole law is one entire record, and that no part of a record can be used as evidence, without exhibiting the whole. This is true of judicial records, and for the best reason; that the whole record is one, and without the whole, you cannot tell what is the effect of it. But, with Legislative Acts, it is different. We know well, that some of our Acts occupy many pages, and treat of many different parts of an extensive subject, and sometimes of different subjects, wholly unconnected with each other. We are told in Plowd. 65, that a statute often contains many branches, and "that these branches, though contained in one chapter, are several Acts of Parliament, and concern several matters; and then, where one branch only serves a man's purpose, it is sufficient for him to recite that only; for the recital of that only is the recital of an entire and several Act of Parliament;" and if this rule hold in the strictness of pleading, I cannot see why it should not as to evidence. The section of the law of Maryland is perfect as to sense and purpose. It enacts that it shall not be lawful to bring a slave into the State, either for sale or residence there; and that any slave brought in, contrary to the Act, shall immediately be free. Now, we cannot suppose that in this same Act, there can be any clause contradicting this; and if there should be one narrowing or modifying it; saying (for instance,) that where a citizen of Maryland acquires a slave by descent or marriage, he may bring him in, provided that within such a time he has him registered; would not the claimant have to bring himself, by proof, within the proviso? And if you would hold him to that, would it be any additional burthen to 132 say he should produce the "law which authorised such proof? The law (if it exist) he may easily produce. The proof may be much more difficult. But, if no such proviso exist, will you require the pauper to prove this negative? My present impression then is, that the law is well authenticated; and that the section produced is admissible evidence; but, that the depositions were improperly admitted, there being no notice.

The judgments of both Courts should be reversed, and the cause sent back.

The other Judges concurred.

May, 1827.

Judicial Notice—Public Laws.—The laws establishing Banks in Virginia, are public laws, and may be noticed by the Courts ex officio.

Banks—Usury Laws—Application.—The law of usury

*For sequel of principal case, see Bank of the Valley v. Stribbling, 7 Leigh 28.

Judicial Notice—Public Laws—Laws Establishing Bank.—To the point that the acts of the general assembly incorporating banks are public acts of which the court will judicially take notice, the principal case is cited in Farmers' Bank v. Willis, 7 W. Va. 42; Mason v. Farmers' Bank, 12 Leigh 87; applies to the Banks, subject to the modifications produced by their charters.

Notes—Interest in Advance.—Taking interest in advance upon the whole amount of a note discounted at Bank, is lawful.

Usury—Facts Agreed—Province of Court.—Where the facts are agreed or found by the jury, it is the province of the Court, to say whether they amount to usury or not.

Usury—What Constitutes.—Case at Bar.—When a proposition is made for a loan of money, and the lender will only consent to lend a part of the money wanted, on condition that the borrower shall receive stock at a price much above the market value, to make up the deficiency, and the bargain is made on these terms, such contract is usurious.

Notes—Interest in Advance.—A loan on accommodation paper, and a discount on real paper, stand on the same footing, as to the right of a Bank to deduct the interest in advance on the whole amount of the note.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Frederick county, where a suit was brought by the Bank of the Valley against Erasmus Stribbling, on a promissory note for $8,810, made payable to Francis Stribbling, endorsed by him to Francis Stribbling, jun'r., endorsed by him to A. S. Tidball, administrator of Sigismond Stribbling, deceased, endorsed by him to John Jolliffe, *endorsed by him to John Mackey, endorsed by him to George W. Kiger, who, at the foot of the note, ordered the drawer to be credited for the amount of the proceeds of the said note. The declaration alleges, that this note was afterwards discounted at the Bank of the Valley, and the full amount thereof paid to Erasmus Stribbling, deducting therefrom the lawful discount or interest, &c.

All the subsequent proceedings are so fully detailed in the opinions which follow, that it would be needless repetition to insert them here.

The case was argued in this Court, by Jones and Johnson, for the appellant; and Stanard and Leigh, for the appellee.

On the part of the appellant, it was contended: 1. That this transaction was a loan, and not a discount of paper already in circulation. Paper of this sort is not entitled to the privilege of having the interest deducted in advance, on the whole amount of the note. Jones v. Hake, 2 Johns. Cas. 60; Wilkie v. Rosevelt, 3 Do. 66; Dunham v. Day, 13 Johns. Rep. 40; Dunham v. Goode, 16 Do. 367; Powell v. Waters, 17 Do. 176; Chitt. on Bills, 77, cites Rex v. Ridge, 4 Price's Rep. 66; N.

Notes—Interest in Advance—Usury.—It is settled in Virginia that the taking of interest in advance, upon discounting a note at banks not usurious. To this point, the principal case is cited in Grigsby v. Weaver, 5 Leigh 213; Crump v. Trytyle, 5 Leigh 261, 260, 263, 264, 267; State Bank v. Cowan, 8 Leigh 264.

Same—Statute—Person—Corporation.—To the point that the word "person" used in the law against usury embraces corporations, the principal case is cited in Bank of United States v. Merchants' Bank of Baltimore, 1 Rob. 589, 590; Crafford v. Supervisors of Warwick County, 87 Va. 115, 12 S. E. Rep. 147.

York Fire Ins. Company v. Ely, 2 Cow. Rep. 678. These cases fix the character of this transaction as a loan; and on the doctrine of taking interest in advance, Comyn on Usury, 81, and the cases there cited, and Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pull. 154, support the other branch of the proposition. There is an additional objection to this discount, because it was for eighteen months, when the charter allowed only one hundred and twenty days; as to the effect of which, Comyn on Usury, 81, 2 Cow. Rep. 678, above cited, and the same book, page 736, are conclusive.

2. The transaction was usurious. The sale of stock was connected with the loan, and inseparable from it. The stock was sold above the market price. The sale of stock was a mere sift to cover the usury, which will not avail.

134 *Davis v. Hardacre, 2 Camp. 375; Jones v. Davidson, Holt, 256; Douglass v. M'Cheaney, 2 Rand. 109.

For the appellee it was contended: 1. That the Statute of Usury does not extend to a corporation. The expression in the law is "no person," &c. This term does not apply to a corporation. 2 East's Cr. Law, 927. The second section inflicts a penalty to be paid, one half to the Commonwealth, the other to the informer; which can only apply to a natural person. An artificial person can never be liable to indictment or penalty. The terms of all the Bank charters use words of restriction, not of grant, in imposing limits on the rate of interest which they are allowed to take. This plainly implies, that without that restriction, the Banks might take any rate of interest that they pleased, and therefore were not subject to the usury laws. Besides, the charters allow the Banks to take one half of one per cent. for thirty days, which exceeds the rate of six per cent. per annum. There was no necessity for applying the Statute of Usury to Banks. They were subject to a greater penalty, viz: the forfeiture of their charter. Fleckner v. U. S. Bank, 8 Wheat. 354.

2. As to the length of time the note had to run, the law only makes the directors liable to a penalty, and so far from exonerating the borrower, it declares that whoever shall borrow for more than one hundred and twenty days, shall be liable to pay the note at the expiration of that time, as if it were made payable then. 2 Rev. Code, 102, sec. 18. There was no stipulation here, to let the note run for eighteen months at all events. Stribbling had his option to renew it or not, and might have discharged himself by paying it at the end of sixty days.

3. A discount applies as well to accommodation paper, as to paper given for a real consideration. Beawes' Lex Merc. 410. The N. York cases all support this idea. This was the English law, where there is no express provision authorising discounts at all.

135 *4. The burthen of proving the value of stock lies upon the borrower, not the lender. 2 Camp. Rep. 553. The price of the stock was fixed by Stribbling himself. The loan of $2,500 was not connected with the sale of Bank stock.

5. The jury, and not the Court, were the proper tribunal to decide whether the sale was a disguise for usury, and they have decided that question for the appellee. 3 Com. Law Rep. 97; 4 Mau. & Selw. 194, Castairs v. Steane; Doe ex dem. Metcalfe v. Brown, 3 Com. Law Rep. 109; 3 Barnew. & Ald. 664; 5 Com. Law Rep. 417, S. C. But, if the Court ought to have decided the question, they ought not to have decided it in the way asked by the appellant. It is absolutely necessary to have a communication for a loan, to render the sale of property connected with a loan usurious. The Bank, by its charter, was bound to sell its stock whenever par could be obtained. This ought to have great weight in ascertaining the intent of the Bank in making this contract.

In reply, it was said, that it did not appear judicially to the Court, that the Bank of the Valley was a corporation, and therefore, it could derive no benefit from the argument that the term "persons" did not apply to corporations. The charter of this Bank is a private law, which must be pleaded or given in evidence. 5 Com. Dig. 322, 323, (New Edition,) tit. "Parliament," R. 6, 7. Legrand v. Hampden Sidney College, 5 Munf. 324. Our law, 1 Rev. Code, 510, chap. 123, sec. 92, merely declares that private Acts may be given in evidence without being specially pleaded; but, they must be given in evidence, and the Court cannot take notice of them judicially. That this law is a private Act, appears from the case of Kirk v. Nowell, 1 Term Rep. 125; Holland's Case, 4 Co. Rep. 76; The Prince's Case, 8 Co. Rep. 28.

JUDGE CARR.

This is a most important case, both for the amount of money, and the principles of law, involved in it; and it was argued with all the zeal, ability and research, which its importance merited. It is a suit by the Bank against Stribbling, on a promissory note for $8,800, payable at sixty days to Fr. Stribbling, or order, negotiable and payable at the Bank. There are six endorsers; and the last directs that the note be credited to the drawer. It was discounted at the Bank; protested for non-payment; and the maker sued. The declaration sets out the particulars of the case. The defendant, 1st, demurred generally to the declaration, and on argument the demurrer was overruled. 2d. He filed a special plea of usury, to which there was a replication and issue. 3d. He pleaded Nil Debet, and issue. 4th. Another special plea of usury, to which there was a demurrer. The Court thought the plea bad; but gave leave to amend, by adding the scienter. Thus amended, the Court received the plea. The plaintiff excepted to the opinion of the Court giving leave to amend, and took issue on the plea. The defendant filed another special plea of usury to the following effect: that before the making of the note, to wit, on the 14th day of February, 1821, at &c. it was corruptly, and against the form of the Acts of Assembly, &c. agreed between the Bank and the said Stribbling, that the Bank would discount for him two notes, one for $10,000, the other for $2,500, and would continue the said discount for eighteen months, provided Stribbling (and several others named) should be made drawers, and the notes should be endorsed by Sigismond Stribbling; the notes to be renewed every sixty days, and the discount to be paid thereon, to wit, interest in advance 137 at the rate of one *half of one per cent. for every thirty days; and provided that the said Stribbling would take in payment of the said discount, one hundred shares of stock of the Bank at $10,000, and the rest in money. The plea then states the giving and discounting the notes, with their various renewals; the receipt of the shares at par, &c.; all in execution and continuation of the corrupt agreement; and concludes with an averment, that at the original discounting, and at each renewal of the notes, there was uniformly paid in advance by Stribbling to the Bank, in execution of the said corrupt and unlawful agreement, a discount upon the notes, at the rate of one half of one per cent. for every thirty days; and he avers that the discount and interest contracted to be paid, and actually paid, by him to the Bank, at the renewal of the said notes, every sixty days, exceeds the rate of $6 for the forbearance and giving day of payment of $100 for one year; contrary to the Act of the General Assembly in that case made and provided; by means whereof, and by force of the said Acts of the General Assembly, the said last mentioned promissory note was, and is, void in law, and this, &c. To this plea there was a general demurrer, which the Court sustained.

The issues of fact were then tried by a jury, and all found for the plaintiffs; on which verdict, the Court rendered judgment.

In the progress of the trial, three exceptions to the opinion of the Court were taken; which will be further noticed hereafter, as also an exception to the opinion of the Court overruling a motion for a new trial. The demurrers to the declaration, and the last plea, were placed by the counsel for the defendant on the same ground, to wit, that the case disclosed by each was a case of pure loan, and therefore that the interest taken in advance was usurious. Before, however, deciding this question, it may be best to discuss some preliminary points raised at the bar.

It was contended by the plaintiff's counsel; First, That no corporations are embraced by the statute of usury.

138 *Secondly, That if it extend to other corporations, it does not to this Bank, it being, by the law of its creation, set above the general law of usury. To meet, or rather to forestall these enquiries, it is insisted on the other side, that the law creating the Bank, is a private statute, and not being set out in the pleadings, cannot be noticed by the Court, in deciding these demurrers. This last point must be first disposed of. The distinction between public and private Acts, is unquestionably a doctrine of the common law; but, as I must say that it seems to me to be founded much more in technical and artificial reasoning than in good sense, I do not feel inclined to carry it beyond the strict letter. Most of the old books abound with cases turning on this doctrine. Many illustrations of the distinction between public and private acts, are given in Holland's Case, 4 Co. Rep. 76. But, I have seen the subject nowhere treated with more clearness and precision, than in the note to 6 Bac. Abr. 374, tit. Statute, F. said to be from the pen of Mr. Abbott. "Acts are deemed to be public and general Acts, which the Judges will take notice of without pleading, to wit, Acts concerning the King, the Queen, and the Prince; those concerning all prelates, nobles, and great officers; those concerning the whole spirituality; and those which concern all officers in general, such as all sheriffs, &c.; Acts concerning trade in general, or any specific trade; Acts concerning all persons generally, though it be a special or particular thing, such as a statute concerning assizes, or woods in forests, chases, &c. &c. Com. Dig. tit. Parliament, (R. 6.) 2d. Private Acts are those, which concern only a particular species, thing or person; of which the Judges will not take notice, without pleading them, viz. Acts relating to the bishops only, Acts for toleration of dissenters, Acts relating to any particular place, or to divers particular towns, or to one or divers particular counties, or to colleges only in the universities. Com. Dig. tit. Parliament, (R. 7.) 3d. In a general Act, there may be a private clause, 139 (Ibid.) and a *private Act, if recognized by a public Act, must afterwards be noticed by the Courts as such." (2 Term Rep. 567.) To this last point, there are many authorities. Buller, in his Nisi Prius, 224, says, that though it be regularly true, that a private law shall not be taken notice of unless it be shewn; yet it will be otherwise, in case such private law be recognized by a public one. In Samuel v. Evans, 2 Term Rep. 574, Ashurst, Justice, speaking of the statute of 23d Hen. 6, empowering sheriffs to take bail bonds, says, "on the reason of the thing, the statute is a general law; for, though it relates to officers of a certain description, yet all the King's subjects are included in it; for it gives to all of them a liberty of being bailed. But, whatever doubt there might have been before the passing of the statute of Ann, it is now removed by that statute, which unquestionably makes it a public law." Buller, J. in the same case, speaking of the 23d Hen. 6, says, "But the point is not now open to consideration; for, whatever might have been the law before the statute of Ann, the case of Saxby v. Kirby, removes all doubt. The Court there said, that though the 23d Hen. 6, were a private law, yet the statute of Ann having enabled the Sheriff to assign such bond, the Court must take notice of the law that enables him to take such bond." Whether our laws creating Banks are intrinsically private Acts, is matter of great doubt with me. They, to be sure, may be said in some respects to concern the particular stockholders who compose the corporation; but, in other respects, all the citizens are interested in them. The Commonwealth has a large interest in them, and by her power of appointing officers, has, in a great degree, the control of them. The cashier is by the law directed semi-annually to furnish to the Executive, statements on oath, shewing the whole situation of the Bank, which it is made the duty of the Executive to communicate to the Legislature. He is also empowered to send an agent to inspect the books of the Bank, and count the specie. Our laws also make it felony 140 to counterfeit *their notes. All these things give them rather the aspect of great public institutions, than private companies. In Young v. The Bank of Alexandria, 4 Cranch, 388, counsel, who were discussing the question whether the law of Virginia establishing the Bank of Alexandria, was a public Act, were stopped by the Court. Chase, J. said, "The Act makes it felony to counterfeit the notes of this Bank. Does not that make it a public Act?" Marshall, C. J. said, "that the opinion of the Court was very strong that this was a public Act; and that if it were not, it being printed by the public printer, by order of the Legislature, agreeably to a general Act of Assembly for that purpose, it must be considered sufficiently authenticated." From all this, I rather incline to think, that these Bank laws are of themselves public laws; but if not, I am well satisfied that they have been made so, by the recognition frequently given them by public laws. All our revisals (since Banks were among us,) direct the publication of the laws creating them, as public laws; the revisal of 1819, especially. It gives a list of the general laws to be published; and the Bank laws are among these; then it directs that all private, local, and temporary Acts, shall have their titles only published. I am of opinion, that the Court are bound to notice this law, though not set out in the pleadings.

We come now to the question, are corporations included within the Statute of Usury? Can they take usury ad libitum? It is contended, 1st. that they are not within the words of the law; 2nd, that they are not within the mischief.

The first objection that occurs to this point, is its novelty. I have never heard, nor have I been able to find in any book, a question of this kind raised; and yet the case must have occurred frequently. We see many decisions in the New York, and Massachusetts cases, where the contracts of Banks have been pronounced usurious. These cases called forth the very best talents of the State, and were, some of them, most ably argued; and yet, this 141 objection *never occurred. In the Federal Court, cases have been decided between the U. S. Bank and its debtors, in which the question of usury has arisen; but it was never contended, that a corporation could not commit usury. I refer particularly to the case of Fleckner v. U. S. Bank, 8 Wheat. 338. I mention this merely as a prima facie objection to the point. It is certain, that although never made till now, it may be sound; and the professional standing of the counsel who made it, as well as the ability with which it was supported, require that it should be seriously weighed.

The first section of the law directs, that no person shall, upon any contract, take directly or indirectly, for loan of any money, &c. more than six per cent. for a year, &c. The second section says, "If any person shall, by any way or means, &c. take more than six per cent. every person so offending shall forfeit double," &c. These sections, it is said, shew that none but persons can commit usury, and that a corporation is not a person. That a corporation is not a natural person, is most clear. Whether they may not sometimes be comprehended in law, by that term, I have not formed an opinion. Some pretty strong cases to that effect were cited at the bar; and if this were an attempt to inflict the penalties of the statute, we should have to decide that point. But the question is, whether a contract made by a corporation, contrary to the statute, is not void; and this, I think, is clearly decided by the last clause of the first section, which enacts, that "all bonds, contracts, covenants, conveyances or assurances, to be made for payment or delivery of any money or goods so to be lent, on which a higher interest is reserved or taken than is hereby allowed, shall be utterly void." These words seem to me to include every contract that can be made. The words of the law, therefore, take in the case.

But it is said, that corporations are not within the mischief of the law, or its meaning. The mischief of the law, was taking usury. Cannot corporations 142 make usurious *contracts? Unquestionably. The power of buying and selling, granting and taking, &c. is generally given expressly by their charters, and if it were not, would result as an incident to their creation. 10 Rep. 29, 30. My Lord Coke says, "When a corporation is duly created, all other incidents are tacite annexed;" among which he mentions the power to sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, grant and purchase, and many others.

But it is said, that Banks are the depositories of the property of the subscribers, for whom the officers are mere trustees: that the rights of widows, orphans and infants are committed to them; and the law could never intend, that these interests should be sacrificed by their mismanagement or dishonesty. I cannot agree to this position. In the very nature of things, all who commit their interests to the keeping and management of others, must depend, for gain or loss, on the skill and fidelity of the fiduciary. Suppose the officers lose money by bad debts. Suppose they embezzle it. Must not the stockholders suffer? And why not, if they make a contract violating the usury law, and thereby create a bad debt? This is no greater loss than if the same money were lent to an insolvent man. The doctrine would extend to all trustees of every description, (a thing never thought of,) or you must say that this is a privilege peculiar to Banks.

But, it is said, secondly, that this Bank is placed above the law of usury by its own law, which permits it to take one half of one per cent. for every 30 days. The words of the law are, "neither shall the said corporation take more than the rate of one half of one per centum for 30 days, for or on account of its loans or discounts." It is contended, that this is a total repeal of the usury law, so far as relates to the Bank; and that though they take 20 per cent. a month, no consequence can result from it, but the loss of their charter under their own law. I take it very differently. The power given to the Bank to take one 143 half of one per cent. for 30 days, I consider a particular *privilege, which, while they keep within it, protects them from the action of the usury law, but no longer. The moment they exceed the privilege, the shield is gone, and the general law operates. I can have no idea that a total repeal of the usury law was intended. Surely, if it had, there would have been something in the Bank law more clearly expressing it. There is certainly no express repeal. "Implied repeals, we know, are not favoured in law. There must be absolute repugnancy to effect it. If the laws can be made to stand together; especially if there be different functions for the laws, the one a general, the other a particular purpose; the latter will never be construed to repeal the former. For this doctrine, many cases might be cited. I shall only refer to Warder v. Arrell, 2 Wash. 282." I believe the only intention of the Act, was to make that law, which was known to be the practice. In Banking operations, it is much the most convenient and ready to take the year to consist of 360 days; and this had become a general practice in all Banks, (attended with very mischievous consequences to many of them, as we see by the New York cases.) Our Legislature meant to give this Bank the benefit of this practice, without subjecting it to the charge of usury.

I am clear, therefore, that corporations, generally, are within the usury law; and that this Bank is not, by its charter exempted, further than the privilege of taking one half of one per cent. for 30 days, extends.

Let us now consider the demurrers and plea; and as they are both placed on the same ground, it will only be necessary to consider one. We will take the plea. The contract stated by it, is an agreement to discount the notes for eighteen months, renewable for every sixty days, deducting in advance the discount of one half per cent. for 30 days, at every renewal, and paying in part discount 100 shares at $10,000; and it is averred that the discount and interest contracted to be paid, and actually paid, at the renewals, exceeded six per cent.

144 contrary to the Act of Assembly, *&c. The whole charge here is, that the taking interest in advance amounted to more than six per cent. and constituted usury.

Upon two grounds, I think this plea bad, and the demurrer properly sustained. 1st. It is perfectly settled by the cases, that in commercial and banking transactions, it is not usury to take interest in advance on discounts or loans. This is very clearly laid down in Fleckner v. United States' Bank, 8 Wheat. 338. The Judge says, "The next point in the record, is, whether the discount taken in this case was usurious. It is not pretended that interest was deducted for a greater length of time than the note had to run, or for more than at the rate of 6 per cent. on the sum due by the note. The sole objection is the deduction of the interest from the amount of the note, at the time it was discounted; and this, it is said, gives the Bank at the rate of more than 6 per cent. upon the sum actually carried to the credit of the P. Bank. If a transaction of this sort is to be deemed usurious, the same principle must apply with equal force to Bank discounts generally; for, the practice is believed to be universal; and probably few, if any charters, contain an express provision authorising, in terms, the deduction of the interest in advance, upon making loans or discounts. It has always been supposed, that an authority to discount, or make discounts, did from the very force of the terms, necessarily include an authority to take the interest in advance. And this is not only the settled opinion among commercial and professional men, but stands approved by the soundest principles of legal construction. Indeed, we do not know in what other sense the word discount is to be interpreted. Even in England, where so statute authorises bankers to make discounts, it has been solemnly adjudged, that the taking of interest in advance by bankers, upon loans in the ordinary course of business, is not usurious." It is useless to make further quotations or remarks on this subject. It is a settled point.

145 *In the second place, the plea concludes, that the taking the interest in advance, amounts to more than 6 per cent. contrary to the Act, &c., meaning the general usury law. Now we know that by the charter, the Bank has a right to take more than 6 per cent. per annum, to wit, one half of one per cent. for thirty days.

Upon these grounds, I think that the demurrer to the declaration was properly overruled, and that to the plea properly sustained.

We come now, to the exceptions taken in the course of the trial, to the opinions of the Court. The first need not be examined. It was an exception taken by the plaintiff, in whose favor the final judgment was.

The second was a motion by the defendant, setting out the whole evidence, and moving the Court to instruct the jury, that if they believed certain facts, they must find for the defendant. The Court refused the instruction, either on the ground that the question, whether the facts amounted to usury, belonged exclusively to the jury; or that the facts, as stated, did not amount to usury, and therefore did not justify a verdict for the defendant. Upon either hypothesis, I think the Court was wrong. As to the first, many cases may be cited to prove, that the facts being agreed or found, it is for the Court to decide whether in law, they amount to usury. If this were not so, no special verdict would be sufficient, unless it found the usury expressly. But, in Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call, 54, it is decided, that though the corrupt agreement be not expressed in the verdict, yet if it is apparent to the Court that the matter is usury, it is not necessary for the jury to shew that it was corruptly made; and Tremaine v. Roberts, Cro. Jac. 508, is cited, where it is said res ipsa loquitur.

In Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pull. 158, a special case was found, in which, after stating the facts, the jury find expressly that Marsh did not think he was acting contrary to law. In delivering the opinion of the Court, Lord Alvanley says,

"We must consider what was the real transaction *between the parties. I told the jury that if a man agree to take more than 5 per cent. for the forbearance of money, the law declares that such agreement is corrupt, within the statute of Ann, whether the party thought, at the time, that he was acting contrary to the statute, or not. And though the jury have found that Marsh did not think he was acting contrary to law, there is nothing in that finding to prevent us from examining the transaction, and declaring it to be corrupt, if it appear to us to be so in point of law, without sending the case back to a jury to find the corruption." It is every day's practice for the Court, upon a hypothetical statement of the facts, to tell the jury that the contract was usurious. Thus in Pratt v. Willey, 1 Esp. Rep. 40, the Court, assuming the fact, pronounce the law. In Rich v. Topping, 1 Esp. Rep. 176, the doubt was about the fact; the law was pronounced. In Doe v. Bernard, 1 Esp. 11, Lord Kenyon said, it was clearly usury, and non-suited the plaintiff. In Boldero v. Jackson, 11 East, 612, the Court held the contract usurious upon the facts. In Davis v. Hardacre, 2 Camp. 375, where a picture was taken in part, Lord Ellenborough held this prima facie evidence of usury, and held the plaintiff to prove the value, and on failure non-suited him. In Jones v. Davidson, 3 Common Law Reports, 92, Gibbs pronounced the law upon the facts.

Suppose the facts (upon the hypothesis of the truth of which, the motion was made) had been found here by a special verdict; would not the Court have had to pronounce upon them? And if upon such finding, they would have considered them to amount in law to usury, they ought, on the motion of the defendant, to have told the jury that if they believed those facts, it amounted to usury.

But did the facts amount to usury? I think so clearly. Disguise it as you will, Stribbling's was, in effect, an application for a loan. His object was to raise money, and that clearly disclosed to the Bank. He wanted $10,000, and his proposition says so expressly. "I offer my brothers

147 *for $2,000, &c., which, together with the stock, is to make the $10,000 I am to receive." How did the Bank understand it? The Cashier says, "I am instructed by the Board to inform you, that they will discount for you two notes, one for $10,000, the other for $2,500, &c. In payment for which discount, you will receive one hundred shares of stock of the Bank, &c., at $10,000. The balance in money." Now it is in clear proof, that the current market price of stock was $80; and the Bank, knowing this, knew that by letting Stribbling have the one hundred shares and $2,000 in money, he could not raise the sum he wanted, because the Banks would not receive the stock in deposit at its full price. They therefore offer him a loan in money of $2,500; which, depositing the stock at $75, would exactly make the sum he wanted. Nothing can be clearer to my mind, than that the sale of the stock and the loan are indissolubly linked together, making one transaction; and the object being to raise money, and the stock passed above its market price, that it was an usurious contract, and that the Court ought so to have told the jury.

I think also, that the Court erred in refusing to grant a new trial. It was a verdict against law and evidence.

My opinion is, that the judgment be reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial, with directions to the Court, that if the same evidence be introduced, and the same instruction asked which was asked in the first part of the second bill of exceptions, that the Court shall give it.

JUDGE GREEN.

The defence to this action is usury, and the appellees insist that no corporation comes within the terms or spirit of the Act against usury; and especially that a banking corporation does not. To this the appellant's counsel replies, that so far as the case depends upon the demurrers to the declaration and the 4th plea, the Act 148 of Assembly "incorporating the Bank, although given in evidence upon the trial of the issues, and made part of the record by an exception, not being set forth in the declaration or 4th plea, cannot be noticed by the Court, it being a private Act and not a general statute; and that therefore it does not appear upon the record; nor can the Court know judicially that the "Bank of the Valley in Virginia" is a corporation. If it were admitted that the Act incorporating the Bank of the Valley in Virginia, so far as it relates to the details of its organization, its privileges, and the restrictions imposed upon it, is a private Act, which the Court cannot take notice of ex officio; yet, there is a provision in it, which is general, and which the Court is bound to take notice of ex officio, since it affects the whole community; that provision which declares that all notes or bills negotiable at this Bank, shall be put upon the footing of foreign bills of exchange; and this suit is brought upon such a note. We therefore know judicially, that the "Bank of the Valley in Virginia," is a corporation; and the right to contract and to sue, subject to the general laws affecting the contracts of individuals, is incident to a corporation, unless those rights are in any way modified by the charter of incorporation.

It is said, that the Statute of Usury does not apply to any corporation, because it is a penal statute, and cannot properly be extended, by any equitable construction, beyond its letter; and that a corporation not being a person, does not come within the literal terms of the statute. The terms of the statute are, "No person shall, upon any contract, take directly or indirectly, for loan of any money, wares or merchandise, or other commodity, above the value of six dollars, for the forbearance of $100 for a year, and after that rate for a greater or lesser sum, or for a longer or shorter time. And all bonds, contracts, covenants, conveyances or assurances, to be made for payment or delivery of any money or goods so to be lent, on which a higher interest is reserved or taken than is hereby allowed, *shall be utterly void." The second section imposes a penalty upon any person's taking usurious interest, if it be corruptly taken, but not otherwise. If there had been nothing in the statute but the first clause of the first section, and the second section, the consequence would have been, that if any person had contracted for usurious interest, and had not received it, the borrower could have resisted the payment of the excess of interest above the legal rate, but not of the principal and legal interest, and if the lender had received the usurious interest, whether corruptly or not. The borrower could have recovered back the excess, beyond the principal and legal interest, in an action for money had and received. If it had been received corruptly, then the lender would have been moreover liable to the penalty imposed by the second section. But, if the usurious interest was received ignorantly and innocently, (as might happen,) the party would not be liable to the penalty; as, if an agent should make an usurious contract in the name of his principal, and the latter were to receive the usurious interest, without knowing that the contract was usurious. Whether a corporation would come within the term person, used in the first clause of the first section, and in the second section, it is unnecessary to decide; since the contract, if usurious, is avoided by the second clause of the first section, which extends to all contracts, no matter by whom made, upon which more than legal interest is reserved or taken.

It is argued, that if corporations come within the letter of the statute, they are not within the reason or policy of the laws against usury; since widows, orphans, foreigners and others, who have no agency in the management of their transactions, have their funds invested in corporations; the forfeiture of which by usury, practised by the directors, would inflict upon innocent persons a loss, which the policy of the law inflicts as a punishment for an offence; and that this reasoning applies particularly to banking corporations, especially those in which the public have an interest.

150 *The chief, if not sole object of the institution of Banks, was, to increase the prosperity of the community, by facilitating the borrowing of money at the rate of interest fixed by the charters; and to affect this, and to induce those who had money to lend it, through the agency of the Banks, these corporations were allowed the privilege of lending their notes instead of money, to a much larger amount than that of the money invested in the stock, besides many other privileges which individuals have not. The forfeiture, by the Statute of Usury, of the money lent, is not imposed upon the lender, as a punishment of an offence, so much as for the purpose of protecting the necessitous from oppression. This was the only real object of that provision of the law; and the loss to the lender, only the incidental effect of that policy. To allow a Bank, therefore, to take usurious interest, would not only frustrate the policy of the law against usury, but the objects of their own institution, and tend to the utter ruin, instead of promoting the interests, of the community. If this argument were well founded, it would apply with equal propriety to the exemption of all trustees acting for others, from the operation of the law against usury. The interest of the State as a stockholder, can have no influence upon this question, especially as to this Bank. The stock reserved to the State as a bonus, may be disposed of at her pleasure, by the express provisions of the statute; and in that case, her right to appoint a portion of the directors would cease. Corporations are, in their nature, bound as individuals are, by the general laws regulating contracts, except so far as they may be exempted from their operation by specific statutory provisions.

This exemption from the operation of the statute against usury, is accordingly claimed on behalf of the Bank of the Valley, by force of that provision of the charter, which provides, "neither shall the said corporation take more than the rate of one half of one per cent. for thirty days, for or on account of its loans or 151 counts;" a provision *which, it was admitted on the other side, allows them impliedly to take at that rate, which exceeds the legal interest of six per centum per annum; and it is argued, that this permission to take more than legal interest, exempts the contracts of the Bank from the operation of the statute against usury, even if they take more interest or discount than is allowed by their charter.

This privilege to take more than legal interest, is not unlimited, but is restricted to a given rate of discount or interest. But for this, a contract reserving to the Bank more than six per cent. interest, would be void for usury, the statute applying to all possible contracts. The charter of the Bank does not repeal the statute against usury expressly, and the repeal of statutes by implication is not favoured. If, by any reasonable construction, both statutes can have effect, such construction is given to them; and where they are inconsistent with each other, in some degree, the latter repeals the former, to the extent of such inconsistency, and no further. This is the rule laid down in the strongest terms, in many cases cited in 19 Vin. Abr. tit. Statutes, 520, pl. 84, 85, 86; 1b. page 525, pl. 131, 132; 11 Co. Rep. 64, Foster's Case; 10 Mod. 118; and this rule of construction has been approved by this Court in Warder v. Arrell, 2 Wash. 282. When, therefore, the Statute of Usury avoids all contracts, upon which an interest higher than the rate of six per cent. per annum is reserved, and another statute allows, in a particular case, one half of one per cent. for every thirty days, to be reserved, the latter repeals the former only in cases in which no more than one half of one per cent. for every thirty days is reserved. A reservation of interest at a greater rate than this, is not sanctioned by the latter statute, and brings the case within the former. The Bank no longer acts within its privilege, and the contract must be tested by the general laws.

It is contended that the contract stated in the declaration is, upon its face, usurious; since it is a contract of 152 *loan, and not a discount of negotiable paper; and that to retain the interest or discount in advance in such a case, is usury. I do not think this question arises upon the declaration. It is not stated, at what rate the discount or interest retained, was estimated; and the fair meaning of the declaration is, that so much only was retained as they had a legal right to retain.

The fourth plea presents a serious question, whether that part of the charter of the Bank, which prohibits their taking more than at the rate of one half of one per cent. for 30 days, is a general law, which the Court are bound to take notice of, or not. If not, then as the Court cannot take notice of this privilege, the contract reserving the discounts or interest at the rate of one half of one per cent. for 30 days, was clearly usurious upon its face.

The cases cited in the argument shew, that a statute may be general as to some of its provisions, and private as to others. This privilege to the Bank, to take more within a certain limit than the interest prescribed by the general laws, is particular and private in its nature, made for the benefit of that particular corporation, and which does not concern the public generally, or any class of the community. If the whole of the residue of the Act was a general law, (as many parts of it are,) this particular provision would, from its nature, be private, and could not be noticed ex officio by the Court. This seems to me to be the common law doctrine. The Statute of 3 Jac. 1, concerning Popish recusants, is, in all its provisions but one, a general law. It disables them to present to any benefice or ecclesiastical living, &c., although they would, but for the disability imposed by the statute, be entitled to present; and the statute gave the right to present in such cases, to the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars, of the University of Oxford; and this donative clause was held to be a private law, which the Court could not notice ex officio. 10 Co. Rep. 57; The case of the Chancellor of Oxford, Hob. 227; Bull. N. P. 223.

153 *This case falls clearly within the distinctions laid down in Holland's Case, 4 Co. Rep. 76, 77. The clause in question is therefore private, unless any statutory provisions shall have either made it a general law, or given it the same effect. There are two statutes which may be supposed to have that effect. The Act of March 12, 1819, providing for the re-publication of the laws, directs the Act incorporating this Bank, with very many others particularly specified, (most of which are undoubtedly general laws,) to be published in the edition of the laws directed by that Act, without designating any of them as general or private Acts. It directs also, all Acts of a general nature passed at the then present and last sessions of the Assembly, and all Acts of a general nature then in force, not noticed in the report of the revisors, and the titles and dates of all private, local and temporary Acts, passed between particular periods, to be published in that edition; and provides, that the laws published in that edition, "shall be received in evidence, in the same manner as the originals." Do these provisions of the Act of 1819, make those Acts published in that edition of the laws, which would otherwise have been private Acts, general or public Acts? I think not. The only purpose of this Act, in relation to the private Acts directed to be published, was, to authorise the printed copy to be given in evidence, without the necessity of producing the originals, or exemplified or sworn copies; and to these private Acts only, is the direction applicable, that they shall be received in evidence as the originals. As to the general laws, no such provision was necessary; nor, as to them, can it have any effect. There are many Acts published in this edition of the laws, by express directions of the Act of 1819, which, although the greater part of their provisions are general, yet some of them are most emphatically private; as chap. 260, the Act concerning the trustees of all the unincorporated towns in Virginia, in which there is a special provision for a new survey and plat of the town of Suffolk, for ad- 154 justing *the boundaries of the streets and lots, the original being lost by fire. The publication of a private Act with the general laws, cannot charge its nature or effect. If it could, then certainly a clause in a public Act published entire must be considered as public or general also; and in that case, the clause of the statute of 3 Jac. 1, giving presentations forfeited by Popish recusants to the University of Oxford, ought to have been noticed by the Court ex officio; it being published with the residue of the statute, which was general. Even at common law, the copy of private statute which concerns a whole country, as the Bedford Levels, printed with the general statutes, might be given in evidence, without comparing it with the record. Bull. N. P. 225. But, this gave it no new character as a general or private law, but only varied the proof necessary to establish its authenticity. And it was for the purpose of allowing the private Acts published in our last Code, to be given in evidence without producing the originals, that the Legislature directed them to be so published, instead of leaving it to the Courts to say in each case, whether the printed copies should be admitted in evidence, in lieu of the originals; and not for the purpose of converting Acts in their nature particular and private, into general and public Acts.

The other statute which may be supposed to affect this question, is that which provides that "Private Acts of Assembly may be given in evidence, without pleading them specially." At the common law, private Acts of Parliament must have been pleaded, or might have been given in evidence, according to the circumstances of the case, precisely as any other muniment of title. Buller's Nisi Prius, page 222. The necessity of pleading such an Act in particular cases, proceeded, not from its character as a private Act only, but from that combined with the nature of the right claimed under it, and of the pleadings of the other party. I cannot think that this provision was intended to change entirely the nature of a private "Act of Assembly, and make it the duty of the Court to notice it, whether given in evidence or not; and to change the laws of pleading, in favor of persons claiming under private Acts, by dispensing with the pleadings which the nature of the case requires. This provision of our statute, seems to be merely declaratory of the common law; and that seems to have been the opinion of this Court in Legrand v. Hampden Sidney College, 5 Munf. 324. The charter of the Bank was properly given in evidence upon the trial of the issues of fact, and is properly in the record for the purpose of deciding the questions which arose upon the trial of those issues. But the matter of, and proceedings upon, one plea, cannot be called in aid of the matter of, and proceedings upon, another plea; and we must decide upon the demurrer to the 4th plea, as if there was nothing in the record, but the declaration, that plea, and the demurrer to it. That demurrer should have been overruled.

Upon the trial of the issues, the Court, upon the motion of the defendant, instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence, that the Bank of the Valley in Virginia on or about the 14th of February, 1821, loaned to E. Stribbling $2,500, or thereabouts, for eighteen months, but made it a condition precedent to the granting of the said loan, that he should buy of the Bank one hundred shares of its stock, at the price of $10,000, giving his note negotiable, with other sufficient drawers and endorsers for that sum, the note to be renewed for eighteen months, and the said Erasmus complied with the conditions; and that the price of $10,000 thus demanded and agreed to be given for the one hundred shares of stock, on the terms of payment prescribed and agreed to, was palpably and obviously an over price for the said stock, having reference to the then selling price in the market; and that the defendant was influenced in agreeing to give the over price demanded, by the offer of the said loan of $2,500 or thereabouts; and that the purchase at such over price operated 156 "as an inducement to the Bank to make the accommodation discount which it did make, and that the negotiable note in the declaration mentioned, was given in consideration of the said transaction; then, they ought to find for the defendant.

The Court further instructed the jury, that if they should be of opinion that it was not made a condition of the loan of $2,500 or thereabouts, that the said defendant should buy the said one hundred shares of stock at such over price, or that the said loan was independent of the said purchase of stock, or that the purchase of the said stock was the principal object of the defendant, and that being accomplished, the Bank afterwards agreed to lend the said $2,500, or thereabouts; then such loan was not usury. To the first part of this instruction, the plaintiff excepted.

The defendant also moved the Court to instruct the jury, that if they believed that he had written and sent to the President of the Bank his letter of the 12th of February, 1821, on or about that day, and had submitted to the President and Directors of the Bank his written propositions of February 13th, 1821, and that the Cashier had given to those propositions the answer aforesaid, acting under the instructions of the said Board of Directors, and that this was the only answer by the plaintiffs to his propositions communicated to him; and that a contract was made between the plaintiffs and defendant, just before or on the 14th of February, 1821, in conformity with the terms of the Cashier's letter, and that the account exhibited was regularly entered in the books of the Bank; and that of the sum of $12,377 08 cents, entered in the said account as cash paid to him, $10,000 consisted of one hundred shares of the stock of the Bank, at par; and that the contract was executed, continued and extended, as stated in the first special plea; and that the one hundred shares of stock, on the 14th day of February, 1821, were worth, at the market price in cash, not more than $9,000, and that fact known to the directors; and that the note sued 157 on was "given in consideration of the original note of $10,000; then they ought to find for the defendant; which the Court refused to give, and the defendant excepted.

The defendant also moved the Court to instruct the jury, that if the sale of the one hundred shares of stock was unconnected with the loan of $2,500; yet, being a sale on eighteen months credit, the reservation of interest or discounts at the rate of one half of one per cent. for thirty days, as had been agreed to be done and actually done, was usurious; which instruction the Court also refused to give, and the defendant excepted.

The defendant also moved for a new trial, which the Court refused; and he excepted to that also.

The counsel for the appellees objects to the form of the instruction, as moved by the defendant, because he alleges that it excluded from the consideration of the jury, the order entered on the minutes of the Board of Directors on the 13th of February, 1821. I do not think it had that effect. The motion was founded upon the condition, that if the jury should believe from the evidence, that the contract was concluded in conformity with the letter of the Cashier; and in considering that question of fact, nothing in the motion to instruct prevented the jury from considering the effect of the order of the Directors upon that question.

It is also objected, that the motion confined the enquiry as to the market value of the stock, to the 14th day of February, 1821; whereas the contract was probably made on the 13th day of February; and this is well founded. The motion ought to have confined the enquiry as to the value of the stock, to the time of the contract; leaving it to the jury to ascertain that time; and if, in other respects, the instruction asked for was proper, it should have been given with that modification.

If the facts, upon the supposition of the truth of which (to be determined by the jury) as recapitulated by the defendant, were really as supposed; then it was 158 clear beyond *a doubt, that the contract for the sale of the stock and the loan of money, was one entire contract, indissolubly connected, and that the inducement to the Bank to lend the money was the advantage of a sale of the stock at greatly more than its real value; and the inducement to Stribbling to give an exorbitant price for the stock, was the loan of the money; and that the contract was a shift to evade the Statute of Usury.

It is obvious, from comparing the opinions of the Court upon the first and second motion to instruct, that it was of opinion, that however manifest the intent of the parties in making this contract, and the motives which influenced them mutually to make it, might be in fact; yet that that intent, and those motives, were an inference of fact from the other facts of the transaction, and that the jury alone were competent to make it. And the real question upon the second exception is, whether the intent and motive of the parties to the contract is a question of law or of fact.

The intent, the quo animo, to be deduced from the acts of the party, is, in many cases, an inference and question of law, and not of fact; and this in criminal, as well as in civil cases. Although an inference of law, yet when it is involved in an issue of fact to be tried by a jury, the jury must of necessity judge of, and decide upon it; and in criminal cases, their decision is conclusive, and cannot be controlled, since in such a case no new trial can be awarded on the ground that the verdict has been contrary to the evidence or to the law. But, in civil cases, the error of the jury, as to the inference of law from the facts, may be corrected by awarding a new trial. If the intent of the party, to be inferred from the facts of the transaction, was a question of fact, it could only be decided by the jury; and it would not be competent to the Court to instruct them that the inference ought or ought not to be made. There is nothing better settled with us, than that the Court cannot properly influence the judgment of the jury as to any matter of fact, by giving their opinion upon it; and 159 that to do *so, is erroneous. Yet in criminal, as well as in civil cases, the Court is at liberty to instruct the jury as to the intent, legally to be inferred from the facts alleged, in case the jury should be of opinion, that the facts are proved. Again; if the intent to be inferred from the facts, was a question of fact, and not of law, then, upon a special verdict finding the facts, no judgment could be given, in cases where the decision of the cause depended upon the intent, unless that intent was expressly found by the jury. For, it is an inflexible rule, that the Court, upon a special verdict, cannot infer other facts from those found. Yet, in criminal and civil cases, when the intent is important to the decision of the case, the Court infer it from the facts found in a special verdict, although the intent be not found. Cases, however, may and do frequently occur, in which the question of intent depends upon the weight of conflicting circumstances, which it is proper to leave to the decision of the jury. Again; if intent was an inference of fact, and not of law, no case of usury could occur, in which it could be decided upon a demurrer to the pleadings, that a contract under the form of a contract of hazard or sale, was a shift to evade the Statute of Usury. If, to a plea of usury, in the case of a contract upon its face one of hazard, there be a demurrer, it has never been suggested that the demurrer admitted the truth of the allegation in the plea, that the contract was a corrupt loan. If the demurrer was an admission of the truth of that allegation, then all such cases, without exception, must have been decided against the demurrer, upon that ground only, without looking further. If the demurrer is not an admission of the corrupt intent alleged in the plea, and that was an inference of fact from the facts alleged in the plea; then, as the Court can make no inference of facts from facts found or admitted, the demurrer in all such cases should be overruled. Yet demurrers in such cases have been sustained and overruled, according to the legal inference of intent made by the Court, from the facts admitted by the pleadings.

160 *In all criminal cases, it is the intent, and not the act, which constitutes the crime. Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. This criminal intent is an inference of law, upon which the Court may instruct the jury, as upon any other question of law, or may decide upon a special verdict not finding the intent. Thus, in The King v. —, 2 Ld. Raym. 1494, it is laid down, that "on the trial the Judge directs the jury thus; if you believe such and such witnesses, who have sworn to such and such facts, the killing of the deceased appears to be with malice pre-pense; but, if you do not believe them, then you ought to find him guilty of manslaughter, and the jury may, if they think proper, give a general verdict of murder or manslaughter; but, if they decline giving a general verdict, and will find the facts specially, the Court is then to form their judgment from the facts found, whether the defendant be guilty or not guilty, i. e. whether the act was done with malice and deliberation or not."

In civil cases, especially on questions of usury, the intent of the parties has been held to be a question of law, by a series of unquestioned decisions. In Reynolds v. Clayton, 2 And. 15; Mo. 397, 560, 70; Batton v. Dunham, Cro. Eliz. 642; 2 And. 121; Mason v. Abdy, 3 Salk. 390; Comb.

125; Carthew, 67, it was held, upon general demurrers, that contracts, which, upon their face, were contracts of hazard, and in which there was a real hazard, were in truth contracts of loan and intended to evade the Statute of Usury, because of the slightness of the hazard. In the case of Roberts v. Tremaine, Cro. Jac. 507, the same doctrine was held upon a special verdict finding the facts of the contract only, without any finding as to the intent of the parties. And in Chesterfield v. Jansen, Sir John Strange approves of the doctrine of these cases, and says, that if a contract of loan is put into the shape of a contract of hazard to evade the Statute, it is usury, and may be determined by the verdict of a jury, or by the Court's exercising 161 its judgment on *the facts; as, he says, has often been done. In the case of Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call, 62, and Marsh v. Martindale, the contracts purported on their faces, to be purchases, in the first case of bonds, and in the second, of an annuity. The Court, in each case, held them to be contracts for the forbearance of debts, and shifts to evade the Statute of Usury; in the first case, upon a special verdict, which did not find any thing as to the intent of the parties; and in the second, upon a case agreed, connected with a verdict of a jury, although the case agreed did not admit any thing as to the intent of the parties, and the jury declared, in their verdict, their opinion, that "the party did not think he was acting contrary to law." In Benton's Case, 5 Co. 69, a demurrer to a plea of a corrupt agreement against the Statute of Usury was sustained.

It is argued, that the question of usury depended, in this case, upon the questions whether the transactions in respect to the stock, was a contract for a sale, or a colour for a loan; and that this was a question of fact for the jury, and upon which it was not competent to the Court to instruct the jury; and several cases are cited to prove that proposition. I do not think that the enquiry, whether the transaction in respect to the stock was a sale or a colour for a loan, is at all material to the merits of this case. I have, however, looked into the cases cited by the counsel for the appellants, and do not think that they support the proposition for which they were cited. The note of the reporter to the case of Davison v. Jones, 3 Com. Law Rep. 97, in which he states that the question whether the contract is in substance a loan or any other species of contract, belongs to the decision of the jury, if he means by that, exclusively, is contradicted by the case of Chesterfield v. Jansen, which is the only case which he cites. In the cases of Doe v. Brown, 3 Com. Law Rep. 109, and Doe v. Gooch, 5 Com. Law Rep. 417, the only effect of the decisions, was, that a sale of land, with an agreement to repurchase at a higher price at a future time, was not usurious on that account 162 *merely. There being other circumstances which led to a suspicion in both of these cases, that these transactions were a cover for a loan, it was left to the jury, who found in one case that it was a sale, and in the other, a loan. If, in these cases, there had been a positive agreement to re-pay the money at all events, and a collateral security for the payment, they would have been clearly disguised loans, and so the Court would have said as a matter of law. King v. Drury, 2 Lev. 7; Benton's Case, 5 Co. Rep. 69.

The question in this case, whether the transaction in respect to the stock was a sale or a loan, was of no consequence, and was not raised. The ground of the defendant's motion for the instruction, was, that it was a sale at an advance of twenty-five per cent. connected with a loan of money; and if so, (as was the fact, if the jury believed that the contract was according to the terms of the Cashier's letter,) it was clearly usurious. For in that case, the contract being entire, both for the sale and the loan, all on the one side was the consideration of all on the other, the loan the inducement to Stribbling to buy, and the sale the inducement to the Bank to lend. I think, therefore, that the refusal to give the instruction asked for, was erroneous.

I think, also, that the Court erred in refusing a new trial. The evidence is complete, and leaves no scruple on my mind in saying, that the loan and sale were indissolubly connected, and formed one entire contract. The original proposition of Stribbling, was to purchase stock, and to borrow money: and he makes the loan an indispensable condition of the purchase; and in that he discloses plainly and unreservedly that his object was to raise $10,000; $8,000 by pledging the stock, and $2,000 by a loan. To effect this, and to have the use of the $10,000 for eighteen months, paying interest, he at once offers a premium in the price of the stock, of 25 per cent. This proposition, the Bank accepted in substance. The modifications which they proposed, and Stribbling agreed 163 to, do not vary substantially *from his terms, and the motives for proposing them are obvious. Instead of four several notes, proposed by Stribbling as a security for the sale and loan, drawn and endorsed by him, and his different friends named by him, (which was intended, as he said, to avoid the violating a rule of the Bank, not to allow any one person to stand on their books as payer, for more than 5,000,) the effect of which would have been, to bind his friends severally for portions of the debt only; the Bank, for the sake of having all of his friends bound for the whole, proposed to discount two notes of the same persons for $12,500; thus violating, to a great extent, one of their own rules. Instead of lending $2,000, and discounting $8,000, on the one hundred shares of stock, as he proposed, they being unwilling to discount on the stock to its full value, and at the same time intending to enable him to raise the $10,000, (which was the condition on which alone he was willing to purchase the stock at such a sacrifice,) offered him a loan of $2,500; $500 more than he asked for. This was to make up the $10,000, and an inducement to him to make the sacrifice in the purchase of the stock; and he accordingly, the very next day, got at another Bank a di of $7,500, on the pledge of the stock. This loan of $2,500, was made for eighteen months, directly against the prohibition of one of the clauses of their charter, which interdicts their making any loan for more than one hundred and twenty days. It is impossible that any motive could have induced them so flagrantly to violate the rules and charter of the Bank, but the advantage of selling, by that means, the one hundred shares of stock, at twenty-five per cent. above its real value. The letter of the Cashier, and the order of the directors on their minutes, state, in substance, the same terms; and if the order had been delivered to Stribbling, instead of the letter, as the answer to his proposition, he must have understood it, as he could not help understanding the letter, that he could not have the loan of the money, unless he bought the stock. Considered as an 164 answer *to his proposition, it could not bear any other construction; or, if the order was made, as it imports, after the contract was concluded, then it was no evidence of the contract, and the Cashier's letter remains as the only evidence of the true contract of the parties. So that, if they really differed in their terms, the contract could not be varied by the order.

The obligation imposed upon the Bank by the charter, to sell out any stock of their own corporation, which they might have purchased, whenever they could get par, can certainly have no influence on any question in this cause. They were at liberty to sell under par, and they were bound to sell if any one had offered par simply; and they might have sold at any time, on a credit of eighteen months, with interest from the time of the sale, if the transaction was wholly unconnected with a loan. But, the charter neither imposed upon them the obligation to avail themselves of the necessities of another, and by the temptation of a loan of money connected with the sale of stock, induce him to give a price which he would not otherwise have given, and thus to practise usury; nor does it in any way sanction such a transaction. The Bank could not have been prosecuted for a violation of their charter, if they had refused to sell to Stribbling upon the terms they did. Their answer would have been conclusive. "We could not sell the stock at par, without giving a loan of $2,500 in the bargain, and that for eighteen months, which would have been a violation of the charter, and subjected the directors themselves individually, to the payment of the whole amount at the expiration of one hundred and twenty days." Nor has the provision of the charter, obliging the borrower, upon a loan on a credit of more than one hundred and twenty days, to pay at the expiration of that time, any effect on any question in the cause. This only applies to a valid contract, which bound him when made; and was not intended to subject him to the payment of a debt, which was never due, upon a contract void in its inception.

165 *There are two other points insisted on by the counsel of the appellant; one, that as the 4th plea alleges that there was a corrupt agreement, that the Bank should discount two notes for the defendant to the amount of $12,500, which were to be renewed and continued for eighteen months, and the discount to be paid in advance every sixty days, at the rate of one half of one per cent. for every thirty days, and that the defendant was to take in satisfaction of $10,000 of the loan, one hundred shares of Bank stock, the contract is usurious on its face, unless it had been shewn that the stock was worth $10,000; upon the ground that the only motive on the part of the Bank for paying a large part of the discount in stock, was to get a higher price for it than it was worth; and the case of Davis v. Hardacre, is cited to support the proposition. I do not think that the proposition can be maintained as a general one. It seems to have been adopted in that case as a rule of evidence, and not as a rule of law; not upon the ground simply, that a sale of property was connected with a loan of money, but that the sale was forced upon the borrower as a condition of the loan. It does not follow from the mere fact of a sale and loan being connected, that it was not even the choice of the purchaser to buy as well as to borrow, and that the purchase was at a fair price.

The other objection is, that the transaction being a loan for eighteen months, and not a discount, it was usury to take the discount for each sixty days in advance. I do not think that this objection is well founded. This privilege to take interest in advance, is confined to commercial paper, and is an indulgence to the customs of merchants. Whatever objections there may be to this, it is too well settled to be now questioned. A discount of a bill of exchange, known to be for the accommodation of the drawer, is virtually a loan, and not the purchase of the bill; yet, to retain the legal interest in that case, is not usury, on account of the form of the security; and if the original transaction is not objectionable, the repetition of it, no matter 166 how *often, by previous agreement, is not. The transaction in this case, was a contract of loan upon the security of commercial paper, and this was an integral part of the contract. The same objection applies to the transaction, as it appeared upon the trial of the issues. The only effect of the provision in the charter, allowing the Bank to take at the rate of one half of one per cent. for thirty days, was, to vary the rate of discount and interest, leaving them to take discount and interest at that rate only, in the manner others might take discount and interest, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. Upon loans in the shape of discounts of negotiable paper, they could only take the interest in advance, in cases in which others might take it; and if others could not take it in advance, for 120 days or more, neither could the Bank. If the notes had been payable at the expiration of eighteen months, and the discount for the whole time had been retained, I should think clearly that it was usury.

There seems to me to be an objection to the declaration not noticed by the counsel for the appellant. It does not state that the last endorser, George W. Kigar, by his endorsement, ordered the money to be paid to the plaintiffs, or assigned, transferred or endorsed the note to them. The fact that the legal title was transferred to them, is left to be inferred from the recital, that Kigar endorsed it with his own name and hand, with intent to procure the discounting of it at the Bank, and by a note at the foot of the negotiable note, signed by him, ordered the drawer to be credited with the amount, and that the note was offered to the President and Directors of the Bank, and the full amount, deducting discount, paid to the drawer, without saying by the Bank. Upon a general demurrer to the declaration, I do not think there is any sufficient averment, that the legal title to the note was transferred to the plaintiff.

The first important question to be considered in this case, arises on the pleadings, and mainly on the last plea of the statute against usury.

On the first of those pleas, an issue was joined to the country. The second was demurred to; but, on the Court intimating an opinion that it was defective, the defendant obtained leave to amend, and then offered his plea so amended, which was a virtual withdrawal of the second plea; so that no judgment was entered on the demurrer; but, the plea so amended, was received and ordered to be filed as a sufficient plea, and issue was also joined thereon to the country. The last plea, and the demurrer thereto, present the questions which have been stated by the Judges who have preceded me.

On the part of the Bank it is contended, that though one half of one per cent. for thirty days is more than the rate of six per cent. per annum, yet by the Act of Assembly incorporating the Bank, they are permitted to take interest at that rate on their discounts and loans, and had also a right to take it in advance on the discount for every sixty days; and that if this be not so, yet the statute against usury does not apply to a corporation; and if it does to a private corporation generally, it does not apply to the Bank, as well from general reasons arising out of the Act of incorporation, as because that Act authorised them to take more than the rate prescribed by the statute against usury, without any provision making the contracts void, should they even exceed the rate thus allowed.

These positions are all controverted on the other side; and first, on this ground; that the Act of incorporation is a private Act, of which the Court cannot take judicial notice, so as to bring either of those questions within their cognizance.

Whether this is a private or public Act, is then the first question for consideration. My opinion is, that it is a 168 *public Act. The common law doctrine on this subject, I understand to be this; that Acts of Parliament either relate to the kingdom in general, and are called general Acts, or only to the concerns of private persons, and are thence called private. A general Act is taken notice of by the Judges and jury, without being shewn; but a particular Act is not noticed without being shewn, because it is said, that the Court cannot judge of particular laws which do not concern the whole kingdom, unless they be exhibited; for, they are obliged by their oaths to judge of all matters coming before them, according to the laws and constitution of England; and therefore, they cannot be obliged, ex officio, to notice a particular law, because it is not a law relating to the whole kingdom; and therefore, like all other private matters, it must be brought before them to judge thereon. Bull. N. P. 222. So it is said, of general Acts of Parliament, the printed statute book is evidence; not that the printed statutes are perfect and authentic copies of the records themselves, but every person is supposed to know the laws, and the printed statutes are allowed to be evidence, because they are hints of that which is supposed to be lodged in every man's mind already. Bull. N. P. 225. But of private Acts, the printed statute book is not evidence, though reduced into the same volume with the general statutes, but the party ought to have a copy compared with the Parliament roll; for they are not considered as already lodged in the minds of the people. However a private Act of Parliament in print, that concerns a whole country, as the Act of the Bedford Levels, for re-building Tiverton, &c., may be given in evidence, without comparing it with the record; and these things are the rather admitted, because they gain some authority from being printed by the King's printer; and besides, from the notoriety of the subject of them, they are supposed not to be wholly unknown. Hence, as I understand, if a statute is of so notorious a character, that a 169 knowledge of it may be presumed to exist in the minds of the people, it is to be considered, as standing on the footing of a public statute; for, it is said to be on that ground that those statutes are to be noticed.

How far these reasons for the decisions in England apply to this country, or whether any thing exists here which would induce this Court to relax from the ancient doctrines there, will be noticed hereafter; but it may be observed, that even in England, common sense has induced those Courts to relax from the strict rules formerly held, as will be seen in the case of Samuel v. Evans, 2 Term. Rep. 569.

In England, the general doctrines are these: 1. Whatever concerns the kingdom in general, is a general law; whatever concerns a particular species of men, is a particular law. 2. So the same law may be both general and particular in different parts; as 3 Jac. 1. against recusants in general, in disabling them to present; yet the clause giving their presentations to the Universities, is particular, and must be pleaded or found. 3. A law which concerns the King, or the public revenue, is a general law, because he is the head and union of the Commonwealth. So of an Act that comprehends all trades, because it relates to traffic in general. 4. So, if the matter of a law be ever so special, yet if it relates equally to all, it is a general law. Bull. N. P. 223; 6 Bac. Abr. tit. Statute,

F. 5. And if it be of a private nature, as if it concerns a particular trade, yet if a forfeiture be thereby given to the King, it is a public statute. 6. And if a private law be recognized by a public one, it must be noticed as a public law. Samuel v. Evans, 2 Term. Rep. 575.

The whole of our Banking institutions are of a similar nature; and if the law establishing the Northwestern Bank, and the Bank of the Valley, is a private law, so must be the laws establishing the Virginia and Farmers' Banks, and vice versa. These institutions, it seems to me, must be considered as public corporations, and very different from such as are brought into existence at the instance of particular individuals, who have, beforehand, associated for particular purposes. They were instituted by the Legislature, on the call of the people generally, for great public and State purposes, and to put this State, in a commercial point of view, on an equality, as to Bank accommodation, with the surrounding States; to increase the circulating medium beyond the metallic capital; to keep the funds of money-holders within the State, which otherwise might have gone to fill the vaults of other banking-houses, or have been converted to purposes of usury, unless retained and properly used, by an increase of the legal rate of interest. Their notes were, moreover, receivable in all payments to the Commonwealth; so that the collection of the revenue was made more easy and certain. The vaults of two of them are the secure depositories of the public treasure. They facilitated transportation of money, and kept down exchange; and although it may be, and perhaps is, questioned by some, whether all the expected advantages have not been more than outweighed by the bad effects of those institutions; yet no one can doubt that they have been called for by the people at large; and that they were considered essential to the State for the great purposes above. Hence the laws establishing them, are little short in importance, as it seems to me, of the power of coining money itself.

But these laws, on their first enactment and publication, seem to have a public and general character. They are addressed to monied capitalists, foreign and domestic. at the same time that care is taken to avoid any monopoly of the stock; so that all who chose might participate. The State herself, too, takes a large interest in all of them, and retains over all of them an almost overwhelming power of control; with a duty and power in the Legislature, at every session, to examine into the affairs of the Bank, in the faithful exercise of which, every man in the State who possesses a Bank note is interested. The rate of discounting and lending, was a subject, too, in which all those (no small 171 *portion of the community,) who might have occasion for Bank accommodation, were interested. In addition to all this, we find penalties imposed by each of those laws, recoverable either wholly or in part for the State, on directors dealing contrary to the charter, &c.; and finally, we find them recognized by laws confessedly public, as well in those punishing forgeries, larcenies and frauds, in officers and servants, as the laws enforcing the payment of specie for the deposit of the public monies, and in some of our execution laws, which had a temporary existence, soon after or during the last war, &c. In short, it seems to me, that almost every criterion of a public law, as distinguished from a private one, above noted, may be applied to these institutions.

If, however, there could be any doubt on this subject in England, I think there ought to be none here. The Act which permits private laws to be given in evidence without being pleaded, was surely intended to make some change or relaxation in the ancient doctrine; and, I am not prepared to say, that the counsel was wrong in supposing that the privilege thus granted was not confined to the case of giving them in evidence to the jury; but, that they could equally be shewn to the Court on an issue of law. I believe that this point was not fully if at all considered, in the case of Legrand v. Hampden Sidney College. The parties there agreed to receive the certificate of the Chancellor, that the Act was before him, and that he would certify it on a certiorari, if required. Here our printed statute book is as complete evidence of a private statute, I believe, as a copy compared with the Rolls; and it may be then, that this statute was intended to put public and private Acts on the same ground of authenticity and public notoriety; and if so, I see no reason why they might not equally be shewn to the Court as the jury. But, be this as it may, all these statutes are expressly directed by law, to be printed in the New Revised Code, 1 Rev. Code, 7, together with all the undoubted public Acts of the State; *and as contradistinguished from these, the titles and dates of private and local acts are directed to be published; and it is expressly enacted, that the laws, so directed to be published, when examined and found correctly printed, &c. shall be received in evidence in the same manner as the originals; lb. 14; thus giving them the station and authenticity of public laws, if they were not so before. But, those creating the Bank of Virginia and Farmers' Bank had long before been recognized by legislative sanction as public laws.

By the Sessions Acts of 1806, chap. 14, reciting that Samuel Pleasants had prepared for publication a continuation of the Revised Code, containing a collection of all Acts of a public nature passed since 1801, a publication of them is sanctioned, to be received and considered of equal authority as the originals are, &c. The Act establishing the Virginia Bank is to be found in the second volume of this compilation. After this, viz: in 1811, the Farmers' Bank was established, and in the same Session, chap. 21, another publication is authorised, of a new edition of his Code by Samuel Pleasants, with a Supplement to the second volume, containing the public Acts since 1817, and the titles of private and local Acts. This Act also makes it the duty of the public printer to separate, in his publications, the public from the private Acts, with separate indexes, &c.

In the Acts of this Session, that establishing the Farmers' Bank is published as a public Act; and in the edition thus authorised, the Virginia Bank law is again published as a public Act in page 60; and that of the Farmers' Bank in the Supplement, as is a law authorising both Banks to lend money to the General Government, on any terms they could agree on.

By the Act of 1813-14, chap. 31, the charter of the Virginia Bank is extended, and is published amongst the public Acts of that Session, as is the Act giving to the Farmers' Bank half the deposits of the public monies; and so 173 *is the Act of 1814, authorising both Banks to issue notes as low as $2 and $3, (and which authority to issue notes, I presume must be a public law;) and so also are the Acts of 1815, chap. 22, and 1816, chap. 7, as to the presumption of specie payments by these Banks, not only of a public character, I presume, but are found amongst the public laws. And finally, the Act of 1816, chap. 39, establishing the Bank in question, is published in the public Acts of that Session.

In addition to all this, the very plea before us, both in its beginning and conclusion, lays the alleged corrupt agreement to be against and void by the Acts of Assembly; thereby recognizing two Acts on the subject, to be taken cognizance of by the Court.

Having a right, then, as I conceive, to look into the Act of incorporation, the first general question is, whether a contract with a corporation is within the Statute of Usury. This, as a general question, is not without its difficulties; nor am I prepared fully to decide it. It seems to me, however, that a corporation is not a person who can be punished under the second section of the Act; and I am by no means prepared to say, that the agents of a corporation, with whom an usurious contract is made, can be punished under that section, as individuals. They may receive the usury altogether as agents, having no interest whatever; but even where interested as members of the corporation, it is an interest in common with others, and may be a very small interest in them, whilst the punishment may be very heavy. But an officer may receive, who neither had an agency in the contract nor an interest in the money. Besides, if the contract is made with the corporation, how is the officer who, as treasurer or cashier, receives the money, to be punished for receiving, unless the contract can be pleaded to, and invalidated, as one made with A. B. and C. as individuals, he being one of them? If A. lends money to B. on usury, and takes his bond and assigns it to C.

for value, or makes him his mere 174 *agent to collect, and who is informed of the usury, but is told that B. will pay, and B. does pay him; C. cannot be punished for this usury, though it would be otherwise if A. had acted as his agent, and the loan was in reality made by C. who knew of the usury. The receipt of the usury must be by him who is the usurer, and who alone incurs the penalty inflicted by the second clause. The usurer is the party who lends the money. Thus a man gives his individual note to the Bank for a loan, and pledges his stock for the payment, on an usurious contract; can this be said to be a contract and loan to him by A. B. and C. who were the President and Directors present? Suppose it to be decided to be a case of usury, on the grounds here contended for, to wit, that the transaction was not a discount of a note of a third person, but a loan, and that interest in advance in such a case is usury. This interest is retained in the coffers of the Bank, the cashier only paying the balance after its deduction. Who are the usurers, and who has received the usury in this case? And how is this usury to be pleaded under the first section? And who is to be punished for it under the second? If the individuals who made the contract are guilty of the usury, then it must be so pleaded under the first section; and who is to be punished for it under the second? If the individuals who made the contract are guilty of the usury, then it must be so pleaded; and if so found, then they have used, on an individual contract, the monies of the corporation, and are answerable for it; but the corporation has received the usurious interest, and if it could be punished as a natural person, still it would not have incurred the penalty, as it was not the usurer, should it be decided to be a contract with the President and Directors individually. But, if it could not be pleaded to, and avoided, as a contract with A. B. and C., but must be pleaded to, or is pleaded to, as a contract with the corporation, then the corporation would be the usurer and also the receiver of the money, and not A. B. and C., the individuals present at the Board of Directors, 175 *or D. the cashier, who paid over the nett proceeds; and of course, they could not, in their natural and individual characters, be punished, as it had been argued that they could.

For these, amongst other reasons, I am of opinion, that though there may be a contract with a Bank, which would be usury if made with an individual, and a receipt of usurious interest, which would subject that individual to the penalties of the second section of the statute, there is no one, in the case of the Bank, who can be subjected to those penalties. In other words, an incorporated Bank is not a person, within the meaning of that section of the Act.

But it is contended, that though this may be the case, still a contract with a banking corporation, which would be usurious and void in case of an individual, may be pleaded to and avoided, either as one made with the corporation, or as one made with individual members of the board; and that though pleaded to as a contract with the corporation, as is the plea in this case; and although the corporation may not be a person, within the meaning of that word as used in the first member of the first section; yet, it being a contract for usurious interest, it is within the meaning of the second member of that section, and may be avoided by such plea as is pleaded in this case.

If I understand the argument, it is this; that the Act, in the first member of the first section, provides, that no person shall, upon any contract, take for loan, &c. more than six per cent. He shall not receive more than that. If he does, he shall be subjected to the penalties of the second section; and although it is conceded that a banking corporation is not a person, who can be charged as having, upon a contract for that purpose, taken for a loan a greater sum than is by law allowed, so as to be punished therefor under the second section; yet, as the first section proceeds to declare that "all bonds, contracts, &c. to be made for payment of any money, &c. lent, on which a higher interest is reserved or taken, 176 &c. shall be utterly "void," it is competent, by plea, under this statute, to avoid such contract, though it is made with one who is not a person within the meaning of the other provisions of the law; in other words, that though the Bank, by its officers, knowingly makes the contract, and knowingly receives the interest, and although there is no one who can be punished for this corrupt contract and receipt of usury, the contract is void.

This construction seems to detach the first member of the first section from that section, and to attach it to the second section as a necessary appendage to it. But it will be found, that the second section is complete in itself, and does not require the aid of the first section to make it so. In fact, it is taken nearly verbatim from the statute of 37 Hen. 8, chap. 9, which inflicted that punishment without forfeiting the debt. The first member of the first section must, therefore, be taken as properly belonging to that section, and indeed is coupled with the second member by the word and. That section, therefore, seems to me to mean the same thing, as if it had said, "no person shall contract to take directly or indirectly for loan, &c. above the value of 6 per cent. &c.; and all bonds, contracts, &c. for payment of any money, &c. so lent, on which a higher interest is received or taken, &c. shall be void, &c." But the words "so lent," it is said, merely mean at a higher rate of interest; but those expressions themselves immediately follow those words, and therefore, I think it most fair to refer them back also to the contract and the person with whom it was made. Suppose the words had been, "no natural person shall, upon any contract, take, &c.," this would stand better with the second section, if I am right in supposing that a body politic cannot be punished. But could it then be contended that the second member, "and all bonds, contracts, &c. for payment of any money, &c. so lent," extended to contracts made with an artificial person or body politic? It would seem to me, (to say nothing of the penal nature of the statute,) that such construction 177 *could not be maintained. On the whole, it seems to be at present, that the person who lends, and whose contract is to be avoided by a plea of the statute, must be a person within the meaning of that word as used in both sections, and that if the same word means a natural person in the second, it means such person in the first also. It is very usual in legislation, when it is so intended, to say every person or persons, bodies politic or corporate. But, this is not done where pecuniary penalties are inflicted, as corporations cannot be so punished. Their legitimate punishment for violating the law of their existence, seems to be a destruction of that existence itself by the power who created them. As the plea in this case does not allege the contract to have been made with a natural person, it is not necessary to speculate further on what would be the result had it done so. It admits that the contract was made with the artificial person, and that that person took the alleged usurious interest. It seeks to present a case, not only of a contract to take, but an actual taking of unlawful interest by such person.

But, in addition to this general view of the subject, it may turn out, on a sound and reasonable construction of the law, that it was not intended by the Legislature to subject the Banks to the Statute of Usury. These corporations were instituted by the Legislature, at the instance of the whole community, for great public and State purposes as aforesaid. The deep pecuniary interest taken in them by the State, as well as the watchful guardianship and powerful control retained by her over them, has united her interest and direction of them, with that of the monied capitalists who became joint stockholders with her. The estates and income of widows and orphans, in short the solvency of the Banks to their various creditors and cestui que trusts, public and private, depends on the faithful management of these institutions, and that as little of the capital as possible should be put to hazard, or subjected to loss. The main object was, to create a 178 monied capital, to "be used principally in loans and discounts, and in facilitating exchange by the purchase of bills, &c., and that those entitled to accommodation might have the use of that capital at reasonable interest, for the advancement of trade, agriculture, manufactures, &c. The management, of course, was to fall into the hands of persons of high trust and confidence, who, though they might have some interest in the fund itself, would have more interest in the legal and regular exercise of the trust, and in the preservation of the fund, than in putting it and the existence of the institution itself, to hazard, by usurious contracts, for the small gain which would fall to their share, on that score; more interested in holding their offices, than in forfeiting them, for the gain arising from such mismanagement. The inducements to avoid all contracts contrary to the charter, would be predominant with them. The remedy, in case of misconduct, was prompt and easy, whilst the fund would be secured against the consequences of their ignorance or wilful misdeeds, by exempting it from heavy forfeitures in consequence of such ignorance. Justice to the public, as well as to the innocent stockholders, seems to require that the fund should not be forfeited, through the ignorance or misconduct of agents thus acting under a special and limited power; whilst oppression by usury, to any great extent, could not be apprehended. On the other hand, if it could be supposed that these agents, many of whom act without reward, were to be subject to great individual loss, arising from their ignorance or mistakes, few would be found willing to risk such consequences. When they are made personally responsible or punishable, the misconduct for which such liability is incurred, is distinctly stated in the law. If, then, any loss to the institution had been supposed possible, under the statute against usury, it is reasonable to suppose that a provision would also have been made in that case, to throw the loss on those who should occasion it, unless, indeed, the difficulty of getting agents who would encounter such hazard, prevented it. But, if ¹⁷⁹ a loss by culpable misconduct in this respect, had been supposed possible, it would have been as reasonable to visit that on those guilty, as in the other cases provided for by the Act. But, no inducements existed for such misconduct, and if, from inadvertence or ignorance, (as in receiving interest in advance,) usury should take place, it would not be such a case as to require the severe inflictions of the statute; inasmuch as, if usury never had gone further than that, the statute probably never would have been made. In fact, to borrow money from such an institution, acting by agents under a limited power, and then to seek, on such grounds, to forfeit the whole money received, to the ruin of the innocent and helpless stockholders, seems to me, in a moral point of view, not to be better than griping usury itself, and ought not to have been sanctioned by law. Nor can I perceive that it would have been sound policy to have declared by law, that a borrower from such a fund, by connivance with such an agent, and inducing him in any way whatever, knowingly and culpably to violate the trust reposed in him, might thereby take to himself the funds of the innocent. Justice to them would have required protection against such fraud and combination, instead of punishing the innocent, and letting the guilty go free. Had the question, then, been presented to the Legislature, it is reasonable to suppose that they would not have subjected the Banks to the laws against usury.

But, the subject seems so far at least to have been before them, as to allow the Banks to take a rate of interest, which, in cases of individuals, would be usury. This part of the Act seems to me to have considerable bearing on this question, not only in support of the general view I have taken, but as it regards the pleadings in such a case. Had the Act declared, that on their discounts and loans, the Banks should not take more than legal interest, this reference to the statute against usury would have afforded a more plausible ground to say, that it was intended to subject them to that statute. But, the terms are, that they shall not take ¹⁸⁰ *more than one half of one per cent. for thirty days, thereby exempting them from the effects of that statute, at least so far as this exceeds the legal rate. Having thus far raised, in this case, the legal rate of interest, without superseding the sanctions of the statute against usury, in case of exceeding this rate, (as has been uniformly done, both here and in England, when the rate has been changed,) affords, to me, a very cogent reason for believing that it was not intended that those sanctions should be applied; especially, as it seems to me, that justice, public morality, and sound policy, required that they should not be applied.

But, let us test this question by the course of pleading, which would seem to me to be necessary to support a defence, going to a total bar of the action under this statute.

The plea under consideration, shews the difficulty counsel had in presenting such a defence. It seems to be neither under the one statute, nor the other; but to rely on both; and on that account would, perhaps, be bad on a special demurrer. Suppose it had been simply and singly a plea under the Statute of Usury, that more than 6 per cent. had been contracted for and taken; it is said that this would have thrown it on the plaintiff to reply the Act, and shew, that by it, the Bank had a right to take more. Perhaps this would have been right, if this is to be considered a private Act; but, considering it a public law, I incline to think that the plea would have been bad on demurrer, or in arrest of judgment. But, suppose the plaintiff had replied the Act; then it is said that the defendant could rejoin and say, "the Bank contracted for and had taken more than the rate so allowed." But, would not this involve a difficulty something like a departure in pleading? Under which statute would he claim the forfeiture of the debt? Suppose that after raising the interest to 6 per cent. there had been a plea of the statute allowing but 5 per cent.; and the plaintiff had replied the new statute, and that the contract arose under it; to which the defendant rejoined a contract for more than 6 per cent.; ¹⁸¹ he would then be obliged *to conclude, and avoid the contract under the last statute. But, that statute would have a clause avoiding it, which this has not. But, if the plea had on its face shewn, that the contract was after the statute allowing 6 per cent. the plea would have been bad on demurrer. Here, the plea admits the contract to be with the Bank, and, of course, under a law allowing a greater interest to be taken than 6 per cent.; and yet it claims to avoid the contract under the law which avoids contracts where more than six per cent. is taken. Suppose then that the plea had gone on the latter law, and had stated that by the Act of incorporation, the Bank was not allowed to take more than one half of one per cent. for thirty days, on its loans and discounts, and that there was an agreement to discount the note in question, and to take thereon more than one half of one per cent. for thirty days, and which was actually taken, could such plea have regularly concluded, that by virtue of that Act, (to wit, the Act which vacates contracts when more than six per cent. was contracted for or taken) the note so discounted was void? I doubt exceedingly, whether the plea could have claimed to avoid the contract under the usury law. There has been no law that I can find, either here or in England, in which the rate of interest has been generally or partially changed, in which it was not deemed necessary to re-enact the penalties or forfeitures for the usury, if they were intended to be applied in such case. In this State, the rate of interest was at one time high, then reduced until it got down to five per cent. and was again raised to six per cent.; and in every case, this was the course of legislation. A departure from such an uniform course, especially in the case of a statute so highly penal, is, with the other considerations above noticed, enough to satisfy me that the Legislature did not intend to apply the penalties and forfeiture inflicted by the Statute of Usury, to the Banks.

Suppose a law should pass, raising the rate of interest in a certain species of contracts to seven per cent., inflicting 182 "a personal punishment on the lender for taking more, and omitting to avoid the contract or punish the party under the usury law, if more was taken; would he be subject to that law? It seems to me he would not. We would hardly be at liberty to say it was an omission and oversight of the Legislature, and infer an intention still to subject him to that law. In the case before us, though the rate is raised, and that, in regard to a corporation, who could not even be punished under the second section, but who may be punished under the Act of incorporation, by destroying its very existence.

This view of the case, if entertained by a majority of the Court, would put an end to this cause. As I stand alone, however, on this point, it become necessary to take a brief view of the other questions arising in the case.

The plea, then, presents this question arising under the Statute of Usury; whether an application to lend money, and to discount the note of the borrower, endorsed by certain endorsers, and to continue it for eighteen months, taking a discount in advance of one half of one per cent. for thirty days, (which, though more than six per cent., is admitted not to be usury, is no more than one half one per cent. for thirty days had been taken) is usury, because taking it in advance makes it more? In other words, is a discount of a note on a deduction at the rate of legal interest on the whole sum secured by the note, usury? It seems to be admitted, that in regard to commercial paper, (within which class the note in question falls,) the long usage and custom of trade has sanctioned this course, provided the paper has but a short time to run, as sixty, ninety, or perhaps one hundred and twenty days; and the Courts seem to have sanctioned this custom. This course of decision, I understand it to be admitted, ought not now to be disturbed.

But, it is said, that this custom and course of decision only apply to notes of third persons offered for discount, and not to a note given to secure a loan pre-183 viously agreed *on, however short the time it has to run; and a fortiori, not to a loan which, it is agreed, is to run for a long time as eighteen months.

Had the note been taken, payable at the end of eighteen months, whether given by the borrower himself or by a third person, and offered for discount, it would not have been within the mercantile usage. But, though the agreement stated in the plea was to continue the discount or accommodation for eighteen months, yet it was also agreed that the notes should be renewed every sixty days; which put it in the power of the party to pay at any time, and thus stop the interest. So that, it seems to me, the case is reduced to one of a loan for sixty days.

The paper is then one of a mercantile character; and as to the time of payment, is within the usage. But it was on a loan to the maker. The doctrine urged on this point is a very serious one; and if sustained, will affect a great majority of the transactions at our Banks; probably every case in which the maker is directed to be credited with the proceeds, as it is the maker, in such case, who offers the note for discount.

But the difference, if any, between a note discounted at the instance of the maker, and at that of the payee, or of a third person, who is the holder, seems to me to be so slight in the real substance of the transaction, that I would be very unwilling to sanction the doctrine contended for. It may be, that in reality the endorser is indebted to the maker, though ostensibly it is otherwise. The mercantile character of the paper precludes any enquiry or necessity of enquiry, into its real consideration as between the parties to it; and in fact, in all cases of discounts, the object is to raise money presently for money to be paid hereafter. There might be more doubt, perhaps, in the case of a note given by the borrower directly to the Bank, secured by a pledge of stock, should interest be taken in advance. But, concerning this, I mean to intimate no opinion. On the whole, I think the demurrer to this plea was properly sustained.

184 *The remaining questions in the cause are presented by the bills of exceptions. I think both of the instructions mentioned in the first bill of exceptions were correct. But although these instructions were given at the instance, and on the motion, of the defendant, and that part therefore operating in his favour, was excused to by the plaintiff; yet 't seems, the defendant either did not think the instruction so given went far enough; or, doubting whether the jury would draw from the evidence the conclusions which that instruction permitted them to draw, and which the Court seemed to think it was necessary for them to draw, in order to find for the defendant, he moves for another instruction; the whole evidence is spread on the record; and the Court is asked to instruct the jury, that if they believe that the defendant wrote a certain letter to the President of the Bank, and that the cashier, acting under the instructions of the Board of Directors, returned a certain written answer, and that that was the only answer ever communicated to him, (although it be admitted that a certain resolution of the Board was entered into, but not communicated;) and that a contract or agreement was made by the Bank with the defendant, in conformity with the terms of the letter from the cashier; and that the discounts and renewals, &c. took place; and that the $10,000 on the discount charged in the account to the defendant, consisted of one hundred Bank shares estimated at par, when, on the 14th day of February, 1821, they were worth, at the cash selling price, not more than $9,000, which was known to the Board of Directors; and that the note sued on was in consideration of the contract; then the jury ought to find for the defendant.

Now, if the object of all the evidence introduced by the defendant, was, to prove the case as stated in the first instruction mentioned in the first bill of exceptions, and if it was necessary, as I think it was, in order to entitle the defendant to a verdict on the evidence, that he should make out his case as stated in that instruction; then it seems to me, that the jury were, at least in the first instance, to the proper tribunal to try the fact, and draw the inferences necessary to make out the defence. The jury were there instructed, that if they believed from the evidence that the Bank, on or about the 14th day of February, 1821, loaned to Erasmus Striebling $2,500 or thereabouts for eighteen months, but made it a condition precedent to the granting of the said loan, that he should buy one hundred shares of the Bank stock at $10,000, giving his note therefor, and that he complied therewith; and that the price of one hundred shares of stock, on the terms by payment prescribed and agreed to, was palpably and obviously an over price for the said stock, having reference to the then selling price in market, and that the defendant was influenced in agreeing to give the over price demanded, by the offer of the said loan of $2,500; and that the purchase at such over price, operated as an inducement to the Bank to make the accommodation discount which it did make, and that the note sued on was given in consideration of this transaction; then, they ought to find for the defendant. But, if it was not made a condition of the loan of $2,500, that the defendant should purchase the stock at that price; or, that the said loan was independent of the said purchase; or, that the purchase of the said stock was the principal object of the defendant, and that being accomplished, the Bank afterwards agreed to lend the $2,500; then, such loan was not usury.

Now, so far as I can understand the case, it was necessary for the jury to come to all these conclusions on the one side, and against those on the other, in order to justify a verdict for the defendant. His counsel, however, instead of excepting to the opinion and instruction given, moved for a new instruction, less precise and clear, and consequently more calculated to embarrass the jury, than the instruction given; and in which, some things are withdrawn from the jury, which, it seems to me, it was their exclusive province, at least in the first instance, to decide.

186 *Thus, the instruction moved for refers it to the jury only to say, whether certain letters were written, and whether a contract was made between the parties, in conformity with the terms in the cashier's letter, and consequently leaves it to the Court exclusively to decide, what was the intention of the parties in that contract; whether a loan, on condition to take stock at a given price, was intended, or a sale independent of a loan, as was contended on the other side.

As to the value of the stock too, nothing was left to the jury, but to say, that the cash price was not more than $9,000; throwing it on the Court to decide whether, considering the offer to purchase at par, and the other circumstances of the case; the terms of payment agreed on, and the conflicting evidence as to the price on a credit, &c., together with the possible influence of the offer to lend the $2,500, &c.; it was a sale, or in substance an usurious loan of the whole money. It seems to me that it was an attempt to evade or forestall the province of the jury to weigh the circumstances, and decide on these matters, contrary to the great principles of the jury trial, and to the authorities on this subject, so far as I have been able to examine them; and the more especially, as the whole merits of the case seem fairly and fully to have been submitted to the jury, on the first instructions given.

But, the assumption in the instruction moved for, that the resolution of the Board of Directors, though before the Court and jury, was not to weigh with either, in deciding what was the contract, (as it undertakes to confine the enquiry on that subject to the letter of the Cashier alone) is another reason with me, to justify the rejection of that instruction.

The next instruction asked for, simply relates to the question, whether, taking the interest in advance in this case, was usury; and which, for the reasons before given, I think was properly rejected.

As to the motion for a new trial, I feel more doubts; for, although I deem it wrong to withdraw from the jury the 187 *decision of the facts of the case, and think it their province to draw all the inferences and conclusions arising from particular circumstances; yet I am equally clear, that what they may do is always subordinate to the control of the Court, by granting a new trial in a proper case. The case, however, was tried before a Court and jury who heard the evidence, and who concur in opinion that no usury was practised. The negotiation was opened by an offer to purchase the stock; and although that was accompanied by an application for a loan on it, which was rejected, that circumstance, though it shewed that the purchaser was in want of money, I presume did not disqualify the parties from selling and purchasing. It was not unknown to either of them, and at any rate, not to the defendant, that he could at once raise money at a neighbouring Bank, on the stock, nearly to the amount he asked of the Valley Bank. A purchase of stock, therefore, would give him a great portion of the relief he wanted. The power to make such an use of stock, will always enhance its value in a contract on time; but surely that does not disqualify a holder from selling on time. Had an offer been made to a private stockholder to purchase on the same terms, he might have refused, though the cash price was but $80; for, he might have argued thus: "My stock will give me six per cent. on the par value, which is all that is offered; and at or before the end of eighteen months, it may be above par, and in the mean time, I cannot use it." But, there was an offer to lend $2,500 on the security of a note endorsed; and this, on the one hand, induced the defendant to purchase the stock at the price, whilst the offer of that price induced the Bank to agree to that loan. If this was so, then the Judge instructs the jury that it was usury; and they, from the circumstances, were to say whether the fact was so or not. They say it was not so. They, who lived near the Bank, and heard the evidence, saw no reason to believe that the Bank would not have extended that accommodation to the defendant, on the se-188 curity offered, "whether he purchased the stock or not; and it would be strange if they would, provided they were looking out for secure customers, as was probably the case. The jury also may have thought, that the purchase of stock on time was the great and primary object; as it gave to the party the chance of probable rise in the price, as well as the certain means of raising a large sum of money; and that he would have effected this object at all events. It seems to me, that they were the proper, if not the exclusive, tribunal, to weigh the circumstances, and decide this matter; and as that decision was confirmed by the Judge before whom it was made, I cannot say that it was wrong.

On every ground, therefore, I am for affirming the judgment.

JUDGE CABELL.

In arguing the demurrers filed in this cause, a preliminary question was made by the counsel for the appellant, whether the Act of Assembly establishing the Bank of the Valley be a public or private Act. Without adverting to other considerations, there is one which satisfies me that we must regard that Act as public, and not as private. By the 7th section, (see 2 Rev. Code, 97,) it is directed, that in addition to the capital stock of the Bank, to be raised by subscription, there shall be created in the name of the Commonwealth, for the benefit of the Fund for Internal Improvement, a number of shares equal to 15 per cent. on the amount of stock subscribed. The Commonwealth is thus made a member of the corporation, by the law giving it existence, and prescribing its privileges; and as the corporation thereby becomes a matter of public concern, in which every man in the community is directly interested, that law must be a public law.

The counsel for the appellant, endeavoured also to make a distinction between the Bank's discounting a note, where the transaction is in fact a loan, and 189 the note taken as a "mere security; and the discounting a note previously given for valuable consideration; and contended, that in the former case, it would be usurious if the Bank exacted in advance, interest on the full amount of the note. It is true, that in ordinary loans, it would be usurious to stipulate for the payment of interest in advance, on the whole amount of the loan. But, many privileges are allowed to commercial paper. One of these privileges is, that in discounting such paper, full interest may be required in advance, even where the transaction is a loan, provided it be done in the usual course of a business. The English books are full of decisions on this point. The Act of Assembly puts notes negotiable at this Bank on the footing of foreign bills of exchange, the most favoured class of commercial paper. There is, therefore, no ground for the distinction contended for.

In considering the exceptions to the opinion of the Court on the motion to instruct the jury, and on the motion for a new trial, the questions arise, 1. Whether the Act entitled "An Act to reduce into one Act the several Acts against usury," (1 Rev. Code, 373,) be applicable to corporations generally? 2. Whether that Act applies to this particular corporation? 3. Is the transaction, as detailed in the bill of exceptions, usurious?

1. Does the Act against usury apply to corporations generally? That Act was made for the benefit of the whole community, to protect the necessitous against the advantage which others might be disposed to take of their imprudence. Its terms are very general. "No person shall, upon any contract, take, &c. above the value of six dollars, &c. and all bonds, contracts, &c. on which a higher interest is reserved, &c. shall be utterly void." The mischiefs to the community, from the practice of usury, would not be less when carried on by a monied corporation, than when carried on by individuals in their natural character. Corporations are as sensibly alive to their own interest, as individuals; nor am I aware that legal sanctions are less 190 necessary "to restrain artificial, than natural, persons, from the commission of wrong. The term "person," used in the law, is unquestionably sufficiently comprehensive to embrace corporations; and it must be held to embrace them, unless there be something in the law shewing the Legislative intention to restrict its application. It is said, that such intention is manifested by the second section of the law, which prescribes as a punishment on the "person" taking usurious interest, the forfeiture of double the value of the money or thing lent, &c.; that there is no instance in which corporations have been subjected to pecuniary penalties; and that, therefore, it is fair to be presumed, that corporations were not intended to be embraced by the word person in this section of the law: from which an inference is attempted to be deduced, that the term "person" was intended to have a restricted application in the first sentence also. It may be that there is no other case, in which corporations have been subjected to pecuniary penalties; as to which, however, I have not enquired, and therefore give no opinion. Let it be so. It would by no means satisfy me, that it was not the intention of the Legislature to subject them to the penalty in the case of usury. If a practice be highly injurious to the community, which it is deemed expedient to restrain by pecuniary penalties, and if corporations may be supposed to be exposed to the temptation of engaging in that practice, as well as natural persons, why should not corporations be equally subjected to the pecuniary penalty? It would certainly be competent to the Legislature to subject a corporation to such a punishment; and it would seem to be an appropriate punishment. Personal punishment cannot be inflicted on a corporation, and a forfeiture of the charter might not be deemed expedient for every offence. It is said, that punishment might be inflicted on the agents of the corporation. That is very true; and such punishment might be very proper as an additional sanction. But, it by no means follows, that the corporation itself should be not only exempted 191 from punishment, *but should be allowed the benefit of the wrong committed by its agents.

But, I see no necessary connection between the first and second sections of the law. If, therefore, it were true, that corporations could not be punished under the second section, it would not follow that their contracts are not to be vacated under the first section. The great object was to protect the fleeced borrower, and that object requires that the provision, as to vacating the contract, should apply to artificial, as well as to natural, persons; and such, I think, was the intention of the Legislature.

2. Does the Act against usury apply to this corporation?

The argument, on this point, presupposes that the law applies to corporations generally. If there be an exemption in favor of this corporation, those who contend for it must prove it. The exemption is attempted to be deduced from the last clause of the 10th fundamental article of the constitution of the Bank, (p. 101.) "Neither shall the said corporation take more than at the rate of one half of one per cent. for thirty days, for or on account of its loans or discounts." But, if the general usury law would apply to this corporation but for this clause, I cannot perceive how this clause exempts it from such application. A subsequent law is held to repeal a former one, only by express terms or by necessary implication. It is not pretended that the former law is repealed, in this case, by express terms. It is repealed by necessary implication? The necessary implication, by which a subsequent law repeals a former law, is where the two laws are so inconsistent, that they cannot stand together. But, there is no inconsistency here, except that the rate of interest is changed as to this corporation, from six per centum per annum, to six per centum for three hundred and sixty days. In all other respects, the two laws are consistent and in harmony. In all other respects, this corporation, therefore, is subject, as before, to the general law concerning usury.

192 *3. Is the transaction, as detailed in the evidence stated in the bill of exceptions, usurious?

It is impossible not to see that Stribbling was in great want of money; and that, in his negotiation with the Bank, money was his only object. It is true that he was willing to receive Bank stock in part, but it was to be received, and so he informed the Bank, only as the means of getting money. It is impossible not to see that the Bank availed itself of his distress for money, to pass off to him, one hundred shares of their stock, at a price nearly twenty-five per cent. above its real value, in order to enable him to raise a part of the sum he wanted. This pretended sale of stock was, directly and inseparably connected with an actual loan of the residue of the money that he required. A case of more palpable usury, was never attempted to be covered by a shift or device.

In the case of Pratt v. Willey, 1 Esp. Rep. 41, in an action by the endorsee of a promissory note against the defendant as maker, the plea was usury. The usury attempted to be proved on the part of the defendant, was, that the plaintiff had, in discounting the note, given in part a diamond ring, for which he charged much beyond the value. Lord Kenyon says, that he and Buller, Justice, had ruled on former occasions, that if in discounting a bill, the party discounting it gives goods in part, if these goods are of a certain ascertained value and are given at that value, it is not usury; but, that if the party discounting the bill, makes the holder of it take them at a higher value, that that shall be deemed usury; for, that a party, by substituting goods for money, shall not, by colour of the pretended value, take above the legal interest, and evade the statute.

The case of Davis v. Hardacre, 2 Camp. 375, goes still farther. That was an action by the endorsee of a bill of exchange drawn by the defendant, payable to his own order, and the defence was usury. It appeared that the defendant, being much pressed for money, applied to the plaintiff to discount the bill in question.

193 The plaintiff refused *to do so, except upon the condition that the defendant would take a landscape in part, to be valued at 150l. The defendant then offered to prove that the picture was worth not more than 32l. But, he was stopped by Lord Ellenborough, who said, that "it lies upon the plaintiff to prove that it is worth the 150l. When a party is compelled to take goods in discounting a bill of exchange. I think a presumption arises that the transaction is usurious. To rebut this presumption, evidence should be given of the value of the goods. by the person who sues on the bill." And there being no such proof in that case, the plaintiff was non suited.

These cases are apposite in principle to the one before us. I will only cite one other; Doe, on the demise of Davidson v. Barnard, 1 Esp. Rep. 11; and I refer to it to shew, that there is no difference between stock and goods in this respect.

In that case, it appeared that a person having occasion for a sum of money, applied to another, who said that all his money was in the funds, and that to sell out stock at that time, would be a considerable loss, stock then standing at 73; but that, if he would take it at 75, he should have the sum he wanted. This was agreed to. Stock to the amount of 1500l. was taken, valued at 75, which was sold out the same day at 72½, that being the then current price. Lord Kenyon held the transaction to be clearly usurious, and non-suited the plaintiff.

But, it is contended, that the Court could not give the second instruction asked for, without invading the province of the jury. I admit that it is the exclusive province of the jury to determine disputed facts. But, when the facts of a case shall be ascertained by a special verdict, or shall be admitted by the pleadings, it is the province of the Court to state the law arising upon those facts; and in all such cases, the question whether the facts constitute a sale or loan, or whether they constitute usury or not, is a question of law, which the Court must decide. I will cite 194 only *Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call, 62, in our own Courts, and Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pull. 154, in the English Courts. The later case is very remarkable, as shewing that when the facts of a case make usury, the quo animo with which the thing was done, is not regarded; for, in that case, it is expressly found by the jury, that "they believed the plaintiff did not think he was acting contrary to law."

But, the most usual mode of obtaining the opinion of the Court on points of law, is for the party desiring it to move the Court to instruct the jury. All that is necessary for this purpose, is, for him to state his case hypothetically; and if it be pertinent to the cause, the Court is bound to pronounce the law on the case thus stated. This is no invasion of the rights of the jury; for, if the jury shall believe that the case, as proved, is different from that stated by the part, the opinion of the Court having no application to the case as proved, can have no influence on the verdict of the jury.

I am of opinion that the Court ought to have given the second instruction moved for by the defendant; and that the judgment be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

May, 1827.

Chancery Practice—Bill against Representative of Executor—Administrator D. B. N.—Where one is appointed by will, trustee of the real estate, and executor of the personal, and dies, the children of the testator may file a bill against the representative of the executor and trustee, for an account of the proceeds of the real estate, without having an administrator de bonis non appointed of the estate of their testator.

Executors—Application of Assets—Individual Purposes.—An executor cannot apply the assets of his testator to his own individual purposes, unless he is in advance to the estate to the same amount; and a purchaser, knowing of such application, purchases at his peril. This rule applies as well to a purchaser who advances his money at the time of the purchase, as to one who takes the assets as a security for a preceding debt.

Trustees—Payment of Private Debts.—A trustee cannot alien the trust fund, in payment of his own debts.

Same—Assignment of Trust Fund for Individual Benefit.—A trustee sells real estate committed to his charge by the will of a testator, and takes a deed of trust for the purchase money. He then makes a contract for his own individual benefit, and assigns the instalments due for the land, in execution of the contract. The assignment contains a reference to the deed of trust, which refers to the original deed, and the latter refers to the will, by which the trust was created. The party to whom the assignment of the instalments was made, will be considered as having notice of the trust, and that the instalments were derived from the sale of the trust property; and the cestui que trust will be entitled to the money.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Winchester. For a complete history of the cause, it is only necessary to refer to the following opinion.

Johnson, Stanard and Wickham, for the appellants.

Jones and Leigh, for the appellees.

May 28. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

These suits arise out of the will of John D. Orr, and proceedings of his executor and trustee under it. In 1816, Dr. Orr died, leaving a will, by which he devised and bequeathed to his brother Benjamin G. Orr, his whole estate, real, personal and mixed, upon the following trusts: "In the first place, to sell and dispose of the same, or such part of the same, as he may deem most beneficial for the general interest of my estate, and to apply the proceeds 196 of *the same, or such yearly income or profits as may be made from the same, to the payment of all my just debts; meaning hereby, to subject all my estate,

*Executors—Breach of Trust—Liability of Participants.—If there is any proposition which ought to be regarded as settled law in Virginia, it is that a party concerting with an executor or administrator in a breach of trust, cannot claim credit for the money actually advanced by him. It is not for him to say that the fiduciary ought to have applied the money to the purposes of the estate. When he aids him in any manner contrary to the duty of the executor, he takes upon himself all the hazards of a misappropriation of funds. Utterback v. Cooper, 28 Gratt. 286, citing the principal case.

And in Wilkinson v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 291, it is said: "Look at the case of an executor: he is so far the representative of the testator, that he has the legal title to the personality; yet, because he is a fiduciary, any individual creditor of his own, who receives in discharge of his debt, assets of the estate, knowing them to be such, or whoever deals with the executor for any of the assets, in any way which makes him a party to the breach of trust, must account for such assets to those who are entitled under the will. Graft v. Castleman, 5 Rand. 195." To the same point, see the principal case cited in Downman v. Rust, 6 Rand. 592; Davis v. Christian, 15 Gratt. 48; Jones v. Clark, 25 Gratt. 657; Callaway v. Price, 32 Gratt. 10; Brockenbrough v. Turner, 78 Va. 446; Smith v. Henning, 10 W. Va. 641; Wolf v. McGugin, 37 W. Va. 561, 16 S. E. Rep. 799.

See further, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Purchasers—Notice—Possession.—It is well settled that whatever puts a purchaser on enquiry is equivalent to notice. Possession of the property by a person other than the vendor is universally regarded as sufficient to put a purchaser on enquiry and to affect him with knowledge of the claims of the possession. Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 419, 2 S. E. Rep. 713, citing principal case.

real, personal and mixed, to the payment of my just debts, and to leave the application of the same to that purpose, and the mode of raising the necessary funds from the estate, to the sound discretion of my said brother. In the second place, after the payment of all my just debts, the surplus of my estate, or the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be given and divided by my said brother to and among my three children, Mary, Ellen and Thomas, in such shares and portions, as in the sound discretion and judgment of my said brother, to him shall seem most agreeable and expedient, according to the situation and conduct of my said children. And it is my will and desire, that such division and distribution as he shall actually make of my estate among my said children as aforesaid, or such division and distribution as he shall by writing under his hand, or by last will and testament, direct and appoint, shall be valid and binding; it being my intention to place my said brother, in respect to my said children, to all intents and purposes, in loco parentis. And it is also my will and intention, that he be fully empowered and authorised, not only for the purpose of paying my debts, but to raise and provide a fund for division and distribution among my said children, and for their immediate maintenance, support and education, according as he shall deem it most expedient either to sell or dispose of the same or any part, in specie, to be applied to the purposes aforesaid." The testator also appointed his said brother guardian of his children, and executor of his will, and exempted him from giving bond and security. The executor qualified. On the 11th of March, 1817, he conveyed to Castleman and M'Cormick, for the consideration of $30,000, payable in instalments, a tract of land in Frederick county, belonging to the estate of his testator, called Poplimento, and thus described in the deed, "formerly the property of Rawleigh Colston, esquire, 197 *and by him sold and conveyed to the late Dr. John D. Orr, by whom it was devised to the said Benjamin G. Orr, as appears by his will recorded in Frederick County Court." On the same day, Castleman and M'Cormick conveyed the same land to Henry St. George Tucker, in trust to secure the purchase money. This deed describes the land thus; "the estate called Poplimento, being the same land conveyed to the said Castleman and M'Cormick by an indenture of even date herewith, and to be recorded in the County Court of Frederick, by reference to which a more complete description of the said land may be obtained."

By deed dated the 10th of December, 1818, Benjamin G. Orr assigns and conveys this deed of trust to Frederick C. Graff, together with the lands and premises therein mentioned, and all the right, title and interest of the said Benjamin G. Orr, of, in, and to the same. This deed of assignment minutely and particularly describes the deed of trust, and concludes thus; "to which reference is hereby made, as a part thereof, as if the same were here fully recited." This deed of assignment was made as a security to Graff for the sum of $12,000, to be advanced by him towards completing certain water works, for supplying New-Orleans with water, "according (says the deed) to the terms and conditions of a certain agreement, bearing even date herewith, between the said Benjamin G. Orr, Graff and H. Latrobe." This agreement is in the record, and shews a partnership between Orr, Graff and Latrobe in the adventure of supplying New-Orleans with water; and that Graff, in purchase of one third of the shares for Orr, and two thirds for himself, was to advance the $12,000 as they should be wanting for carrying on the work. Before this assignment of the deed of trust to Graff, Castleman and M'Cormick had paid all the instalments which had grown due; leaving five still to be paid, the first on the 15th of April, and the others annually, on the same day. The instalment of the 15th of April, 1819, they paid to Graff; and this reimbursed him the 198 $3,000 he had advanced to *Orr for the purchase of his shares in the water works. When the time for paying the instalment of 1820 was drawing near, Orr gave notice to Castleman and M'Cormick to pay no more to Graff, as no more was due to him under their agreement. Graff demanded the money; and hereupon, in April, 1820, Castleman and M'Cormick filed a bill of interpleader in the Winchester Chancery Court, stating the facts, and calling on the parties to interplead. Pending this bill, Orr, by deed of November 28th, 1820, assigned to the Bank of Washington, the deed of trust of Castleman and M'Cormick on the Poplimento land, describing the trust deed particularly, and adding, "to which reference is hereby made as part hereof, as if the same were here fully recited." This assignment recites, that it is made as a further security for a debt due from B. G. Orr to the Bank. Being informed of this fact, Castleman and M'Cormick, in April, 1821, filed an amended bill, and made the Bank a party. On the 4th of March, 1822, the children of Dr. Orr gave a written notice to Castleman and M'Cormick, that they claimed the money in their hands, and warning them not to pay to any other person; whereupon, Castleman and M'Cormick, by another amendment, added them to the defendants, in their bill of interpleader. In April, 1822, B. G. Orr died intestate, insolvent, and without having made any appointment among the children, in execution of the power given by his brother's will.

The parties defendant (except Graff,) answered, setting out their claims. Each party defendant also filed a bill making all the rest defendants. All answered, except Graff. It was agreed, that his original bill should be taken as the exhibition of his claim: that the children of J. D. Orr and the Bank should be taken as parties thereto; and that the exhibits in that case be received in the cases of interpleader.

During the progress of the cause, all the instalments, as they became due, were 199 paid into Court. In 1823, the *children filed their bill against the administratrix of B. G. Orr for an account. She answered that she was willing to account. A reference was had, a report returned, and not being excepted to, was confirmed. It showed a balance of $8,052 45 cents, for which there was a decree when assets. The record of this case is by agreement admitted as an exhibit in behalf of the children; and in 1825, the cases being consolidated, and coming on to be heard by consent, as to all parties, the Court rejected the claims of Graff and the Bank, and decreed that the receiver pay to the children the money and interest in his hands, deducting the costs of Castleman and M'Cormick. But the fund in the hands of the children, was decreed to be subject to the claims of the creditors of J. D. Orr, if any there be yet unsatisfied, and legally and equitably entitled to come upon that fund. The payment to the children was, therefore, suspended, till they should each give to the marshal bond with good security in double the amount decreed to them, conditioned to pay their proportions of any debts, which may be established by due course of law, against the estate of J. D. Orr, and against the fund in their hands. From this decree the appeal is taken by Graff and the Bank.

This cause, so important in its principles, so interesting in its character, has been most elaborately and ably argued by counsel.

The first objection taken to the decree is, that the proper parties are not before the Court. It is insisted that, after the death of B. G. Orr, and administrator de bonis non of Dr. Orr, should have been appointed, and made a party to the suit; that the estate of Dr. Orr, for want of this proceeding, is unrepresented; and the case of Hays v. Hays, 5 Munf. 418, is relied on, where this Court dismissed a bill brought by persons suing as children of a deceased residuary legatee, because they were not the legal representatives. This objection seems to me to be founded on a mistake of the nature of the fund. Dr. Orr devised the 200 *land to B. G. Orr, and subjected it to the payment of his debts. He also appointed B. G. Orr his executor and trustee. But, this did not make the land legal assets. This Court decided, in Jones v. Hobson, 2 Rand. 483, that the proceeds of land devised to be sold, are not a testamentary subject; that executors hold such proceeds, not as executors, but as trustees; and that the sureties of an executor are not responsible for the proceeds of land sold by him. Here, the trust embraced not only the payment of debts, but the maintenance and education of the children, and the distribution of the surplus among them; a trust highly confidential and personal. An administrator de bonis non of Dr. Orr would have nothing to do with this fund, and therefore need not be before the Court. The fund certainly belongs either to Graff, the Bank, or the children; and it will seem, that in decreeing it to the latter, the Court of Chancery took especial care to protect their father's creditors. This objection, therefore, has nothing in it, in my opinion; and should be the rather discountenanced, as the parties went to a hearing by consent, intending to waive all irregularities, and come to a decision on the merits.

Taking it up, then, upon the merits, we are to enquire, to which of these claimants the property belongs. All derive title from the will of Dr. Orr; the children, directly; the others through the medium of B. G. Orr. By the will, it is clear, that B. G. Orr was a fiduciary merely; that he had not the slightest beneficiary interest in the estate. It is all devised to him, first, to pay debts; secondly, to distribute among the children. Ample powers and a wide discretion are given him, but solely for the attainment of these objects. All the property is subjected to the payment of his debts; "leaving the mode of raising the funds from the estate, to the sound discretion of my brother." After payment of the debts, the surplus is to be divided among his children, "in such shares and proportions, as in the sound discretion and judgment of my brother, shall seem most agreeable and expedient." As re-201 gards the "children, the will places him in loco parentis; but, this relates merely to his power of managing the fund for them, and distributing it among them. It gives him no individual interest in, or right to, one cent of it. If all the children had died infants, he could not, under the will, have claimed an atom of the estate.

But, granting all this; it was contended in the argument, that under the powers given to B. G. Orr, and the circumstances attending these transactions, the law would compel this Court to support the assignments of the deed of trust, both to Graff and the Bank; and that, whether B. G. Orr acted as executor or as trustee in the assignments. Let us examine this, taking him first as executor, and secondly, as trustee.

In the cases of Nugent v. Giffard, 2 Ves. 269, and 1 Atk. 463; Meade v. Ld. Orrery, 3 Atk. 235, and Tanner v. Ivie, 2 Ves. 466, Lord Hardwicke would not suffer creditors or legatees to follow assets into the hands of a purchaser from the executor or administrator, unless there was evidence of fraud or collusion between them. Nor did he consider it evidence of such fraud and collusion, that the executor was applying the assets to the payment of his own individual debt, and this, with the knowledge of the purchaser.

In Whale v. Booth, cited 4 Term Rep. 625, note, Lord Mansfield went quite as far. He said, "the general rule, both of law and equity, is clear, that an executor may dispose of the assets of the testator: that over them, he has absolute power; and that they cannot be followed by the testator's creditors. It would be monstrous, if it were otherwise; for, then no one would deal with an executor. He must sell in order to effect the will; but who would buy if liable to be called to an account. It is also clear, that if, at the time, the purchaser knows they are assets, that is no evidence of fraud, for all the testator's debts may be satisfied; or, if he knows that the debts are not all satisfied, must he look to the application of the money chaser and the executor to make a devastavit."

These decisions have certainly been much narrowed and modified, if not overruled, by the later cases. Thus, in Bonny v. Ridgard, 1 Cox. 145, Lord Kenyon, Master of the Rolls, speaking of the case of Meade v. Ld. Orrery, says, "It certainly becomes me to think much, before I differ from Lord Hardwicke, but I cannot subscribe to his opinion in that case; and if it had come before me, I should have decided it in direct opposition to that authority." "Nothing can be clearer," he says, "than that an executor may go to market with his testator's assets, and that in general a purchaser will not be bound to see to the application of the money; but, common honesty requires, that if there is either express or implied fraud, the parties shall not avail themselves of it." The circumstances of the case before him were these. R. W. having several leasehold estates, made his will, and gave them to his wife, and their daughters, to be equally divided between them; and desired that his said estates might be sold the first opportunity, as his executors might think most proper; and made his wife and another, executors. The widow alone proved the will, and entered on the premises. She married Ridgard soon after; they mortgaged the premises to M.; and afterwards, assigned the equity of redemption to Barnard, and 6l. paid in hand, at the date of the assignment. The bill was filed by the daughters and their husbands against Ridgard and wife, Barnard and his vendee, to set aside the assignment to Barnard, and for account, &c. Sir Thomas Sewal, Master of the Rolls, before whom the cause was first heard, thought that the children should not be prejudiced by the assignment, and decreed accordingly. The cause was re-heard before Lord Kenyon. After laying down the general principle before quoted, he applies it thus; "The fund in the hands of the widow was applicable to the payment of the debts, and after that, 203 to 'certain defined purposes declared by the will. Barnard had full notice of the will. He knew that after the debts were paid, this fund ought to be so applied; and he therefore connived at its being misapplied. If then the case turned on this, I should be bound to set aside the transaction, or rather to turn the defendants into trustees for the plaintiffs." But, on the ground of delay, (near twenty years having passed after the youngest child came of age, before filing the bill) he dismissed the cause.

The next case I shall cite is Scott v. Tyler, 2 Dickens, 712. In that case, an executrix, as a security for her own debt, had disposed of bonds, the assets of her testator, four years after his death. The Bankers swore that they knew nothing of the will, and believed the bonds to be her own property, not that of the testator. Lord Thurlow says, "If one conceals with an executor, by obtaining the testator's effects at a nominal value, or at a fraudulent undervalue, or by applying the real value to the purchase of other subjects for his own behoof, or in extinguishing the private debt of the executor, or in any other manner contrary to the duty of the office of executor, such concert will involve the seeming purchaser or his pawnee, and make him liable for the value." He concludes, "I think the defendant Hankey must deliver up the bonds, and account for the interest they have received upon them." The part of Lord Thurlow's opinion touching these bonds, was not delivered in Court, because that part of the case was compromised; but in 17 Ves. 165. Lord Eldon says, "With regard to the case of Scott v. Tyler, I can confirm the assertion of Mr. Dickens, that the judgment stated by him contains Lord Thurlow's opinion, intended to have been delivered as his judgment, if a compromise had not taken place."

In Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. 152, Sir William Grant set aside the transfer of assets by an executor, to secure his individual debt, under circumstances of gross negligence, though not of direct fraud in 204 the creditors, to whom *they were transferred. He says, "Though it may be dangerous, at all to restrain the power of purchasing from an executor, what inconvenience can there be in holding, that the assets, known to be such, should not be applied in any case for the executor's debt, unless the creditor could be first satisfied of his right? It may be essential that the executor should have the power to sell the assets; but it is not essential, that he should have the power to pay his own creditor; and it is not just that one man's property should be applied to the payment of another man's debt." Of the creditors he says, "I do not impute to them direct fraud; but they acted rashly, incautiously, and without the common attention used in the ordinary course of business. It was gross negligence not to look at the will, under which alone a title could be given to them."

The case of M'Leod v. Drummond, 14 Ves. 352; 17 Ves. 152, was one of a pledge by the executor of the testator's bonds, upon advances of money. The bill was filed by a co-executor, and it was dismissed by Sir William Grant. The bonds pledged were specifically bequeathed by the testator, and the money was advanced at the time the pledge was made, and upon the credit of it. The Master of the Rolls said he had found no case, where the money had been advanced at the time to the full value of the assets, that it was ever called back. Lord Eldon, on the appeal, affirmed the decree at the Rolls, on the length of time and some other particular circumstances; but it seems clear, that on the general doctrine he did not agree entirely with the Master of the Rolls. He goes into a laborious and able review of all the cases. "The Master of the Rolls," he says, "truly observes that there is a great difference between advancing money at the time upon securities, and taking a security in discharge of an antecedent debt; but that is by no means conclusive. The argument is carried nearly to this extent; that a person lending money at the time, upon the deposit of the securities, can hardly be supposed to mean fraud, as there is no 205 temptation *to fraud. Admitting, however, that the Bankers had no other motive for the advance upon such a deposit, than they generally have; if it appears in the transaction itself, that the borrower is about to apply the money so raised on the testator's property, to objects with which his affairs have no connection, I should hesitate to say, that as the temptation was so slight, this Court would not examine, whether that was not a most inequitable transaction, with reference to the persons entitled to that property."

I also refer to the case of Field v. Schieffelin, et al. 7 Johns. Chan. Rep. 150, where the cases are reviewed by Kent, Ch., and the conclusion from the whole drawn with his usual clearness and ability.

In the case of Dodson v. Simpson, also 2 Rand. 294, the doctrine is correctly, though briefly laid down.

The latest English case that I have met with, is Keane v. Roberts, 4 Mad. Ch. Rep. 332. There the Vice Chancellor gives the result of an examination of all the cases, thus: "Every person who acquires personal assets by a breach of trust, or devastavit in the executor, is responsible to those who are entitled under the will, if he is a party to the breach of trust. Generally speaking, he does not become a party to the breach of trust, by buying or receiving as a pledge, for money advanced to the executor at the time, any part of the personal assets, whether specifically given by the will, or otherwise; because this sale or pledge is held to be prima facie consistent with the duty of an executor. Generally speaking, he does become a party to the breach of trust, by buying or receiving in pledge any part of the personal assets, not for money advanced at the time, but in satisfaction of his private debt; because this sale or pledge is prima facie inconsistent with the duty of an executor. I preface both these propositions with the words generally speaking, because they both seem to admit of exceptions. Thus a sale or pledge for the private debt of the executor, has been supported under special circumstances, in Lord Hardwicke's

206 two *cases of Nugent v. Gifford, and Meade v. Lord Orrery, though not entirely to the satisfaction of every succeeding Judge; and Lord Eldon seems to consider the case of M'Leod v. Drummond as an exception to the first proposition. It was upon the principles of these propositions, that Sir W. Grant proceeded in M'Leod v. Drummond. He there supported the pledges of the testator's bonds, because they were deposited in respect of advances made at the time. In the same case, Lord Eldon, on the appeal, admitted these principles, but seemed to consider the circumstances of that case, as forming an exception to the general rule. The advances, though made at the time, were made to two executors who were partners as army agents, and necessarily, therefore, for their private purposes; and he inclined to think that the Bankers were, for that reason, as much parties to the breach of trust, as if they had applied the money to pay the private debt of the executors. I cannot," he adds, "but lean strongly to Lord El-don's view of that case. If a party dealing with an executor for the personal assets, pays his money to the executor, so that it may be applied to the purposes of the will, he is not responsible for the executor's misapplication of it. But, if in dealing with the executor, he does in truth pay his money for the private purposes of the executor, he is equally a party to the breach of trust, whether he applies his money to the private debt of the executor, or to the private trade of the executor." This is a clear statement of the doctrine as settled by a long course of decisions; settled too, as I think, on the basis of reason and equity; for, I heartily agree with Sir William Grant, that it is not essential that an executor should have the power of paying his own creditor with the assets; nor is it just that one man's property should be applied to the payment of another man's debt.

Let us apply this doctrine to the case of the claimants here: and first to Graff, whose case is certainly much the strongest.

He took a transfer of the trust property, as a *security for money to be advanced to the private trade of the executor; a trade, having not the slightest connection with the estate of the testator, or the objects of the trust. But, it is objected that he had no notice of the nature of the fund, or the right in which B. G. Orr held it. Of express notice, there is no proof; and it is insisted, that this is a case, to which constructive notice does not apply; that it applies to the purchaser of real estate only, who cannot protect himself as a purchaser without notice, till he has used due diligence in the examination of his title. No authority is cited to support this distinction. In all the cases which I have adduced, personal chattels were the subject; and yet the doctrine of implied notice is considered as applying to them; and the case of Hill v. Simpson is decided expressly on that ground.

Again. The assignment here, was of an incumbrance on land, in effect a mortgage; and we know that the doctrine of constructive notice, is constantly applied to such incumbrances. Upon the ground of reason, what difference is there, whether the subject be real or personal estate? He who purchases any subject, with notice of the equitable right of another, is the trustee for that other, to the extent of his equity; and this, whether the notice be express or implied. Express and implied notice differ, not in their effect, but in the mode of proof only. In the one, you prove the fact of notice expressly; in the other, you prove circumstances, which raise a presumption of notice; and if the presumption be strong enough to fix the notice, it affects the conscience of the party just as much as express notice. Thus in any purchase, if there be circumstances which, in the exercise of common reason and prudence, ought to put a man upon a particular enquiry, he will be presumed to have made that enquiry, and will be charged with notice of every fact, which that enquiry would give him; and this conclusion is a just and necessary one; for, if a party means to deal fairly, self-interest, the strongest principle of action, will prompt him to the enquiry; and if he means to deal fraudulently, the rule prevents him from voluntarily shutting his eyes, and saying he had no notice. This reasoning applies as well to real as personal estate. Both upon reason and authority, then, this is a case to which constructive notice applies; and of this, there was the clearest and strongest.

The deed of assignment refers to the deed of trust as a part of itself. The deed of trust refers expressly to the original deed, and that as expressly, to the will of Dr. Orr, where the whole trust is declared. Of this trust, then, Graff had full notice, and knew that by the trade, the executor was committing a gross breach of trust. He was a party to that breach, "by paying his money to this private trade of the executor."

But it is said, that this was an advancement of money at the time; and it cannot be imagined that there was any temptation to the lender to commit a fraud for the purpose of securing the return of that same money, which he then had, and might have kept; and Sir William Grant's opinion in M'Leod v. Drummond, is relied on. We have seen, however, that Lord Eldon differed from Sir W. Grant in this; as did the Vice Chancellor in Keane v. Roberts. But in truth, this was neither an advancement at the time, nor was it a simple loan of money. It was a purchase of shares in the New Orleans water works, and an agreement to advance, as the money should be wanting for carrying on the work. The strong temptation was held out to Graff, of entering into a speculation, by which he might double and treble his money, at the same time that he provided for his safety by taking a security on the trust fund. His case, therefore, does not come at all within the reason of those, where a party, meaning simply to lend his money at legal interest, (which he can always do,) is supposed to lie under no temptation to commit a fraud, in taking a security for its return.

I have thus far considered B. G. Orr as executor; but it is, in truth, a case of pure trust, as I have already shewn: 209 *and this, it will be found, makes it a much stronger case for the cestui que trusts. Thus, in Andrew v. Wrigley, 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 125, Lord Alvanley, Master of the Rolls, says, "With respect to a trust for payment of debts, there is no pretence that such a trustee could alien in payment of his own debt;" and he refers to Ithel v. Beane, 1 Ves. 215. There an estate was devised to a son, subject to payment of debts. The son mortgaged the land to a creditor of the father, who also advanced to the son more money. Lord Hardwicke held that this mortgage should interfere in no manner with the rights of the father's other creditors. He says, "This is not like the case of an executor, who, having power to administer the assets, and the legal estate in him, may sell a term, and the vendee retain it, and this even to satisfy a debt of his own. But, that is owing to the legal power of an executor over the assets, upon which this Court will not break in.

But, it was never held, that if a devisee in trust mortgaged to a creditor of his own, for satisfaction or security of that debt, such mortgagee having notice of the trust, should retain the estate against the creditors under that trust."

In Read v. Snell, 2 Atk. 642, Lord Hardwicke, in considering the power of executors, who were also trustees, and to whom a very large discretion was given by the will, says, "Here the executors are made trustees, and therefore, from the nature of the thing, are to take nothing for their own benefit, unless it had been particularly given to them. They have no ownership, and therefore cannot alter the interests of the cestui que trust."

In Mabank v. Metcalfe, 3 Atk. 95, Lord Hardwicke says, "There is an established difference in this Court, between an executor and a trustee. For, the trustee has the legal right only, and is merely nominal; but, an executor has something more in him than the mere legal right as a bare trustee; for, he has a beneficial interest, if there is any surplus."

Dickerson v. Lockyear, 4 Ves. 36, is also a strong case to shew the difference between an executor and a trustee.

210 *There, an act done by a trustee was set aside, though no fraud was imputed; the Chancellor saying, that if it had been the act of an executor, he should not have quarrelled with it; because the executor had the whole legal property, was bound to pay debts, and might convert assets. "But," (he says,) "what was Lockyear's situation, what was his legal power? He was no executor. He is devisee nominally, it is true, of all the effects; but in trust, &c.," for the purposes of the will. Thus we see, that taking B. G. Orr for what he really was, a trustee, the case is still more clear against those who dealt with him.

It was contended in the argument, (but, as I thought, not with confidence,) that at the time of the assignment to Graff, B. G. Orr was so far in advance to the estate of his brother, as to be authorised to appropriate to his private trade, the $15,000 due on Poplimento. The answer seems to be, that Graff being a purchaser with notice of the trust, dealt with Orr at his peril: that it devolved on him to shew Orr's authority for diverting the trust fund to his individual use: that if he had meant to rely on Orr's being in advance, he should have made that a part of his case, put it in issue, and had an account settled to establish the fact. Nothing of this kind was done. The fact is not stated in Graff's bill, and the only evidence we have on the subject, is a report made by a commissioner, in a case to which Graff was no party. A report made with no view to the fact of Orr's being in advance to the estate at any particular time; and which, if evidence at all in Graff's case, by no means establishes the fact.

I shall waste no time on the case of the Bank, which is much weaker than Graff's, and to which all the law and reasons adduced apply a multo fortiori. Nor shall I trouble myself with canvassing the claims of Graff or the Bank against B. G. Orr individually. It is enough for the purposes of this cause, that they have no claim upon the trust fund.

I am clear that the decree of the Court below be affirmed.

JUDGES GREEN, COALTER and CABELL concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

June, 1827.

Conveyance of Personality—Retention of Possession by Grantor—Effect.—Where the grantor of personal property remains in possession after an absolute conveyance, such conveyance will be deemed prima facie fraudulent.

Same—Same—Same.—But, such possession is not conclusive evidence of fraud, but is open to explanation.

Same—Same—Same—Conveyance by Woman—Pending Marriagej—Case at Bar.—Therefore, where a woman about to be married makes a conveyance of her personal property to a third person, with the privity and approbation of her intended husband, the marriage takes place a few minutes after the conveyance, and the husband takes possession of the property after the marriage; the property thus conveyed will not be subject to the husband's creditors, as his possession after marriage was not that of his wife, (she not being sui juris,) and her short possession between the time of the conveyance and that of the marriage, not being sufficient, or of a nature to render the deed fraudulent.

Same—Same—Same—Same—Same—Recordation.—Such a conveyance, although not recorded, is not void under the statute of frauds, (even supposing it to be a deed of trust) against the creditors of the husband, as the statute only applies to creditors of the grantor. The case of Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch's Rep. 154, reviewed and approved. Dissentiente GREEN, Judge.

Unrecorded Deeds—Statute—Creditors Protected.—In Snyder v. Martin, 17 W. Va. 287, it is said: "Formerly it was held that the 'creditors' who are protected by the statute against unrecorded deeds, were the creditors of the grantors only. Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch 154; Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211; Prior v. Kinney, 6 Munf. 510. In the case of Land v. Jeffries, JUDGE GREEN, 'in one of the ablest opinions ever delivered by that learned judge,' as observed by JUDGE ALLEN in Thomas v. Gaines, 1 Gratt. 347, dissented from the opinion of the court. MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON also dissented from the opinion of the court in Pierce v. Turner. In Thomas v. Gaines, 1 Gratt. 347, the court overruled the former decisions and established the law in accordance with JUDGE GREEN's dissenting opinion in Land v. Jeffries. But after the last decision was announced at the revival of 1849, the question was settled by statute."

to sundry slaves, as her dower 'in the estate of S. B. Birdsong, her former husband, and intending to marry Jeffries, executed, on the 3d day of October, 1814, a deed, conveying to Land, her brother, the said slave, together with certain household and kitchen furniture, of which she was absolute owner. The deed is a simple bill of sale, without condition or trust expressed on its face. The marriage took place immediately after this deed was executed. It was made for the purpose of securing the property of Mrs. Birdsong from the claims of the creditors of Jeffries, who was then greatly involved in debt. At the time of the execution of the deed, Land, the grantee, was absent in the public service. The slaves continued in the possession of Jeffries after the marriage, and were hired to him by Land. The deed was admitted to record on the 13th day of May, 1815, in the "County Court of Sussex, (all the parties residing in the said county, and the property being there situated,) upon the certificate of two magistrates, that Mrs. Jeffries "acknowledged the within writing to be her act and deed, and that she made the same before her intermarriage with her present husband John M. Jeffries, during her single life, and in willing the same should be recorded in the County Court of Sussex." The subscribing witness also, Nathaniel D. Land, made oath that the bill of sale was signed and acknowledged before the intermarriage of Mrs. Birdsong with her present husband John M. Jeffries.

Charles H. Stewart having obtained a judgment against Jeffries, caused an execution to be levied on some of the slaves conveyed by the bill of sale to Land. Mrs. Jeffries, by Land as her next friend, and as her trustee, filed a bill to injoin the sale of the slaves aforesaid, and for general relief.

Depositions were taken in the cause, the substance of which, so far as they are material to this report, are stated in the opinion of Judge Carr.

The Chancellor granted an injunction, and afterwards dissolved it; from which order an appeal was granted.

June 4. The Judges delivered their opinions.

JUDGE CARR.

Mrs. Birdsong was a widow possessed of some slaves, which she held in right of dower, and some furniture, of which she was absolute owner. Being about to be married to the defendant Jeffries, she executed an absolute deed of gift of her slaves and furniture, to her brother, J. W. Land. This deed was drawn by the

213 defendant Jeffries, (a lawyer,) and executed with his assent, and in his presence. The marriage took place on the same day: Land, the brother, was absent when the deed was executed, and no delivery of the property to him, was made. It went, on the marriage, into the possession of the defendant Jeffries. In 1815, he executed a note to Land, the brother, purporting to be for the hire of the slaves. The deed was acknowledged by Mrs. Jeffries, before two magistrates in May, 1815, and on their certificate, admitted to record. The slaves remained with the husband about three years, when an execution of the defendant Stewart, on a judgment against Jeffries, was levied on some of them; and the wife, by Land as her next friend, and also as trustee for her, filed a bill to restrain the sale, and have a decree for the property. The bill states, that the deed, though absolute on its face, was intended to be a deed of trust, conveying the property to Land for the separate use of his sister, and with the express purpose of securing it from the creditors of Jeffries, who was known to be very much involved. The creditor Stewart, and Jeffries the husband, are made defendants. Jeffries answers, acknowledging the statement in the bill, the purpose of the deed, his belief that his wife would not have married him, without having her property secured to her separate use; and that the deed was drawn by him to effect that purpose. Stewart answers, denying his knowledge of any secret trust; denying that the deed was ever properly recorded; stating that the husband had full possession; that the note executed for hire was a mere sham; and contending that under the circumstances, the property was subject to his execution.

The Chancellor dissolved the injunction, thereby disaffirming the claim of the plaintiffs, and subjecting the property to the payment of the husband's debts.

The decision of this cause depends mainly upon the effect which we are to give to the deed executed by the widow just before her marriage. Accordingly, the principal stress of the argument has turned 214 on this deed, and it has *been assailed in every shape which ingenuity could devise. Let us consider, in the first place, what kind of deed it is.

Upon its face, it is a simple deed of gift of slaves and furniture. If the evidence of parol declarations of the widow previous to the execution, and at the very moment of executing it, be admissible, I should feel very little doubt that her fixed purpose was, not to marry, without having her property secured in such a way, that it would remain for her use, protected from the creditors of the husband. That previous declarations are admissible, we have several cases to shew. 2 Vern. 303; Waltham v. Johnson, 2 Call, 275; Jones v. Robertson, 2 Munf. 191. In this last case, the party had executed a deed of gift, and afterwards brought a bill to set it aside, on the ground that she supposed she was executing a will. The defendant, who was charged with the fraud, denied it by his answer; and the subscribing witnesses to the deed, agreed with his answer in their evidence; but neither of them swore that Mrs. Robertson read the deed, or heard it read. On the other side were the previous declarations of Mrs. Robertson, that she meant to get the defendant to alter her will; and it was also proved, that she appeared greatly astonished, when she afterwards discovered that she had executed a deed of gift. This Court did not hesitate to set the deed aside, on this evidence.

In the case before us, several witnesses prove, from a month before the marriage up to the moment of executing the deed, that the widow uniformly said she would never marry Jeffries, unless her property was secured to her, and from his creditors. It is proved that she knew he was involved. She had been talked to by her friends; and had received the advice of her former guardian, to have her property conveyed to her brother, and let him see the deed; and we have the evidence of another brother, who afterwards subscribed the deed as a witness, that on the morning of the marriage, she asked him to shew the deed to Wyche, her former guardian, (then in the house,) and *get him to examine it, and witness it; and what is still stronger, it is proved by a female witness, who stood behind her chair when she executed the deed, that just as she was about to sign her name, she turned to Jeffries and asked if that was sufficient to secure her property to her; and he answered, yes, her property could never be taken for his debts. I know very well that it is a general rule, as laid down by this Court in several cases, and among others in Ratcliffe v. Allison, 3 Rand. 537, "that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict, or substantially vary the legal import of a deed or written agreement;" but I know also, that it is an exception to that rule, that "fraud, mistake or surprise, in the execution of a contract, deed or other writing, may be shewn by parol evidence." The evidence here proves clearly to my mind, that (if not fraud,) at least mistake and surprise, have intervened. It no where appears that Mrs. Birdsong ever read the deed, or heard it read; and if she had, I presume she would hardly have known the difference between a common deed and a deed of trust. Her determination was fixed, to have her property secured to her. How this was to be effected, she probably knew no more than a child. She tried to avail herself of the experience of her former guardian. But, here she was thwarted by the confidence of her brother in Jeffries. He had said the deed was sufficient; and the brother did not think further enquiry necessary. What more could this helpless woman do? That the object she had in view would have been best effected by a deed of trust conveying the legal estate to her brother for her separate use, is most clear; but instead of that, she has executed an absolute deed of gift, divesting herself wholly, both of the legal and equitable title. Did she mean to do this? All the evidence, the whole aspect of the transaction, prove that she did not: that she thought she was doing the very opposite, securing the property to herself. Is not here then mistake, surprise? And could there be a more legitimate, appropriate object, for the aid of equity? 216

*Suppose her brother, being clothed with the whole interest, had taken possession of the property, claimed it as his own, and refused to let her in to the receipt of the profits. Can it be doubted, that on a bill by her, equity would have corrected the deed, and set up the trust? But her brother is the plaintiff, has declared the trust in his bill, and asked the aid of equity to execute it; and if there were nothing else in the cause, there would be no difficulty. But the property was never delivered to the grantee; remained with the widow till her marriage; then went into the possession of her husband, where it continued till a creditor of his levied an execution on some of the negroes. This brings up the question, is this property subject to be taken to satisfy the debts of the husband's creditors?

It is contended that it is so subject, because the deed to Land is void as to those creditors, 1st, as a deed fraudulent per se; 2d, under the statute of frauds.

1. Was the possession of the widow, from the execution of the deed to her marriage, such as to constitute fraud per se? Before we pronounce upon this, it may not be amiss to reflect a moment upon this doctrine of fraud per se. It is not statute law, and therefore not a strict positive thing. It is a rule of the Courts, founded in reason and convenience. It is not every possible case, in which possession remaining with the grantor constitutes fraud. The possession may be consisted with the deed. The purpose of a deed is to convey the title of the property to the grantee; and if the conveyance be immediate and absolute, possession ought to accompany it. If it remain with the grantor longer than in the natural course of fair transactions it ought, it creates a strong presumption of a secret trust; and unexplained, constitutes a fraud; but it may be explained. For instance; if I buy a slave, pay for him, and take an absolute bill of sale; he remains three or four months with the seller; this, without explanation, would amount to fraud. But, suppose I prove that during the whole of that time, he was so ill that a removal would have endangered

217 *his life; this would remove the imputation of fraud. Suppose I buy a horse in the country, and tell the seller, I will send for him to-morrow. In the mean time an execution is levied on him; does any body doubt that I would recover him?

In Lady Arundel v. Phipps, 10 Ves. 144, Lord Eldon says, "The mere circumstance of possession of chattels, however familiar it is to say that it proves fraud, amounts to no more than that it is prima facie evidence of property in the man possessing, until a title not fraudulent is shewn, under which that possession has followed. Every case from Twyne's Case downward, supports that."

The case of Kidd v. Rawlinson, 2 Bos. & Pull. 58, and Watkins v. Burch, 4 Taunt. 823, speak the same language. In Wilt v. Franklin, 1 Binn. 502, the deed was made on Saturday night, just after a judgment had been recovered against the grantor. It conveyed all the debtor's property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors. The trustee lived twenty-three miles off. On Monday, before the trustee had received notice of the deed, and while the property was yet in possession of the debtor, the execution of the judgment creditor was levied on it; and the question was, whether the deed was fraudulent. The Court decided that it was not. Ch. J. Tilghman said, "The 13th of Elizabeth, (the provisions of which go no further than the common law, as now understood,) never had it in contemplation to invalidate a fair transaction." He adds, "I agree in general, the continuance in possession of the grantor, is one of the strongest marks of fraud, especially if such possession continues a long time. But possession is not always, in itself, conclusive evidence of fraud, but is open to explanation."

Let us now consider the point of Mrs. Birdsong's possession. The first reflection which strikes us here, is the difference of situation between Mrs. Birdsong and that class, to which these doctrines of fraud are generally applied.

218 *The debtor, who finds himself deeply involved, and expects soon to be stripped of his property, is under a strong temptation to make such a disposition of that property, as may shield it from his creditors, and yet not deprive him wholly of its use. But, this would be dishonest; and to prevent it, is the object of the Statutes of Frauds, and the doctrine of the Courts in furtherance of them. Every step of the debtor is watched with the utmost care, and looked upon with jealousy and suspicion. The end he has in view being fraudulent, it is the object of the law, and the effort of the Courts, to defeat it, whatever may be the means resorted to. But, how does this reasoning apply to Mrs. Birdsong? She had no creditors. The property was her own. No one had a right to object to any disposition of it. She had constantly declared openly, that the creditors of Jeffries should never have it; that she would put it out of their reach. This was an object which she had a perfect power and right to effect. Her intended husband had no objection to it. There could not exist, therefore, the least inducement to secrecy, collusion or fraud. The end being fair, it was natural that it should be attained by fair and open means. Accordingly, we see not a vestige of concealment in the execution of the deed. The wedding guests seem generally to have known it. These considerations furnish strong prima facie evidence against the idea, that in executing the deed Mrs. Birdsong intended to commit a fraud; and we are told by Mr. Justice Doddridge, in Shepard's Touchstone, 67, that "when a conveyance is not fraudulent at the time of making it, it shall never be said to be fraudulent for any matter ex post facto."

In Estwick v. Callaud, also, 5 Term Rep. 425, Ashurst, J. says, "The question here is whether this were or were not a legal deed; and that depends on the intention of the parties, at the time when it was executed."

If there was no imagination of fraud in the execution of the deed, it is difficult to conceive how the retaining possession from that time till her marriage, could be considered *fraudulent. She was married the same day, perhaps the next hour. In this brief space, it is impossible to believe that possession could conduce either to her own advantage, or to the deception of others. No one indeed can suppose, that in that anxious and interesting moment, her mind turned for an instant to the subject; and if it had, possession could not have been delivered, as her brother was absent. Her possession, then, after the deed, I consider as furnishing not the slightest evidence of fraud.

But it is said, that immediately on the marriage, her husband took possession of all the property, which remained with him three years; thus holding out to the world the idea that he had acquired it by marriage, and tending to deceive creditors. Taking the ground that this was intended to be a deed of trust, preserving the property to her separate use, this possession of the husband was not incompatible with the deed. In fact, it was the natural course of things. She having the slaves in possession, and living with her husband, they would of course seem to be in his possession. This was the case in Jarman v. Woolleton, and Haalington v. Gill, 3 Term Rep. 618; and in those cases the Court said the wife was the agent for the trustees. But again: If the wife made the deed honestly, how could the possession of the husband affect it with fraud? On the marriage, her power and will ceased. She was no longer sui juris. She could oppose no obstacle to the possession of her husband; and surely, it would be a most harsh construction which should sacrifice her rights to that possession. Suppose he had chosen to exercise acts of ownership of the most unequivocal character. Ought this to have bound her? Could she have been considered as consenting?

In Lady Arundel v. Phipps, 10 Ves. 139, there are several features resembling very much the case before us. By a marriage settlement, Lady Arundel had several estates settled to herself and husband for life, then in strict settlement, and for default of heirs, to be disposed of as she 220 * (notwithstanding coverture,) should, by deed or writing, under her hand and seal, &c. direct, &c. They had two daughters; no son. Lord Arundel becoming very much involved, and his creditors pressing him, Lady Arundel, by her trustees, made a contract with him, by which she purchased certain paintings, plate, jewels, china, glass, &c. about his mansion houses of Wardour, Lanherne and Irnham, for the sum of 12,000*l.* to be raised out of her estates, and applied towards the payment of his debts; the plate, jewels, &c. to be conveyed by Lord Arundel to her trustees, for her separate use. The deeds were executed. The plate, jewels, &c. remained in the different mansion houses; and a creditor of Lord Arundel levied an execution on some of them. An injunction was applied for to stop the sale, and granted. On a motion to dissolve. Lord Eldon considers the case very fully in various points of view. As to the possession remaining with the husband, he says, "What is the nature of the property, and the sort of possession naturally to be looked for? When Lady Arundel was making a settlement for the benefit of her daughters, afterwards, in all probability, to enjoy the possession of this ancient family seat, there was neither legal nor moral fraud in taking the property, for which she paid the value. But the nature of the property, the relation of the parties, the circumstances that she could have no object but to transmit it to her family, and that she must live with him who sold it; these circumstances, are very material as to the possession. It is said, that Lord Arundel dealt with creditors as if this was his property; and there might be a considerable question, whether his or the steward's dealings in conversation or correspondence with creditors, as if this was part of the husband's property, is to be admitted in a question between husband and wife."

These remarks seem to me very sound, and very applicable to the case before us. I do not think, therefore, that the possession of the husband can be so referred to the deed, as to charge the wife with the husband had remained five years in possession, it would have raised the question under our statute of frauds, how far such possession would have given his creditors a title; but that question cannot arise here.

But it is said, that this deed has never been recorded according to law, and therefore is void as to the husband's creditors. I think it unnecessary to decide whether this deed has been properly recorded; for, taking it as an unrecorded deed, I do not think it void as to the creditors of the husband.

Consider this, first, under our Act of conveyances. This deed comes neither within the first or second sections of that Act, as it is neither a conveyance of lands, nor a covenant or agreement made in consideration of marriage. The fourth section declares all bargains, sales, and other conveyances of lands, &c., all deeds of settlement upon marriage, &c., all deeds of trust and mortgages, &c., void as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, &c., unless recorded according to the directions of the Act. It is only as a deed of trust, that the deed before us can come within this Act. It is certainly not a deed with a trust declared on the face of it; and it was contended in the argument, with great force, that to such only did the case apply. But, without deciding that point, we will take it as a deed of trust within the Act. For want of recording, it is declared void as to all creditors, &c. This cannot mean all creditors in rerum natura. If not all, it is natural to ask, what creditors does the Act mean? I answer, creditors of the person from whom the estate moved, the grantor. As to those creditors meant by the law, the deed operates nothing. The estate attempted to be conveyed, remains in statu quo. It is declared void for the benefit of those creditors. Now, is it the creditors of grantor or grantee, who are benefited by the nullity of the deed? Surely the former; for, the deed being void, the estate remains in their debtor, and they may resort to it. But, it cannot mean the cred-

222 itors of both grantor and *grantee; for, they claim in different rights; one against the deed, the other under it. If the deed be void, the creditor of the

In the case before us, it is said that the creditors of the husband do not claim under the deed of the wife, but against it. But, they must claim under the husband. He is their debtor. It is in the character of creditors that they claim; and if not under their debtor, then I ask under whom they claim. It is compared to the case of a man's making a fraudulent deed of his property, which, though binding on him, is void as to his creditors, and they may take the property, though he could not. But, the comparison does not hold; for there, the grantor had property in him. He attempted to part with it, and did, so far as he was concerned; but the deed being void as to creditors, the property, as to them, still remained in their debtor. But, here the debtor never, for an instant of time, had a scintilla juris in the property. The deed intercepted his marital rights, and having his assent, binds him and all claiming by, through, or under him. If the creditors do not thus claim, they are not bound by the deed. But I should like to know, how else they can claim. Did the husband commit any fraud upon his creditors, by assenting to the deed? Certainly not. They might wish indeed, that he could so drive his matrimonial bargain, as to enlarge the fund accessible to them; but they could not say to him, "you shall do nothing which may intercept your marital rights, and thus keep from us the property of your intended bride." If the husband was guilty of no fraud towards them, still less can it be imagined that the wife, in securing her property from them, committed a fraud.

The question, what creditors are meant by the law, and whether it comprehends the creditors of the husband, is so clearly and fully treated in the case of Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch, 154, that I cannot do better than refer to it, in support of my opinion. Taking the deed before us as a deed of trust, the two cases are exactly similar in principle; for, though the husband signed the deed there, he assented to it here, which was just as effectual to bind. There the feme, just before marriage, executed a deed of trust, conveying her property to a trustee, for the use of herself and husband during life, and to her heirs. The husband signed merely as evidence of his assent. The deed was never recorded. On the marriage, the property, (slaves and land,) went into his possession, and remained with him till his death; less than five years. The widow took possession of the property, and the husband's creditors sued her, contending that the slaves were subject to their debts, because the deed not having been recorded, was, as to them, void, under our Act regulating conveyances. This brought up the very question, whether the words in that Act, "all creditors," included creditors of the husband. The Court consider, first, the general question, whether in deeds within the Act, all creditors mean creditors of both grantor and grantee. They say

(in effect, for I am not quoting their words,) that it can never be the interest of the creditor of a grantee, to insist that the deed to the grantee is void; except in one case, to wit, where a better title can be set up for the grantee, paramount the title of the grantor; for, in every other case, the creditor must derive his title under the deed of the grantor; and, if it be void as to the grantee, the creditor can found no claim upon it, in right of the grantee. "It would be strange," they say, "that a deed should be binding as to the grantee and his heirs, and yet void as to persons claiming under him, for a valuable consideration. Indeed, it would seem repugnant and absurd, to apply the same expressions (all creditors) to persons who, if they claim at all, must claim under the deed, and also to those who claim against the deed. In the latter case, the invalidity of the deed is consistent with the 'claim; in the former, it is destructive of it." The Court then proceed to speak of the particular case, and observe, that it may be said that the general reasoning does not apply to it, because the creditors of the husband do not claim under, but against the deed, and thus stand on the same ground with the creditors of the grantor. But, (they ask) by what rule of construction can the invalidity of the deed be applied in this particular case, to creditors claiming, not under the grantor, but another party to the deed; when in every other case which can be stated, that invalidity is applicable to the creditors of the grantor or those claiming under him, and to none other? The Court then put several cases, shewing the absurd consequences which would follow from taking the words all creditors to include creditors of the husband; and observe, that these difficulties are all avoided, by restraining them to their proper meaning. "If they are construed to mean creditors of the grantor and those claiming under him, then the deed being good between all the parties to it, no estate vested in Turner, but such as the deed itself vested in him. The title of his creditors being clearly derivative, if he had no title under the deed, then his creditors could have none. But, if he had a title incompatible with that granted by the deed, then he was not bound by the deed; contrary to the statute which declares that he was bound. If his creditors have any title, it cannot be derived from him, when in point of law, he had none in himself; and independent of his title, it is impossible to shew any in them." The Court, (after some further remarks,) conclude thus: "To say in this case, that upon the marriage of Turner, or at any time afterwards, the law cast upon him an estate in the property conveyed by this deed, (of which he had notice, and to which he was a party,) inconsistent with the estate conveyed to him by that deed, (and this must be said, if the creditors can claim such estate in his right,) is, in the opinion of the majority of the Court, repugnant to the plain meaning and spirit of the law."

ble) to our case, "To say that on the marriage of Jeffries, or at any time after, the law cast upon him an estate in the property conveyed by Mrs. Birdsong's deed, (of which he had notice, and to which he assented,) inconsistent with the estate conveyed by that deed, (and this must be said, if the creditors can claim such estate in his right,) is, in my opinion, repugnant to the plain meaning and spirit of the law."

It was objected, that the case of Anderson v. Anderson, decided by this Court, 2 Call, 198, is in conflict with the construction I give to the words "all creditors." That it is not, the Court has clearly shewn, in that same case of Pierce v. Turner. The two cases are materially different in their circumstances. In Anderson v. Anderson, there was nothing to intercept the marital rights; here there was a deed binding on the husband, and effectually intercepting and preventing the existence of such rights. In that case, too, at the time when the slaves were taken, it was perfectly contingent whether the wife could ever claim any interest in them, in opposition to persons deriving title under the husband. For, if the husband should have survived the wife, or they should have had issue, the absolute legal estate which the husband gained by the marriage, would have remained unaffected by the deed, according to its plain words.

It remains to enquire, how the deed before us is affected by our Statute of Frauds; and to give the objection its full weight, we must here take the instrument to be an absolute deed of gift unrecorded. The second section of the law declares every gift, grant, &c. made, &c. of malice, fraud, covin, collusion, &c. to delay, hinder or defraud creditors of their just and lawful actions, suits, debts, &c. shall be deemed and taken (only as against the persons, their heirs, &c. whose debts, &c. by such guileful and covinous devices and practices, shall or might be in any wise disturbed, hindered, 226 "and utterly void, &c. I ask what creditors are the Legislature here protecting? And from what are they protecting them? Are they doing so vain a thing, as shielding the creditors of A. from the fraudulent grants, gifts, &c. of B. C. D. &c.? Why, what is it to the creditors of A. that B. C. D. &c. are giving or granting their property? How can it interfere with their rights? How can it delay, hinder or defraud them? No; the law was not attempting this vain and useless thing. It meant simply to guard creditors from the fraudulent attempts of their debtors, to delay or hinder the recovery of their debts, by disposing of that property which those creditors would have a right to seize, so soon as they obtained judgments. The very term creditor implies all this. There can be no creditor but where there is a debtor, and he is only the creditor of the man who owes him money.

It is the latter part of this section, on which it is contended that the deed here is void; but, this first part has a decisive influence on that. The words are, "and moreover, if a conveyance be of goods and chattels, and be not on consideration deemed valuable in law, it shall be taken to be fraudulent within this Act, unless the same be by will duly proved and recorded, or by deed in writing acknowledged or proved," &c. Fraudulent within this Act; what does this mean? Was it the Legislative intention to make the deed an absolute nullity, of which every stranger might take advantage? If so, the deed could not be fraudulent within this Act, (by which is meant, in the manner declared by this Act); for, the Act had declared those deeds, spoken of in the former part of the section, fraudulent only as to those persons, whose debts were or might be hindered or delayed by them. The deeds in this part of the section, then, both by the words and the reason of the law, must also be fraudulent only as to those who have rights in, or claims upon, the property which may be affected by the deeds: and what shadow of right or claim had the creditors of Jeffries on this property 227 of the widow, "when she conveyed it to her brother? None upon earth. It was fairly and honestly made, for the very purpose of preventing those creditors from ever having any thing to do with that property; a purpose not only legal, but I may say laudable.

It is said, that if this deed had not been made, the creditors of the husband would have had a right to the property. I say no; for, from the evidence, if the deed had never been made, the marriage would never have taken place. But, the deed was made, fairly made. It defrauded nobody. The creditors of Jeffries were not the creditors of the grantor, and never had any interest in the property. As to them, therefore, it was of no importance whether the deed was recorded or not; and it is equally true, under the Statute of Frauds, as under that of conveyances, that the creditors of the husband are not within the law.

JUDGE GREEN.

The decision of this case will depend, in a great degree, upon the construction which may be put upon the words "creditors" and "purchasers," as used in our Statute of Frauds and Perjuries. On the part of the appellants, it is contended, that the statute extends only to the protection of creditors of, and purchasers from, the grantor, whose deed is impeached; whilst, on the other hand, it is insisted that it extends to all creditors and purchasers, no matter of and from whom, whose interests are affected by the conveyance. The literal terms of the statute, adopted from those of the 13th and 27th of Elizabeth, favor the latter proposition. It avoids all conveyances made with intent to defraud creditors and purchasers, (without specifying of or from whom,) as against the person or persons, (without exception or limitation,) and every of them, whose debts, suits, demands, estates, thereby shall or might be in any wise disturbed, hindered, delayed, or defrauded. It was impossible to adopt more general the property conveyed, to the payment of their debts; or would have had a good title to the property purchased. And these terms have always received a beneficial and liberal construction in the English Courts, in favor of all creditors and purchasers, and in suppression of fraud. Twyne's Case, 3 Co. Rep. 826. In Burrell's Case, 6 Co. Rep. 72, the grandfather made a long lease to the father, who, in the life-time of the grandfather, assigned it to the son. The grandfather died, having retained the possession of the land. The reversion descended on the father, who had previously sold the lease to another; and the lease made by the grandfather, and the assignment by the father, were both held to be fraudulent and void as to the purchaser from the son, under the 27th of Elizabeth; and the Court held, that "the words of the 27th of Elizabeth are general, and there is no need that he that sells the land, should be the maker of the fraudulent estate or incumbrance; but, if the estate be fraudulent, the purchaser shall avoid it, be who will the seller."

228 terms to embrace all creditors "and purchasers, who, but for the conveyance, would have been entitled to subject

In the Magdalen College Case, 11 Co. Rep. 74, it was stated by the Chief Justice, that a purchaser from a tenant in tail, by a common recovery (which would bar the reversion, if in a common person, but not if in the King,) might, under the Statute of 27th Elizabeth, avoid a conveyance made by the reversioner to the King, with intent to prevent the purchaser from having the benefit of the recovery.

In Clarke v. Rutland, Lane, 113, cited in 13 Vin. Abr. 528, pl. 15, it is said, if the father make a lease for forty years to a stranger, and continues in possession, and dies, the land descending to his heir who sells it, the lease is void against the purchaser.

In these cases, the conveyances were held to be void against those purchasing, not from the grantor, but from others, whose conveyances would have given a good title, if the fraudulent conveyances had not been made; and in Burwell's Case, and in that in Lane's Reports, the leases of the father would have been void against the creditors of the heir; for, the words of the 13th, are as general as those of the 27th of Elizabeth.

In Kynaston v. Clarke, 2 Atk. 204, the father, upon his marriage, settled his estate upon himself for life, remainder to the issue of the marriage in tail; the reversion remaining in him. He had an only child, a son, and died intestate. The son took an estate tail, and the reversion in fee descended on him. He died without issue, and devised the estate to the defendant; and the question was between a specialty creditor of the father, and the devisee of the son. Lord Hardwicke held, that the devise was void under the statute of fraudulent devises, of 3d and 4th Wm. & Mary, and the creditor entitled. The son was never a debtor in any sense of the word. No suit could, at any time, have been brought against him. An estate tail is not assets; nor is a reversion after an estate tail assets, until it falls into possession, and this never fell into the son's possession in his life-time. 2 Saund. 7, note. The preamble of the statute of fraudulent devises, speaks only of the creditors of the devisor, and makes void the devise as to such creditors. This decision was founded upon an equitable construction of the statute; because, if the devise had not been made, the creditor would have been entitled to satisfaction of his debt out of the reversion; which, in that case, would have descended to the heir at law of the father. Our Statute of Frauds is, in its terms, large enough to embrace all such cases, without any equitable construction.

In the case of Haslington v. Gill, reported in a note to Jerman v. Woollaton, 3 Term Rep. 620, the husband and wife, before marriage, joined in a conveyance to a trustee, of a stock of cows, to hold to the separate use of the wife; and the husband covenanted to permit the wife to enjoy the property to her separate use, and to carry on the trade of a cow keeper and milk seller, for her separate benefit. The cows belonged to the wife. After the marriage, she enjoyed the use of the cows, according to the terms of the deed; and a creditor of the husband took them in execution; and the trustees sued the sheriff, and recovered. The Court put the case upon the ground that the deed was made for valuable consideration, and that the possession was consistent with the terms of the conveyance. But all admitted, that if the husband had enjoyed the use of the property, so that the possession would have been inconsistent with the terms of the deed, the conveyance would have been void as to the husband's creditors. Lord Mansfield said, "If the settlement had been made after marriage, or the husband had carried on the trade in his own name, and contracted debts in it, that would have varied the case." Willes was of the same opinion. Ashhurst said, "The possession alone of the wife does not make this transaction fraudulent; for, it was consistent with the deed of settlement." And Buller said, "It has been frequently determined, that possession alone is not evidence of fraud. The transaction must be shewn to be fraudulent from other circumstances. If the possession be inconsistent with the conveyance, that is evidence of fraud. But here the possession is consistent with the deed."

The terms of the statute and these cases, I think, completely justify the construction contended for by the counsel for the appellees. No case has occurred in this Court, which can be supposed to have involved this question, except that of Prior v. Kinney, 6 Munf. 510, in which a creditor of the husband sought to impeach a conveyance made by the wife, on the eve of marriage. Neither the arguments of the counsel, nor the reasoning of the Court, are given in the report of the case, and it is probable that the reporter was not present, and had no reference to any sources of information, but the record. The facts of the case are imperfectly reported, and the decision of the Court was made without much time for consideration; the case being argued on the 16th, and decided on the 18th of February. Upon examining the record, I find that the cause was heard on the bill, answers and replication, without any evidence whatever. The answers were, in all material particulars, responsive to the interrogatories of the bill, and were therefore evidence, and the only evidence, in the cause. It appeared that two days before the marriage of Peggy Lewis to Allen Prior, she, (in consequence of a previous agreement with her sister Eliz. Lewis, that whichever of them died or married first, the other should have all her property,) conveyed all her property to the said Elizabeth. The consideration above mentioned was not expressed in the deed; but the bill called for a discovery of the real consideration. This deed was recorded on the proof of one witness, and of the hand-writing of another, who was dead. The answer of Elizabeth Lewis states, that "this defendant, after the said intermarriage of her sister Peggy with Allen Prior, lived with her sister and the said Prior, and since that time has continued to live partly with the said Prior, and occasionally with her brother-in-law Andrew Lewis: that she hath allowed her brother-in-law Allen Prior, to have the use of the negroes except two, Maria and Charlotte." The answer of Allen Prior states, that the conveyance was made with his privity: that the slaves, except Maria and Charlotte, have generally been in the use and employment of this defendant, loaned by the said Elizabeth Lewis, for the use and convenience of her sister Mrs. Prior; the said Elizabeth occasionally residing with this defendant, and exercising acts of ownership over the said slaves: that the slaves taken in execution (being those conveyed by the deed, and taken September 10, 1803,) had then never been in his possession, but were in the possession and employment of Col. Andrew Lewis, the brother of Elizabeth, and who then resided with the said Andrew. The marriage was on the 25th of May, 1803, and the subpoena at the suit of 232 Prior's creditor issued on the 1st of April, 1809. *The deed in question was made upon a valid and valuable consideration. But, if the Court had considered that possession had continued without interruption in Peggy Lewis before her marriage, and of Prior after, by virtue of the loan admitted in both answers, they must have decided in favor of the creditor, under the provision of the Statute of Frauds in relation to loans, even if upon the other provisions of the statute, a creditor of the husband could not, under other circumstances, in any case impeach a conveyance made by the wife before marriage, with the assent of her husband. The Court, therefore, must have considered that the possession of the property accompanied the deed, and remained with the grantee (residing at Andrew Lewis's) from the time of the execution of the deed on the 23d of May, 1803, until taken in execution in September, 1803; and that after it came to the hands of Prior, the donee resided usually with him, and exercised acts of ownership over it, and had such a possession of it, as not only to take the case out of the clause of the statute in relation to loans, but upon the whole case, to negative the charge that there had been any possession inconsistent with the terms of the deed; so as to leave no ground for the imputation of fraud. There was, therefore, no occasion to decide the question under consideration; and if the Court had considered and decided it, they would surely have given their reasons for their judgment upon a question so important and entirely new with us.

Our statute avoiding unrecorded deeds as to "all creditors and subsequent purchasers," presents the same question as the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, as to what description of creditors and purchasers were intended to be protected. The only difference in the description of creditors and purchasers in these statutes, is, that the latter, in terms, limits its operation to such only as may be injured by the fraudulent conveyance in any way; the former embraces "all creditors and purchasers," without any limitation in the terms of the law.

But the operation of the law is 233 *necessarily limited by the nature of the subject, to such as may in any way be injured by the existence of the unrecorded deed.

The case of Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch's Rep. 154, was strongly relied upon by the counsel of the appellees, as establishing a contrary doctrine, as to the invalidity of unrecorded deeds. The decision in that case limits the application of the words "all creditors and subsequent purchasers" in the statute regulating conveyances, to creditors of, and purchasers from, the grantor only, in all possible cases.

The consequences of this doctrine are so important, as to justify and call for a critical and careful examination of every argument urged in support of it.

The Court, after stating the case, say, "The deed not having been recorded within the time prescribed by law, it is contended by the plaintiff in error, that the same became void, as to the creditors of C. Turner" (the husband) "whose rights remained unimpaired by that deed, in the same manner as if it had never been made; in which case, it is not denied that an absolute estate" (in the personal property) "would have vested in the husband, on his marriage. This argument proceeds upon the grounds, that by the words all creditors and subsequent purchasers, is meant as well the creditors of the grantee and subsequent purchasers under him, as those who might derive title under the grantor" (that is, creditors of, and purchasers from, the grantor,) "although the words are certainly broad enough to comprehend the whole, it is believed by a majority of the Court, that the construction should be such as to limit the application of them, to the creditors of, and subsequent purchasers from, the grantor. In no case but one, where a title can be set up for the grantee paramount the deed, can it ever be the interest of a creditor of the grantee to insist upon such a construction as is insisted upon in this (case) for as he" (the creditor of the grantee) "must (in all other cases) 234 derive his title under *the deed, if it be void as to him," (the creditor of the grantee) "it is impossible for him to found a claim upon it in right of the grantee, whose only title is under the deed. It would be strange, that a deed should be binding upon the grantee and his heirs, and yet be void as to a person claiming under him for valuable consideration;" (creditors of, or purchasers from, the grantee:) "and yet such would be the consequence, if the words all creditors and subsequent purchasers, should be understood to apply to persons claiming under the grantee," (his creditors and purchasers from him) "as well as to those claiming under the grantor. Indeed, it would seem repugnant and absurd, to apply the same expressions to persons, who, if they claim at all, must claim under the deed; and also to those who claim against the deed. In the latter case, the invalidity of the deed is consistent with the claim; in the former, it is destructive of it."

The Court here assume, that the plaintiff's claim asserted as a general proposition, that by force of the statute, an unrecorded deed was void as to the creditors of, and purchasers from, the grantee, in all cases; which, if not true as to all cases, was not true as to any; and then shew that this proposition is absurd in cases where the grantee had no title prior to the deed, and would not have had any title if the deed had not been made, or is void; and therefore not true, even in cases in which the grantee had a prior title, or but for the making of the deed, would have acquired a title by operation of law. This, I think, is the substance of the argument, although I confess that I have had some difficulty in comprehending it.

The argument on the part of the plaintiff did not assert the proposition imputed to it; nor was that proposition necessary to support it. It asserted only, that an unrecorded deed was void as to the creditors of, and purchasers from, any person upon whom an interest would have devolved, if the deed had not been made, and out of which the creditors would have been, in that case, entitled to claim satisfaction 235 *of their debts, whether the debtor was a grantee under the deed or not; they claiming under him, not as grantee, but as one upon whom a better title would have devolved by law, if the deed had no existence in fact or in point of law. In such a claim there is no more inconsistency, than in the ordinary case of a claim by the creditors of, or a purchaser from, a grantor, who claim under him, although he and his heirs are bound by the deed, and have no estate in themselves. In the case which the Court had under consideration, the husband was a grantee of a life estate in his wife's land. If her whole property had been settled to her separate use, he would not have been a grantee but a grantor, to the extent of his marital rights; and not one word of this argument would have been applicable to the case. And can it be seriously contended, that the Legislature intended, that if the husband took nothing by the deed, and so was not a grantee, it should be void as to his creditors or purchasers from him; and good, if he took some trifling interest under the deed, which would not have devolved upon him, by virtue of his marital rights, and so was a grantee? Suppose a father were to convey his estate, by an unrecorded deed, to a stranger, and retain the possession until his death; and his heir at law then to enter upon and enjoy the estate, and sell to a purchaser without notice; would not such a purchaser or judgment creditor of the heir be entitled against the grantee of the father? I think it clear that they would. In such case the heir would not be a grantor. So, if the father were to convey by an unrecorded deed to an only child, an estate for life or years, with remainder to another in fee, and to retain the possession during his life, and upon the death of the father, the son entered and held and enjoyed the estate, and sold it to a purchaser without notice, or a creditor by judgment against the son extended the land; would the circumstance that the son was a grantee of a particular estate, vary the rights of the purchaser and creditor, from what they would be in the former case? I can see no difference

236 in the cases. *In both, the parties claiming under the heir would claim under him as heir, and not as grantee, enjoying an estate which would have devolved on him by operation of law, if the deed had not been made. The case of a husband, in respect to the personal property of his wife coming to his possession, is the same as that of an heir, in respect to real property.

The expressions in this paragraph, "must derive his title under the deed," "to persons claiming under the grantee," and "if they claim at all, must claim under the deed," although applicable to creditors of, and purchasers from, a grantee, who, if the deed had not existed, would have no title whatever, have no application to the creditors of, or purchasers from, one (an heir, for instance, or a husband,) who, but for the deed, would have a title, although a grantee, or if a grantee, would have had a better title by law than by the deed; unless the proposition which involves the question under consideration is assumed as true, to wit, that wherever the heir or husband is a grantee, their creditors or purchasers from them must claim under the deed, and cannot claim against it. Even if that were admitted, as it is not, it would not follow that it would be applicable to a case, in which the heir or husband claimed nothing under the deed, and was not a grantee.

The Court proceeds, "It may be said, however, that these observations are inapplicable to this particular case, because the creditors of the husband do not claim under but against the deed, and in this respect, stand upon the same ground as the creditors of the grantor. But in every other case that can be stated, the invalidity of the deed is applicable to the grantor or those claiming under him," (creditors of, or subsequent purchasers from, him,) "and to no others. By what rule of construction, can the same words have a more extended meaning," (than the creditors of, and purchasers from, the grantor,) "so as to be applied to persons who claim in right of a party to the same deed, other than the grantor?"

237 *The argument in this sentence is, that the case then under consideration, in which the husband was a grantee, was the only case that could be stated, in which the deed could be held to be invalid as to any creditors or purchasers, except those of and from the grantor; and therefore the terms creditors and purchasers, ought not to be extended to that particular and single case. It seems to me, that both the premises and the conclusion of this proposition are incorrect. Besides the cases of the invalidity of deeds, as to the creditors of, and purchasers from, the grantor, and the particular case of the creditors of, and purchasers from, a husband, who is a grantee in the deed, there are the cases of the creditors of, and purchasers from, an heir, to whom a particular estate is conveyed by the ancestor, with remainder to another; and of the heir, when the estate is conveyed by the ancestor, and nothing is conveyed to him; and of a conveyance by the wife to a trustee for her separate use, or absolutely to a stranger, the husband taking nothing under the deed, to which this invalidity is applicable, as before mentioned. In these two last cases, the words of the statute would not be applied "to persons who claim in right of a party to the same deed, other than the grantor."

All these cases of the creditors of, and the purchasers from, the grantor, heir and husband, when the grantee is a stranger, or when the heir or husband are grantees of particular interests less than they would have taken by operation of law, fall within one general rule: that the deed is void as to all creditors and purchasers, who, but for its existence, would have a right to subject the property to their debts, or would have had a good title by their purchases. This is the literal effect of the terms "all creditors and subsequent purchasers." The word all is used, not as contradistinguishing creditors from subsequent purchasers; but applies to all subsequent purchasers, as well as to all creditors. If the intention of the Legislature had been to confine 238 these words to creditors of, and purchasers from, the grantor, the language would have been, "creditors of, and subsequent purchasers from, the grantor." If in truth, as the Court supposed, no possible cases could exist, besides that of the creditors of a grantor, or purchasers from him, in which the existence of the deed could prejudice the creditors of, or purchasers from, any other person, except only in the single case of a husband and wife, in which the husband was a grantee, it would afford no shadow of reason for excluding the latter case from the operation of the statute, for that cause only; especially if it came both within the words and reason of the law. I have noted in parenthesis my understanding of the meaning of the Court in the expressions which they used. If they meant by "those claiming under him," the creditors of those claiming under the grantor by operation of law, it would embrace the creditors of heir and husband, who claim under the ancestor and wife, alike by operation of law, and would put an end to the argument.

The Court proceeds, "If the deed in question had granted to Charles Turner (the husband) an estate in fee as to the land, and for life in respect to the slaves, would it have been void as to simple contract creditors, who could only go against the personal estate, and good as to specialty creditors, who might subject the real assets? And yet, if the deed be void at all as to the creditors of the husband, it must be so throughout; in which case it might well be doubted, whether the land could be made liable to the payment of the husband's debts. Or, to present the question in a less doubtful shape, would the deed be void as to a purchaser from the husband of the slaves, and good as to a purchaser of the land?"

The Court here state, that if the deed be void at all, it must be void throughout; by which they mean, that it must be void as to all the creditors of the husband, simple contract as well as specialty creditors, if void as to any of his creditors. They did not mean to say, that a deed cannot be void as to a part of the subject

239 conveyed, and good *as to another part. Their expressions do not import that; and it is clear, that a deed may be good as to a part of the subject conveyed, and void as to a part. As, if a man were to make a voluntary conveyance of two estates to one person, and the grantee afterwards sold one to a purchaser for value, and the grantor sold the other, the original deed would be good as to the property and the purchaser of it, sold by the grantee, and void as to the property and the purchaser of it, sold by the grantor. Or, if two estates were conveyed to one person by an unrecorded deed, and the grantor sold one to a purchaser without, and the other to a purchaser with, notice of the unrecorded deed, the unrecorded deed would be good as to the estate purchased with notice, and void as to that purchased without notice. The Court were certainly right in saying, that if the deed be void as to a part of the creditors of the husband, it must be void as to all of his creditors; and they have stated a case, in which they seem to take it for granted that the deed would be void as to the simple contract creditors, and good as to the specialty creditors, if the statute was applied to the creditors of the husband; the case of a claim by the creditors after the husband's death, in which case the simple contract creditors could, if the deed were void, pursue the personal property, but not the real; whilst the specialty creditors could pursue the real, upon the ground that the deed was good as to that subject. The deed would be good as to the land, against and in favor of all creditors of the husband; because as to that subject, it could not injure them, and if avoided, the title would remain in the wife, unaffected by the marital rights of the husband, and as to the land, both specialty and simple contract creditors would have an equal right to subject the land in the husband's life-time, by obtaining judgments and extending it, which is the only way in which it could be reached. As to the personal property, the deed would be void, because it injured the creditors of the husband; and that as to all creditors, 240 both simple *contract and specialty, both of who could subject it, either in the life-time of the husband, or after his death. The simple contract creditors, after the husband's death, could not reach the land, not because the deed had not the same effect as to both classes of creditors; but because, upon general principles of law, a simple contract creditor cannot subject the real assets, even where there is no question as to the title. As to the real property, therefore, the deed would be good throughout, that is, as to all creditors of the husband; and as to the personal property, it would be void throughout as to all the husband's creditors; and the dilemma supposed by the Court could not exist, to wit, that a case might occur in which it might be necessary to hold, if the statute embraced the husband's creditors, that it was void as to some creditors, and good as to others. The Court say, that it may be doubted in that case, whether the land could be made liable for the husband's debts, without suggesting the grounds of the doubt. I cannot conceive any other ground, than that of the hardship to the wife; but, this would go to repeal the statute in toto; for, no grantee loses the property by failing to record his deed, without the same hardship. This burthen is thrown upon the wife, to save creditors and purchasers from injury, which they would have no other means of avoiding; whereas the wife might prevent any injury to any person, by having the deed recorded as the law requires. The Court present the question without answering it; as if there was no doubt as to the answer, whether in such case, the deed would be good as to a purchaser of the land from the husband, and void as to the purchaser of the slaves. I think it would; and that it would be no more than the common case of a deed void as to one subject conveyed, and good as to another; or void as to the purchaser of a part, and good as to the purchaser of another part. The Court proceeds, "Let the true interpretation of the words all creditors and subsequent purchasers, be once 241 ascertained, and every difficulty in the case is at an end." *All the difficulties alluded to by the Court, arose from the assumption of the proposition as true, that a creditor can claim nothing which his debtor could not claim; which was the very question to be decided. They proceed, "If they are construed to mean the creditors of the grantor or subsequent purchasers from him, then the deed being good between the parties to it, no estate vested in C. Turner, but such as the deed itself passed to him. The title of his creditors being clearly derivative, if he had no title under the deed, (and being himself bound by it, he could have none which was inconsistent with it,) then his creditors can have none. But, if he had a title incompatible with that granted by the deed, then he was not bound by the deed, contrary to the statute which declares that he was bound. If his creditors have any such title, it cannot be derived from him, when in point of law, he had none in himself; and independent of his title, it is impossible to shew any in them:" that "a subsequent purchaser, with notice of a prior unrecorded deed, is bound by it; and the husband, being a subsequent purchaser, had not only notice, but was a party to the prior unrecorded deed; and if the creditors claim an estate in his right, (by virtue of his marital rights,) they claim against his notice of the prior deed, to which he was a party; which would be repugnant to the plain meaning and spirit of the law." The Court did not, for a moment, advert to the policy on which the law was founded; which is the best if not the only criterion for determining its spirit.

The doctrine that a deed may be good as to the party, and binding upon him and his heirs, and void as to others, is perfectly familiar, both under the statutes, and at common law; and by force of our statute of frauds and perjuries, creditors may have satisfaction out of property, to which their debtor never had any sort of title; as in the case of a loan by an unrecorded deed, or by parol, for more than five years. It is competent to the Legislature to enable a creditor to claim satisfaction out of 242 property, to which *his debtor has no title, and could assert no sort of claim. The only question is, whether they have intended to do this, in the particular case; and if they have, it is no ground for refusing to execute the law, to say, that the creditor can only claim under the debtor; and that, therefore, the creditor can claim nothing, which the debtor could not. This argument is as completely applicable to our statute respecting loans, as to the case of husband and wife, and more so; for, if the loan were not made, there would be no title by which the property would belong to the loanee. But, in the case of husband and wife, if the deed were not made, her personal property would devolve on him by law; and in favor of creditors of, and purchasers from, the husband, that title is, in contemplation of law, vested in him, unless notice of the deed which intercepts it, is given by recording it as the law directs. In like manner, the possession of the loanee, though it gives no title to him, yet in contemplation of law, gives him title so far as his creditors are concerned. The argument of the Supreme Court proves too much. It would apply to the ordinary case of the creditors of the grantor. He is a party to the deed, is bound by it, and can set up no title inconsistent with it; and his creditors claim under him, in the same sense as the creditors of the husband claim under him.

The Court declared that they felt some difficulty in consequence of the decision in Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call, 198; but contented themselves with saying, that with regard to the point under consideration, that decision was believed to be right, and proceed to shew upon what grounds. The Court of Appeals proceeded solely upon the ground, that it was an agreement in consideration of marriage, void for want of recording. I am not satisfied with the reasoning of the Supreme Court, to prove the decision of the Court of Appeals right, independent of the statute; and think that the wife would have succeeded, if the statute had not been in her way. The case was this: The intended husband executed an instrument of writing 243 *agreeing to settle her property, (which consisted of slaves,) upon the intended wife. This paper, although recorded, was not recorded within the time prescribed by law; and was held to be no impediment to the creditors of the husband. The wife filed her bill against her husband and his creditors, for the purpose of protecting the property against the claims of the latter. It was argued on the part of the plaintiffs, that it was clear that if the husband only was concerned, relief would be given against him, and that his creditors could only have the same rights that he had: that the failure to record the instrument was a fraud in the husband: that there was a distinction between the property of the wife and the husband; and that the husband was a trustee for the wife. The counsel for the defendants relied upon the force of the Act of Assembly as avoiding the instrument. The Court propounded and decided that as the only question on the merits of the case. If there had been no law requiring marriage settlements to be recorded, or if a settlement of the wife's property upon her, or rather his agreement to settle it, was valid against the husband's creditors without recording, then clearly the husband was a trustee for the wife by force of the agreement, and that trust attached upon the property, the moment his marital rights gave him the legal title; a trust which, if not avoided by the statute, a Court of Equity would have been bound to enforce, both against the husband and his creditors, unless the possession had been inconsistent with the deed. In a Court of Equity, the rights of all parties were precisely the same, whether the husband or any other was trustee; and the bare legal title in the husband, was no more subject to the claims of his creditors, than any other legal title which he might hold in trust for any stranger.

The Court, in Pierce v. Turner, after coming to the conclusion that unrecorded deeds are void, only as to the creditors of the grantor, add, "That creditors of the husband, or purchasers from him, may be injured by the construction which this Court feels itself compelled to give to 244 *this law. need not be denied; but it is not for this tribunal to give them relief. It might perhaps be well, if the law were so amended as to render deeds made in contemplation of marriage, void, in express terms, as to the creditors of the husband, and purchasers from him, in case the same should not be recorded within the time prescribed by law;" thus admitting that the case was within the policy of the law, as they had already admitted that the words of the law were broad enough to embrace it. It seems to me, that the necessary conclusion was, that the case was within the provisions of the statute, unless that conclusion were clearly inconsistent with some other provision or obvious purpose of the statute.

Upon the best consideration that I have been able to give to this question, I think, upon the words and policy of the law, and the construction given to the statutes concerning analogous subjects in England, that the statute of conveyances avoids a marriage settlement, or an agreement made in consideration of marriage, by which the property of either the husband or wife is settled, or agreed to be settled, if it be not duly recorded; both as to the creditors of, and purchasers from, the husband and wife, no matter to which the property originally belonged, if any right which the creditors or purchasers would have had, if the deed or agreement had not existed, would be injuriously affected by the deed, if it were held to be valid.

It is not, however, very material to the decision of this case, that the Court should come to this conclusion, since I think, as indeed was admitted by one of the appellant's counsel, that the paper in question was neither a marriage settlement, or covenant, or agreement, in consideration of marriage. The case therefore turns upon the effect of the statute of frauds; and in considering it in that view, several distinct questions occur.

The first of these is, whether the possession of the property was inconsistent with the terms of the deed; and if so, whether, in the absence of all proof as to any 245 agreement *between the parties, collateral to the deed and varying its effect, the deed would be void as to the husband's creditors. Secondly, whether such proof of such a collateral agreement, is admissible; and if not, whether the deed in that case, appearing on its face to be a conveyance made without a consideration deemed valuable in law, would be good against the creditors of the husband, if duly recorded.

It appears that Mrs. Birdsong, being about to intermarry with Jeffries, who was known to be greatly involved in debt, and on the day of, and before the marriage, executed to her brother Land, then absent in the military service of his country, an absolute and unconditional bill of sale; which was written by Jeffries himself, conveying all her personal property, without any consideration of money or other valuable thing passing from Land, either expressed in the deed or alleged by the parties. No change of possession followed this deed, either immediately upon the execution of the deed, or at any time afterwards; but, the property remained in the possession of Mrs. Birdsong until her marriage, and afterwards, in that of Jeffries her husband, without interruption, for more than three years, and until it was taken in execution by a creditor of Jeffries; and was during this time used by Jeffries, precisely as if the deed had never been made; he exercising all acts of ownership over it, except that it does not appear that he sold any part of it. This possession and use were with the assent of Land, after he was apprised of the existence of the deed; which was soon after the marriage, and at least as soon as the 1st of January, 1815; for, the bond of Jeffries exhibited by Land bears date on that day, and though not proved, is evidence against him, to shew that he was then appraised of the existence of the deed; although it may not be admissible evidence to account for the possession and use of the property by Jeffries, so as to take the case out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries. And if it were admissible for that purpose, it* is obviously colourable only.

Jeffries was insolvent, and no security was required. The existence of the bond was, as far as appears, kept a profound secret. This is alleged in the answer, and not contradicted by the proofs. It was not even witnessed. The payment of it has never been demanded, and no bond was taken after that, although the possession and use continued as before.

Upon these facts, in the absence of all others, it is clear that the possession was inconsistent with the deed; and it cannot be for a moment doubted, that such an absolute deed, the donor retaining the possession and use without interruption for upwards of three years, in an ordinary case, would be void as to creditors of the donor, according to the uniform decisions of the Courts in England and Virginia, and of the Supreme Court of the United States; so that, if Mrs. Birdsong had never been married, the deed in question, under such circumstances, would have been void as to her creditors. And if Jeffries had made such a deed for the property in question, after his marriage, or for his own property, and retained such a possession and use of the property, it would have been void as to his creditors, and purchasers from him.

But, it was said at the bar, first, that a gift without consideration, or a sale by the intended wife, of her property, before marriage, with the assent or knowledge (which is equivalent to assent) of her intended husband, is good against the husband and against his creditors; that a gift or conveyance by the intended wife, with such assent of the intended husband, no matter with what intent or for what purpose made, divests the legal title of the wife, as between the parties (even fraudulent transactions being good between the parties) and prevents the husband's marital rights from attaching on the property: that creditors claiming under the debtor, cannot claim what the debtor was never entitled to; that, therefore, in such case, the conveyance does not delay, hinder, or defraud such creditors, as they are not thereby deprived of any right or remedy, 247 *which they were ever entitled to as to such property; and consequently, that the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries does not avoid any conveyance made by the intended wife before marriage, as to the creditors of the husband, unless the conveyance be also void as to the husband.

Secondly, it is said, that this case does not come within the principles of the adjudged cases upon the subject of a continued possession and use of the property by the donor, inconsistent with the terms of the deed, since after the marriage, Jeffries, (and not his wife, the donor) had the possession and use of the property; and

Thirdly, that the circumstances of this case, (without proof of any agreement between the parties, as to the objects of the deed, inconsistent with the terms of the deed) sufficiently explain the possession of Jeffries, and obviate the charge of fraud as to Mrs. Jeffries; since she was disabled by her coverture, after the marriage, from completing the transaction by changing the possession of the property; and before the marriage, she could not deliver the property to Land, he being absent.

It is certainly true, that a sale or voluntary gift of her property to another, by a woman before marriage, if not fraudulent as to her intended husband, is good both as to him and his creditors, and purchasers from him. The husband is not, by the marriage, a purchaser for valuable consideration, of his wife's property, but only of the marital rights devolving on him by law; and therefore, all her rights fairly transferred (as to the intended husband,) by her to another, before the marriage, are effectually withdrawn from the operation of his marital rights. He neither acquires any interest in fact, or in contemplation of law, in the property so transferred to another; and his creditors can, in such case, have no claim against it. But, if the wife, conveying her property before marriage, with the assent of her husband, reserves to himself, by express provision, or by a secret trust, any interest in such property, either legal or equitable: 248 such interest devolves, by virtue *of his marital rights, on the husband, unless it be reserved in a legal and effectual way, for her separate use, notwithstanding her future coverture; and his creditors can assert their claims against such interest of the husband, notwithstanding any covinous contrivance to defeat their rights; and although the husband or wife may have precluded himself or herself, from asserting such right at law, and may have depended wholly on the faith of the donee of the property for the due execution of the trust reposed in him. No man can hold property by any title which is not liable to the claims of his creditors. It is not necessary that a creditor shall shew that his debtor has an interest, which he can assert at law or in equity, in order to enable the creditor to subject it to the satisfaction of his demand. In all cases of fraudulent conveyances, the party is bound and can assert no claim, either at law or in equity; and yet his creditors are not bound as he is, and they may assert their rights against the property, as if the conveyance never existed.

In this case, the possession and use being inconsistent with the deed, is conclusive proof that it was not the intent of the parties, that the wife should give away her property to her brother; but, that he should hold the nominal title in trust for her general use; and that right in her devolved by law upon her husband, (he having possession of the property, with the assent of the trustee) and was liable to his creditors. No special trust for the separate use of the wife, any more than for the joint use of the husband and wife, can be inferred from this possession; and without any other evidence of the intent of the transaction, the legal inference is, that the object of the parties was to delay, hinder and disturb the rights of the husband's creditors. It is upon these grounds, that the rule has been established, that a possession and use inconsistent with the terms and professed objects of the deed, makes the deed per se fraudulent and void; since it proves conclusively, notwithstanding any colourable conveyance, that the beneficial 249 *right to the property is in the person who has such use and possession; and, therefore, such use and possession is conclusive evidence of an original fraudulent intent in the making of the deed, and avoids it ab initio; so as that it cannot be considered as having any effect, from the beginning.

As to the suggestion, that the fact of the possession and use, as it was in this case, does not bring this case within the principles of the adjudications on this subject, because it was not a continued possession by the donor, but after the marriage, the possession passed to, and continued in, the husband; it is sufficient to observe, that the suggestion would have had more force, if the property, after the marriage, had continued under the exclusive control of the donor; for then, in fact, the possession might be said to be affected by the deed, and not to go as if the deed had no existence; and a trust might possibly be inferred from that fact, for the sole and separate use of the wife; and the deed might be supposed to have been intended to have affected, in some way, the real and beneficial title to the property. But, the possession of the husband was the natural consequence of a merely colourable conveyance, not intended to change the real and beneficial title to the property, and ought to have the same effect, as if the donor had never married, and had sold or given the property to some other, after making the deed, and that other had continued in the uninterrupted possession and use of the property; which would, if possible, afford more decisive evidence of the secret trust for the general use of the grantor, connected with the first deed, than if she herself had continued in possession.

As to the third suggestion from the bar above mentioned, it may be observed, that in the aspect of the case now under consideration, it can have no effect.. Mrs. Jeffries professed to give her property by the deed in question, absolutely and unconditionally, to her brother. It is he who asserts a title under this deed of 250 gift; and if it was *really intended that the deed should give him any beneficial interest, the incapacity of the donor, after marriage, to deliver the possession to him, without her husband's consent, was no impediment to his demanding possession from the husband, and compelling the surrender of the property. It is from his failure to assert any right to the property, and his acquiescence in Jeffries' possession and use of the property, that the inference of law arises, that he never was intended to have, and had not, any interest in the property. The omission to deliver the property is urged, not against the rights of the grantor, but against the pretended rights of her pretended donee. Although the continuance of the possession in the donor, and her husband coming into possession under her by operation of law, whilst Land was absent and incapable of receiving the possession, (and perhaps ignorant of the existence of the conveyance,) might not be considered as a possession inconsistent with the deed, if he had claimed the possession as soon as these impediments were removed; yet, his long subsequent acquiescence in such possession, after he was informed of the existence of the deed, and might have asserted any right which he had, relates to the origin of the transaction, and demonstrates its real original character.

In this view of the case, I therefore conclude, that the possession and the use of the property by the donor and her husband, in her right, in a way totally inconsistent with the terms and legal import of the deed, is conclusive evidence that the deed was made for the sole purpose of securing to the donor and her intended husband, such possession and use, by veating a title in the donee for the use of the donor generally; or was only colorable, and not intended to affect the title at all, except so far as to protect the property for the use of Jeffries, against the claims of his creditors; and in either case, the property is liable to the payment of Jeffries' debts.

But, if it be competent to the appellants to allege and approve an agreement and objects contrary to the legal import

251 *of the deed, so as to shew that such possession and use, although inconsistent with the terms of the deed, was not inconsistent with the objects of the deed and that agreement of the parties, not expressed in the deed, but collateral to it, then if such averments and proofs are found in the record, the appellant should prevail, unless the transaction would be void, otherwise than by virtue of the second section of the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries. But, was it competent to the parties to make such averments, and give such proofs? The common law prohibits any averments or proofs inconsistent with the deed, or with the written agreement of the parties, so as to vary their legal effect, unless in cases of fraud or mistake. If it were otherwise, the solemnity of a deed, or the precaution of reducing agreements to writing, would avail but little; and the spirit of the Statute of Frauds strongly enforces this principle of the common law. If the parties were permitted to give parol proof of an agreement, in relation to the possession of property absolutely conveyed, inconsistent with the legal effect of the deed, the rule of law, which declares that such possession makes the deed per se fraudulent and void, would have no effect. In all such cases, such possession might, and probably would, be accounted for by parol proofs. If such parol proofs were admissible, then proof of a loan would sufficiently explain away the apparent inconsistency of the possession. And if such evidence was admissible, it would be absurd to say, that such inconsistent possession per se made the deed fraudulent and void in point of law; for, all the evidence ought, in that case, to be left to the consideration of the jury, to have such effect as it ought to have. This point is well established by the uniform current of authorities. Thus, in Edwards v. Harden, 2 Term Rep. 587, the grantee took an absolute deed; but, it was agreed between him and the grantor, that it should only operate as a security for a debt: that the grantor should retain the possession for fourteen days, and if the debt was not then paid, the grantee should take possession of the goods and sell them for the payment of the debt. If this were admissible evidence, then the possession of the grantor was fairly accounted for; since it was consistent with the proved agreement of the parties, though inconsistent with the terms of the deed. Yet it was held, that this possession inconsistent with the deed, per se rendered the deed fraudulent; and the evidence offered to explain this possession by proof of a collateral agreement as to the possession, was disregarded.

So in Alexander v. Deneale, 2 Munf. 341, the deed was absolute on its face, but proved to be for securing debts due from the grantor to the grantees; and so the possession, although inconsistent with the deed, was consistent with the proved agreement. But, the Court disregarded this proof, and declared the deed to be fraudulent per se. And in Williamson v. Farley, Gilm. Rep. 15, the grantee was a purchaser for full and valuable consideration, and at the time of the purchase took an absolute bill of sale, and then hired the slaves to the grantor for one year for their food and clothing, and took a bond for their return at the end of the year; such possession, consistent as it was with the collateral parol agreement, was notwithstanding declared to render the deed fraudulent and void, because inconsistent with the deed. Many other cases might be cited to the same effect, in this Court and elsewhere.

But, although parol proofs cannot be given, for the purpose of explaining a possession inconsistent with the deed, by shewing an agreement of the parties collateral to the deed, yet such proofs may be given, to shew that there is really no inconsistency between the possession and the deed itself. As, if the deed be conditional on its face, proofs may be given as to the performance or non-performance of the condition; or, if upon the face of the deed, the property is to be disposed of by the grantor for the benefit of the grantee; or, if the grantor retains the possession, not for his own use, and does not use it, but only for safe-keeping until the grantee can take possession, as if the grantee be at a distance; or, the deed is to trustees for the purpose of selling and paying debts, and the property remains, for safe-keeping, in possession of the debtor, (as is usual in such cases,) until a sale can be conveniently made; or, if the property be in such a situation as that it cannot be delivered, (as at sea,) so that it be delivered as soon as practicable; or, if the grantee purchase at a Sheriff's sale, and leave the property in the possession of the debtor, and for his use, this possession is not inconsistent with the idea of a bona fide absolute and effectual conveyance from the Sheriff to the purchaser; or, if the possession be a social possession, so that a possession of the grantee may be implied; such cases do not, in fact, come within the rule under discussion, since no proofs are given to contradict or vary the terms or effect of the deed, but only to shew that the possession is not in fact inconsistent with the terms of the deed itself; and of this character are all the cases cited at the bar, as forming exceptions to the rule.

There is no ingredient of fraud or mistake in this case, to exempt it from the operation of the general rule, and to justify the admission of the parol proofs, as to the real objects of the deed. No such fraud or mistake is alleged in the pleading; and if it were, none is proved. The deed is drawn in the very terms intended by the party who drew it; and he verily believed it would have the effect intended, whatever that might be. His mistake, or the mistake of any of the parties, as to the legal effect of their deliberate and intended acts, is not such a mistake as any Court can take notice of. 1 Madd. Chan. 41; Hodges v. Hodges, 2 Vern. 615.

The next question is, whether the recording of the deed (supposing it to be duly recorded) will render it valid; although it might be void if not recorded. This question arises under that clause of the statute which declares, "and moreover, if a conveyance be of goods and chattels, and be not on consideration deemed valuable in law, it shall be taken to be fraudulent within this act, unless recorded, or unless possession shall really and bona fide remain with the donee." It might be argued, that in such cases, the statute intended to substitute the recording of the deed for the possession of the property by the donee. But this clause, which is not in the English Statute, was obviously introduced for the purpose of enlarging, and not of abridging the former parts of the statute; not for the purpose of making good what would otherwise be void, under the former part of the statute, but for the purpose of avoiding (if the deed be not recorded, nor accompanied with possession,) such voluntary deeds as would be good under the former part of the statute; as, the case of a person, not at all indebted at the time, making a gift by deed, as has been repeatedly held in cases lately decided in this Court. In the case of Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384, a deed of gift was made by a father to his infant daughter, when it did not appear that he was at all indebted; which would have been good against the father's creditors; but, for this clause of the statute, was held to be void as to his creditors, for not being duly recorded; whilst other deeds of gift, made to his other children when he was greatly in debt, and which were duly recorded, were held to be void under the former part of the statute. If the creditors of the husband could in no case impeach the voluntary deed of the wife, then it is immaterial whether her deed was recorded or not; and if they can impeach it for fraud under the statute, this is a case of fraud under the former part of the statute, and in that case, it is immaterial whether the deed was recorded or not. I have, therefore, not considered the question, whether the deed was or was not duly recorded. If it were material, I should incline to the opinion that it was not. If Land had taken possession of the slaves, and Jeffries had sued him for them, I doubt whether the deed recorded upon the wife's acknowledgment after the coverture, could be given in evidence against the husband, without further proof of its execution.

255 *Supposing, however, that notwithstanding the presumption of law already discussed, when the possession and use of property are not, in consequence of a conveyance, in any degree changed or affected, so far as creditors and purchasers were concerned, it were yet competent to the parties to repel this presumption of law by parol proofs of a collateral agreement, in relation to the effect and objects of the deed, inconsistent with its terms; then it becomes necessary to examine the proofs in this case, in relation to the alleged agreement.

The allegations of the bill, and of Jeffries' answer, cannot be regarded further than as they are supported by proofs. All the proofs in relation to the declarations of Mrs. Birdsong in the absence of Jeffries, as to her determination not to marry Jeffries unless her property was secured to her against the claims of his creditors, and as to his declarations as stated by her, that he would not sign a marriage agreement, but that she might do as she pleased with her property, and that it should be secured to her, are inadmissible evidence, and to be thrown out of the case. This will leave, upon this point, the testimony of one witness only to be considered. All the rest speak only of Mrs. Birdsong's declarations made in the absence of Jeffries; and Louisa N. Lane alone speaks of any communication between Mrs. Birdsong and Jeffries on this subject. She states that Mrs. Jeffries, before the marriage, signed a paper, the contents of which, she, the (witness,) knew not: that before she signed the paper, Mrs. Jeffries asked Jeffries, "if that was sufficient to secure her property to her," and he replied, "Yes; her property could not be taken to pay his debts." Of the numerous witnesses examined in the cause, and who were present at this transaction, and amongst others the subscribing witness to the deed, not one testifies to this conversation, except Louisa N. Lane, or to any other communication between the parties, as to the objects and purposes of the deed.

The declaration of Jeffries stated by 256 Louisa N. Lane, does *indeed shew, that the object of making the deed, was to preserve the property against the claims of his creditors, but not against himself, or to her separate use; and is not at all inconsistent with the presumption of law arising from the continued possession, that he was to have the beneficial use of the property, as if the deed had not been made; and it is precisely this intent, to give or leave to him the beneficial right to the property, and to secure it at the same time from the claims of his creditors, which the law condemns as fraudulent as to them. But, if this evidence can be supposed to have any other effect, and to shew that it was intended that Mrs. Jeffries should have the separate use of the property, ought the strong and well-founded jealousies of the law against the allowance of parol proofs to add to, or vary, or contradict, the legal import of deeds and other instruments of writing, or to control the effect of a possession inconsistent with the deed, to yield to evidence so slight and uncertain as this? And ought not such evidence to be clear and conclusive, beyond any doubt? This person was not called upon to witness any transaction or agreement between the parties. She was not even apprised of the purport or objects of the instrument of writing about to be executed. She casually heard a single question and answer, which she testifies to many years after; and this testimony is to overrule the effect of the deed, and continued possession of Jeffries, although the slightest mistake of the witness in her recollection of the precise terms of the question and answer, might essentially vary the rights of all parties, whose interests were liable to be affected by the execution of the deed. If the question had been, "will this secure my property against your creditors," (as I think it probably was, from the terms of Jeffries' answer,) the evidence then would have no effect whatever. I do not think this evidence ought to be considered, even if admissible for that purpose, as sufficient to vary the legal import of the deed, and effect of the possession.

257 *If the appellants could succeed in this case, it would produce infinite frauds upon the creditors of husbands apparently in possession of the property of their wives, by virtue of their marital rights, and upon purchasers of such property from the husbands. In all cases, secret conveyances made by the wife before marriage, and concealed with intent to be used or not, as the future circumstances of the husband might make it expedient, and purposely to defraud creditors and purchasers from the husband, might deprive creditors, (who trusted on the faith of the apparent title, and the possession of the husband by virtue of his marital rights,) of their remedies against the property, and purchasers dealing with the husband in the same confidence, of their title to the property so purchased. For, if such creditors and purchasers have no right to impeach such conveyance on the ground of fraud, in any case, it is wholly unnecessary to record the deed as to them, either under the statute of frauds, or statute of conveyances.

JUDGE COALTER.

I shall consider this case, first and principally, as arising upon an absolute deed made by the female appellant to her brother, on the eve of her marriage, and in contemplation thereof, unaccompanied by any expectation on her part or agreement on his, to hold the property conveyed for her use, but made solely with a view to intercept the marital rights of her intended husband, and the rights of his creditors; and shall throw out of the case the alleged hiring of the slaves by the grantee to the husband, after marriage.

Secondly, I will enquire whether, if the case would be with the appellants under that view of it, it is against them on the ground, that at or before the execution of the deed, there was an expectation or understanding that the property would be held in trust for her, and which has since been agreed to and admitted by the grantee, because such understanding or agreement was not stated in the deed.

258 *If the slaves had been the property of the husband, and had been so conveyed, although there had been a parol trust agreed upon in favor of the wife, and in consideration of the marriage, it would have been void as to his creditors. Alexander v. Deneale, 2 Munf. 341; 2 Vern. 490. But the property belonging to the wife, and the intended husband being in debt, and not worth a cent, as is admitted in the answer, it was perfectly honest and correct that her property should be protected from his creditors, provided the husband assented thereto, and was willing to marry her on those terms; even if she preferred to make a voluntary gift of it to her brother, rather than that they should go to pay his debts. Suppose she had made a gift of them by parol, or a sale for $10, which, as to her creditors, would have been considered a voluntary gift, and had delivered the possession to him; this would have vested the legal title in him; and if so, he could have disposed of them as he pleased. Having the legal title thus in him, suppose that a few days after the marriage, he had hired or lent them to the husband, and they had thus remained in possession; would this be considered her possession, so as to defeat the absolute gift or sale? If it would as to her creditors, (as such voluntary gift or pretended sale would be void, even without such possession,) would it as to his creditors? It appears to me that it would not, and that this may be considered as settled by this Court in Pryor v. Kinney's ex'ors, 6 Munf. 510. In that case, if Mrs. Pryor had been in debt, and judgment had been recovered against husband and wife, and his estate had been insufficient to pay the debt, I presume a sale of the slaves would have been decreed to pay her debt, though the creditors of the husband could not, in that case, subject them to theirs. If the title passed, without a fraud on the marriage, the marital rights of the husband were intercepted, and he did not become a purchaser of the property by the marriage. I consider this question also settled, by the decision of the Supreme Court of the U. States in the case of Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch, 154.

259 *In the case of Crump v. Dudley, 3 Call, 507, the wife, on the eve of marriage, made a bill of sale for a small consideration, of her reversionary right to a slave. This was attempted to be set aside by the husband as a fraud on his marital rights, but he failed; and I presume his creditors would also have failed.

Marriage, it is true, is to the world prima facie a purchase by the husband of the wife's personal property; but, it is not always a purchase. She may sell it before marriage, or it may be settled upon her. If it be sold, given away, or settled, it is his, although he does not get immediate possession of it, and his creditors can resort to it. Possession or want of possession is, therefore, not a certain indicium of property or title. A man marries the daughter of a wealthy father, and brings home with her slaves, &c. Prima facie they are his; but, they may be only on loan. His creditors derive title through him, and unless possession remains five years, are only entitled where he is entitled.

But, this was not a parol gift, or sale accompanied with the immediate transfer of possession, but was a bill of sale to a brother, not then present. Did that bill of sale vest the title in the brother, as it regarded the grantor and her future husband?

I have always supposed that a title to personal property may be transferred by deed, without actual delivery of the property at the time to the grantee, who, whether present or absent when the deed is made, is invested with the title. Fowler v. Lee, 4 Munf. 373; Edwards v. Harben, &c. 2 Term Rep. 587. Thus, deeds of trust, where the grantee never saw the property, or even knew of the execution of the deed, and where the possession remains in fact with the grantor, passes the legal title to the trustee. So a bill of sale of property at sea, &c. It is true, that as to third persons, creditors or subsequent purchasers, the deed, under circumstances, is avoided by statute; but this shews that a statute 260 was necessary, in order to avoid them as to such *parties, who might otherwise be defrauded. If, as to the grantor and the intended husband, the title passed to the grantee, though he was not present, and did not then receive possession, and must stand good as to them, was it fraudulent as to the creditors of the husband, at the instant of the execution of the deed? And if not, do the after events make it so? It was not fraudulent when executed, but she had a right, as it regarded his creditors, to give her property to whom she pleased, if done in a way not fraudulent as to the intended husband.

Suppose the sheriff, with the execution in his pocket, had been present at the marriage, and had, immediately after its solemnization, levied it on this property; would it have been liable to this execution as the property of the husband? I think not. If his marital rights did not then attach, they never did. His rights by possession afterwards, are of a distinct nature from his marital rights.

Do the after circumstances avoid it? It was executed on the day of the marriage, and a few minutes before its celebration; was known to, approved of, and actually written by the intended husband, a lawyer, and in consequence of repeated declarations by her, that his marital rights were not to attach on her property. Possession could not be delivered instantaneously to the grantee, who was not present. The possession, then, which remained with her for those few minutes, would not, I apprehend, make that deed fraudulent per se, even as to her creditors, if it would not have been void as to them, for want of consideration. After the marriage, the possession was no longer hers, nor had she any power to control it.

Suppose she had proposed to send the property to her brother's plantation, there to remain until his return; the husband could have prevented this. The possession then was his, and no longer remained in the grantor. Suppose the husband had so sent them, and on the next day, the brother having come home, had brought them back, and lent or hired them to the husband, and they had remained, as they did, in his 261 possession; *would this have barred the rights of the creditors? I presume that under such circumstances, they could not have claimed, unless possession had remained for five years. But, if they had been the property of the husband, and had been parted from by an absolute bill of sale, for full value even, such slight change of possession would not have barred his creditors. The transaction would have been considered fraudulent as to them. This shews that a sale or gift by the wife, in contemplation of marriage, is a very different thing from a like transaction by a debtor in relation to his own property.

A voluntary gift by the wife, dum sola, accompanied with a transfer of possession, and consent of the future husband, provided neither husband nor wife were ever afterwards in possession, would certainly be good as to the creditors of the husband, though not as to those of the wife. It would be bad as to the latter, for want of consideration. This shews that parting with the title in any way, by the parties to the intended marriage, is not, at the time such title is parted from, fraudulent as to the then creditors of the husband; nor will it so become afterwards, unless some statute makes it so. The deed then was fair, legal and proper, at the moment of its execution. It was a moral duty, as well in her as in him, to protect this property from his creditors, who had no right to oppose it, for the future support of their family, and was a transaction which the Courts will approve and support; and is much more fair, than for a man in debt to settle his property, so as to make his wife and children purchasers by the marriage, and thus to defeat his creditors; yet this is lawful. The few moments possession by her, from the time of the execution of the deed to the celebration of the marriage, would not avoid it as to him, so as to make him a subsequent purchaser by the marriage. He knew that the title had passed from her, and that too as a precedent condition to the marriage. After that, the possession was no longer hers but his, until claimed by the true owner, who could assert his right at any time 262 *within the five years. The doctrine, then, now under consideration, and which avoids the deed within the five years, because of the grantor remaining in possession, seems to me not to apply; first, because the grantor was not the debtor, and secondly, because possession did not remain with her. Had the witness to the deed, or any other person but the husband or grantee, taken or retained possession, the creditors could not claim; and yet, if it was the husband's property, or if his marital rights had attached upon it, they could, notwithstanding such possession in a stranger.

If it be said that, as to the world, the husband had the same kind of possession that he would have had if his marital rights had attached, and that so far they might be deceived, and that it will open a door to perjuries, if we justify the setting up claims inconsistent with such possession; I answer, that in every case where a man acquires possession of personal property, that possession is, to a certain extent, and according to circumstances, prima facie evidence of right. Thus when a man, not in debt, marries the daughter of a wealthy father, and brings home with her personal property, it will generally be supposed to be his. Yet it may, in reality, be a loan; and if not, and he becomes embarrassed, a loan may afterwards be set up by perjury. But, the Court and jury are to judge of this; for surely, a loan in such case as this, may be proved, and may within five years be declared by deed. But, if the husband was in debt and not worth a cent, as in this case, a loan or some settlement would generally be presumed; and if declared by deed at the time, known to and proved by a number of witnesses, though not recorded, it would stand good for five years, and the property could not be taken within that time, to pay the husband's debts. It may be, that the possession by the husband of the property which belonged to the wife before marriage, is stronger evidence to the world that he became the purchaser of that property by the marriage, than in the case *just put.

But yet, every body knows that his marital rights may have been intercepted; and if this is proved without a shadow of doubt, or appearance of fraud or perjury, as in this case; and as there is no act of the Legislature which prevents a woman from fairly parting with her property before marriage, I cannot see how we are to avoid the conveyance made by her, in this case.

As to the second point. I do not consider this deed as a marriage settlement. In fact, he had nothing to settle; and she could settle her property, by his consent, as she pleased. No marriage settlement here deprived his creditors of any thing; as it might have done, if he had had property to settle. It was, therefore, not necessary to record it. It is said indeed, that the intended husband refused to give it that shape; and although this is only proved as her declarations, that he so refused, yet this is a part of the res gesta; and his drawing the instrument in the form he did, he being a lawyer, shews that what she said was true. The form, then, of an absolute deed, (she depending on the justice and liberality of her brother,) was adopted, as one which, it was believed, would, and I think did, answer the purpose intended. Had he been present, and possession delivered to and retained by him, even until the celebration of the marriage, there would have been no doubt, I presume, with any one, that the title passed, and that he could the next day, have settled the property in trustees, or could have declared himself possessed for her separate use, and have given possession to the husband. If he could do so the next day, he could have done so at any time within five years, notwithstanding the possession of the husband in the mean time. He agrees in the bill, that he is trustee for this purpose. Such agreement surely will not destroy his title under the deed.

But take it, that there was no trust to her separate use declared or agreed on, at the time the deed was executed. It was certainly intended that his marital rights, and of course the rights of his creditors, should not attach. This *could be prevented either by an absolute gift to her brother, or by a deed of trust to her separate use. An absolute bill of sale executed, let it be admitted, under a belief or hope that he would hold for her use, in such a way, as to prevent the creditors from taking the property, was resorted to. How can such expectation or belief prevent the legal title from vesting in the brother, or prevent his agreeing afterwards to hold it in trust to her separate use? Had he, by deed, declared a general trust, so as to give the creditors a claim, they could only have claimed through that deed made by him, as the absolute owner, not on the original marital rights of the husband.

But suppose he (Land) had been in debt, and the dispute had been between his creditors and those of the husband; the latter could only prevail on the ground of this belief and expectation in the wife, that the property would be held in trust; and that Land therefore held the property clothed with this trust, which would cut out his creditors. But, if they resort to that, it would turn out that it was to be held in trust, in such way as to defeat them; that is, in trust for her separate use; and then the question would recur as to Land's creditors, whether such expected trust, not declared in the deed, would defeat the legal title as it regarded their debts. Suppose Land, so in debt, or afterwards contracting debts, had taken possession and hired out the slaves to others than Jeffries, and had applied the hires to the maintenance of his sister, no trust being declared either in the deed in question, or in any deed made by him. His creditors, I apprehend, could have taken the property, he having the legal title, unaccompanied by any trust affecting them; and that they would stand on different grounds from the creditors of Jeffries. Would his hiring or lending to Jeffries differ the case from what it would be, if the hiring or lending had been to any one else? I think not.

If Land then had the legal title, he could declare a trust afterwards, or a loan, and although this might not affect 265 *his creditors prior to such declaration, and subsequent creditors might also come in, if there were prior ones; and if there were no creditors, such declaration, if not for the separate use, might give Jeffries an interest which would enure to his creditors; yet they would claim under his marital rights then attaching under this declaration of a trust, and not before. But the trust is declared now in this bill, and it is declared for her separate use. The possession, in the mean time, has been in Jeffries, either on hire or loan. (I care not which,) and for a less time than five years; within which time the owner can declare a trust or loan. Suppose, before this execution had issued, Land had executed a deed referring to the one now in question, then remaining in the Clerk's office, and had conveyed the property to a trustee, to be held for her separate use, or had declared himself, as in this bill, to be such trustee, and that deed had been duly recorded; could any but his creditors have complained of such deed? I think not. An absolute bill of sale, by one in debt, of his goods, of which he afterwards retains the possession, is deemed fraudulent as to his creditors, because a secret trust in his favor is presumed, even if the grantee is also a bona fide creditor to the full value of the goods. A fortiori, if the deed, on the face of it, is voluntary and for the sole use of the debtor, will it be void as to his creditors. But in this case, such trust for the sole use of the grantor, and to exclude the marital rights of the husband and his creditors, would have been just and meritorious. So, an absolute deed, without consideration, would have been good against his creditors. But, here is an absolute deed, accompanied with possession in the husband after the marriage; and therefore, as it has been decided that such a transaction by a man in debt, is void for the supposed secret trust, it ought to be equally so here. But, there is one manifest distinction between the two cases. There it would not do that this secret trust should appear on the face of the deed; it must be secret, and of course, fraudulent.

266 *no inducement to secrecy. Property settled to the sole use of the wife, (she to be permitted to use and enjoy it) is more for the benefit of the husband, who is in debt to insolvency, than either a secret trust, or one declared on the face of the deed for her use generally. There is, therefore, no motive for secrecy or fraud. But, we must presume there was a secret trust, and that this secret trust was in fact for the husband. I see no necessity for this strained application of the rule, as applicable to a debtor parting with his own property. Why are we to presume a trust at all, if none was declared at the time? Why not take it as an absolute gift, and the possession to be such as the brother might have permitted of other property of his; or at most, as a hope that he would agree to hold for her use, which he had a right not to disappoint. But, if we must presume a trust of some kind, are we bound to presume it a trust for the husband and his creditors? Could he, in a suit for that purpose, insist upon it as a secret trust for him? What head of equity have the creditors to stand on, that he has not? I cannot perceive any. What principle of equity or public policy compels us to infer a trust for him and his creditors, contrary to every declaration and manifest intention, both by him and her, that his marital rights were to be intercepted? I confess I can see none. On the contrary, it has been decided by this Court, where a woman, about to marry a man much involved in debt, settles her own property with his consent, in trust that the husband and wife should enjoy the interest and profits of the said estate jointly during their lives, gives no claim to his creditors, as it would defeat the avowed object of the settlement. Scott, &c. v. Gibbon, 5 Munf. 86.

If we are bound to infer a secret trust of some kind, shall we infer one which in fact destroys the deed in toto; for, if it was generally for the wife, without any remainder over for children, then the husband would take as absolutely as if no such deed had been made. Yet the deed was good when executed; and had the possession passed to, and remained 267 *with, the brother, would have given him full right to declare what trust he pleased.

But the creditors claim, not on the rights of Jeffries acquired by the marriage; they were gone, and continued out of him, at least for so long a time as to put it in the power of Land to assert his rights under the deed, and get possession. After this, the possession remaining in Jeffries, it is said, affects the deed itself, and the undoubted title which Land would have held, but for this possession, so as to avoid it, and places Jeffries and this property, not as between him and his wife, but as to his creditors, in the same situation as if the deed had not been made. True, the possession of Jeffries may so enure to his creditors, though he might not be able to retain the property to himself. But, under what law will it so enure? Not under the terms or policy of the first section of the Statute of Frauds, as I think I have before shewn; but under that where a possession of more than five years, without trust or loan declared, &c. recorded, will give such right. I consider that this was the decision in Pryor v. Stribbling. The conveyance in that case intercepted the marital rights. Pryor had been in the general possession of property more than five years before the suit. That was a deed absolute on the face of it, and did not express the real consideration on which it was said to have been made. The possession began, probably as soon as a husband's possession could begin, that is, at the end of the year; they being in the possession of Andrew Lewis at the time of the marriage, and continued in his (Pryor's) possession, even for more than five years. This possession was adverse to the terms of the deed, and had it been uninterrupted for the five years, there would have been no doubt as to the rights of the creditors; but, that had not been the case; and Beaseley v. Owen, 3 Hen. & Munf. 455, was relied upon on that point. This case may not be law, but I am humbly of opinion that it is; as also the case of Pierce v. Turner; and if they are, I think they support my legal notice of it, which the statute intended; and the trustees let Turner into possession, who died in possession within the five years. This was relied on in the case. But, there was a trust declared in the deed, and the possession was not contrary to that. But what had creditors, ignorant of it, to do with that? Here the husband was in possession of the wife's property; and when the creditor trusts him, and sues his execution, he is met with a deed. But, it has a trust in it, and so all is fair and right. Yes, all was fair and right, thus to secure her own property, and that in a way to let her husband into possession, and not to record the deed, but to have her rights asserted and made known at any time within five years.

268 position throughout. *In this latter case, the deed was not considered a marriage settlement, though signed by the husband to shew his assent thereto. It was, like this, the case of a woman about to be married, securing her own property to herself with the assent of her intended husband; and consequently, did not fall within the meaning of the statute concerning conveyances, and did not require to be recorded. Creditors there had not that

It was contended, that though such possession might remain, and the deed would be good for eight months, yet not being recorded, it was void ab initio as to creditors. But it was decided, that the marital rights were intercepted by the deed, and that it was not void, so as to let in those rights. If this case does not go the whole way required for the one under consideration, it is only because in the one case the deed contains a declaration of trust, and in the other it is absolute. It establishes every point contended for, except what may grow out of that difference in the cases; and I cannot perceive, for the reasons aforesaid, why that difference in the case ought to vary the decision.

JUDGE CABELL delivered his opinion, that the decree should be reversed; but, as it is not now in possession of the Reporter, it will be given in the Appendix if it can be procured.

269 *The PRESIDENT.

I concur entirely with Judge Carr in his statement of the facts in this case. In the argument of it, many questions have been raised; but, I shall confine myself to the consideration of it in two aspects only; first, as regards the rights of the parties to the property in question before, and secondly, after the marriage.

In the first aspect of the case, none of the parties had any ground of complaint. At the time the deed in question was executed, the creditors of the husband had not the slightest interest in the property; nor had they any interest in his assent to the deed, as his knowledge of it was quite enough to intercept his marital rights to the property. The interest of the intended wife in the deed was very palpable. She knew that her intended husband was insolvent. She had been advised to take care of her property; and her object was, to secure it both against him and his creditors. He had refused to enter into a marriage contract for that object, from the apprehension, probably, of some imputation on his integrity; though he had declared his willingness that she should dispose of it in any manner she chose. It is obvious, that the object of all parties was a fair one, and the deed was intended to effect it and it only; and whether it has done so, is the first question. Though the word "gift" is inserted in it, I think the force of the terms "bargain and sell," &c. make it an absolute bill of sale on the face of it, and in the controversy between the parties to it, would have the effect to pass the title in the property to Land, the intended trustee; and in an action at law, the bargainor would have been estopped to deny consideration, by her seal, though none is expressed in the deed; and though, also, in a Court of Equity, she might have insisted on the intended trust for her sole use. Or, had the marriage never taken place, in contemplation of which the deed was executed, she might have insisted on a re-conveyance of the property by the intended trustee. As regarded the husband, the property being solely the wife's, he had not a scintilla of interest in it; and his knowledge of the deed intercepted his marital rights, as before remarked. That a Court of Equity, upon the facts in this case, would have compelled Land, the intended trustee, to hold the property to the sole use of the wife, as against both himself and Jeffries, I can have no doubt. The mistake or ignorance in drawing the deed, would, though absolute on its face, have warranted its jurisdiction; nor would it impair the rule, that contracts under seal are not to be changed by parol evidence. Matters collateral to the deed may always be proved by parol evidence. Ross v. Norvell, 1 Wash. 14, and the cases there cited. Nor, in this first aspect of the case, could the husband insist, that the few hours possession of the property, after the deed was executed, and before the marriage, was inconsistent with the deed. Until that moment, and for some time after, it was impossible to deliver the property to the bargainee; as it appears by the evidence, that he was at too remote a distance to receive it. Before the marriage, he had no interest in it; and immediately after, he, and not the wife, had the sole control of the possession. She was no longer sui juris. I admit that if the intended trustee had permitted him to exercise rights of ownership over it, and she had failed to assert her claim to it in due time, there might be some ground for the imputation of fraud. But nothing of this appears in this case; and in any case, it ought very clearly to appear, to divest a wife of her rights; who, though as regards the property settled to her sole use, is to be considered as a single woman to all intents and purposes, cannot be so considered in a controversy with her husband, or those claiming under him, to impute laches to her. There is nothing in the Statute of Frauds affecting this question of possession. It depends on a rule of law which is laid down by Lord Mansfield, in the case of Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. Rep. 432, with great precision, and in several subsequent cases. He says, "if 271 *there is a sale of goods, and the vendor remain in possession and appear the owner, it is evidence of fraud, because goods pass by delivery only. Such a possession and ownership, unexplained by evidence of circumstances accounting for it, makes the deed fraudulent per se," upon the general principle that prima facie evidence uncontradicted, becomes conclusive of the fact which it is intended to prove. The case of Edwards v. Harben, and the cases in this Court, go no further. It would be wasting time to produce cases shewing that such explanation may be given, when it is confined to unavoidable circumstances, in exclusion of any agreement or assent of the parties, inconsistent with the deed.

In the second aspect of the case, as regards the rights of the creditors of the husband, who are supposed to be more favoured, if the transaction was bona fide at the time the deed was executed, and all objection is removed to the short possession of the wife after that period and before the marriage, there is neither any thing in the Statute of Frauds, nor in the rule of law, to avail them. If indeed there was any contrivance between the parties, to give to the husband the effectual ownership of the property, and at the same time to defeat the claims of the creditors, the transaction would be justly considered as fraudulent. But, there is certainly no evidence of such a design in this case. The error in the argument on this point was, in treating the marital rights as in existence at the time the deed was executed. They potentially existed, it is true; but not in the will of the husband only. It depended on the will of the intended wife; the more especially as the property was hers, and nothing of the husband's property was to be affected by the deed. His creditors, therefore, if the transaction was bona fide as to all the parties to it, have nothing to complain of; although in the event that the marriage had taken place without the deed, they would have been entitled to the property. Claiming through the rights of the husband as they must do, against a fair and bona fide contract, 272 *they cannot stand on better ground than he does. As the title to the property passed out of the wife while sole, to the intended trustee Land, the marital rights did not attach upon it, and the pretensions of the creditors of Jeffries are no better than his. Nor will a Court of Equity be very willing to favor them in such case. In the case of Hastington v. Gill, 3 Term Rep. 620, note, which has been cited, Lord Mansfield said, that Courts of Equity, for ages past, have thought the rules of the common law too hard, and he thought it right to protect the property of the wife against the extravagance of the husband, in cases clear of fraud. This is done, he said, by the intervention of trustees; and thus far the wife is to all intents and purposes a single woman, and wherever the trust can be supported in a Court of Equity, it will consider the trustee entitled to the legal estate. In the case of Cadogan v. Kennett, he also said that the Statute of Frauds in such case ought not to be construed to make innocent parties sufferers.

Considering the deed in this case as an ordinary bill of sale on the face of it, it is not necessary to enquire whether it was duly recorded. There is no statute requiring such a deed to be recorded. If recorded, it would have given no notice of the trust intended. Nor, if it is to be considered as a deed of gift, was it material to record it in this case. In that character, it would have passed the title to the property, with the knowledge of the intended husband, to the donee; and being executed with good faith, could not be complained of by him, or his creditors claiming through him. It was not a marriage contract, but a bona fide transfer of the property of the wife, with the knowledge of her intended husband. A construction which would let in his creditors in such case, would be in restraint of marriage, which would not be countenanced by the Court. It would be a fraud on the wife to defeat an object fair in its circumstances at the time, and in the attainment of which, there was no will to conflict with her own. *I admit that if an ex post facto character could be given to such a transaction, fraud might be imputed to it. But, there is certainly no ground for such imputation in the present case.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to discuss the merits of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Pierce v. Turner, of which I entirely approve. Taking the legal title to the property to be in Land, the intended trustee, he might have been left to his remedy at law against the defendant Stewart, but for the nature of the property in question, which, upon the principles of the Court in such cases, cannot be compensated for in damages.

On the whole, my opinion is, that the decree of the Chancellor be reversed, and the injunction perpetuated.

Decree reversed.

June, 1827.

Wills—Construction—Fee Tail.—A will is made between the 1st day of January, 1787, and the 1st day of January, 1820, by which the testator gives to his sons several tracts of land, and if either of them should die without lawful issue the part allotted to him to be equally divided among his surviving brothers, &c., this is a fee tail, and not an executory devise.

This was an ejectment brought in the Superior Court of Louisa county, by John Doe, lessee of Robert, George, Nathan and Ashley Bell, surviving sons and devisees of George Bell, deceased, by his last wife, against David Gillespie.

At the trial, the jury found a special verdict, the substance of which is fully stated in the opinion of Judge Carr. The Superior Court gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff obtained a supersedeas.

This case, and the following one of •Wills—Construction—Fee Tail.—In Nowlin v. Winfree, 8 Gratt. 346, a testator, who died in 1803, devised his estate, both real and personal, to his three daughters and "their heirs lawfully begotten of their bodies." "And, in case either of my daughters should die without heir or heirs as above mentioned, the surviving ones to enjoy their equal part." ALLEN, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said (p. 348): "The question presented by the special verdict as to the proper construction of the will of Benjamin Hall deceased, has been frequently under consideration in this court. The case of Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 273, presented precisely the same question, and the principle there settled rules this case. That case conformed to the earlier decisions of this court, giving a construction to the laws docking entails; and it has been recognized and followed in the subsequent cases of Broadbuss v. Turner, 5 Rand. 308; Griffith v. Thomson, 1 Leigh 321; Callava v. Pope, 3 Leigh 103; Deane v. Hansford, 9 Leigh

JUDGE CARR.

This is an action of ejectment. The jury have found a special verdict, of which the following abstract contains the material facts in the cause. On the 3d of March, 1787, George Bell made and published his will in due form, and died in the same year. He had (as appears from the will) a son and daughter by a former wife, and five sons by the second. To the children by the first wife, he gives some trifling articles of personal property. He lends to his wife, during life or widowhood, a tract of land particularly described, and some personal property. To his son George, he gives a tract of land, he paying to his younger brothers 20l. a piece, as they arrive

253. The principle thus firmly established by a series of adjudications has become a rule of property in the construction of wills made prior to 1819, and ought not now to be questioned, the more especially as but few cases are likely to occur hereafter in which the question can arise. According to these authorities the will in this case created an estate tail in the first taker by express words; and the bequest over after the death of the daughter without heirs was an executory limitation after an indefinite failure of issue, and therefore void, and the daughters took the slaves in absolute property." But see 1 Rev. Code, ch. 90, § 26; Va. Code 1887, § 2423.

On this subject the principal case is also cited in Broadbuss v. Turner, 5 Rand. 308, 310, 315; Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 78; Griffith v. Thomson, 1 Leigh 329; Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 405, 412; Seekright v. Billups, 4 Leigh 110, 111; Doe v. Craigen, 8 Leigh 453; Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 86; Tinsley v. Jones, 13 Gratt. 298; Moore v. Brooks, 12 Gratt. 150; Randolph v. Wright, 81 Va. 618.

See generally, monographic note on "Wills" appended to Hughes v. Hughes, 2 Munf. 309.

at age. To his sons Nathan, Ashley and Anthony he gives the balance of his land, to be equally divided among them. To these devisees, there are no words of inheritance superadded; but it may be plainly collected from the will, that the testator meant to give them the fee. Then comes the clause on which this case depends. "I give and bequeath unto my son Pleasants the land which I lent to my wife before mentioned, containing one hundred and fifty acres, to him and his heirs, after the decease of my widow, or sooner if she marries, as before provided; and further my will is, that if either of my said sons, to whom I have bequeathed lands, should die without lawful issue, that the part allotted them be equally divided among the surviving brothers, children of my last wife."

In 1804, the widow and Pleasants sold and conveyed the land to the defendant. In 1805, Pleasants died, without marriage or issue, and the widow in 1815. The plaintiffs are the surviving brothers by the last wife. The Court below decided the matters in law arising on the verdict, 276 *to be for the defendant, and judgment was rendered accordingly; from which the appeal is taken.

The question is, what estate did P. Bell take in the land? Was it a fee simple, with an executory devise over to the surviving brothers? Or, was it an estate tail, enlarged by our statute into a fee?

Executory devisees are a mere indulgence granted to men's wills, lest the intention of the testator should be wholly defeated, and are only resorted to when the limitation can in no other way be sustained. Hence the rule laid down by Lord Hale in Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Lev. 39, that a limitation, which by possibility may take effect as a contingent remainder, shall never be construed an executory devise. As executory devisees tend to a perpetuity, the policy of the law has restricted them to a reasonable time; which has been settled to be a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years after. Unless they are so limited that the event on which they depend must happen within this period, they are void in their creation. Thus, a devise to A. and his heirs, and if he die without issue living at his death, then to B. and his heirs, is an estate in fee to A. with an executory devise to B., and the devise to B. is good, because the event which determines its existence or non-existence, is B.'s death. So, if in any other way, it appear by "fair demonstration," that the testator intended to limit the dying without issue to the period established by law, the executory devise will be valid. But, a devise to A. and his heirs, and if he die without issue, to B. and his heirs, can vest no estate in B. by way of executory devise; because, coming after the estate tail in A. it may take effect as a remainder; and even if this objection did not exist, it would be void as an executory devise; because, being limited after an indefinite failure of issue, it is too remote. In England, estates tail may be destroyed by fine and recovery; with us, by statute. In either case, the remainder falls with the particular estate which supported it. But if, instead 277 of a remainder dependent *on an estate tail, it be an executory devise after a fee simple, it cannot be affected either by the fine and recovery of the tenant, or the operation of our law. Hence the struggle so often repeated in the English Courts and ours, between the alienage, heirs or devisees of the first taker, and those who claim as executory devisees.

In our case, after giving each son a fee simple in his land, the testator says, "My will is, if either of my sons should die without lawful issue, that the part allotted them be equally divided among the surviving brothers, children of my last wife." What did he mean? Did he look to a definite or indefinite failure of issue in the first takers? It seems to me clear, that he meant that the land given to each son should be enjoyed by the family of that son, so long as any branch of it remained; and that whenever it failed, the land should go over. That he meant the issue of the first taker to enjoy the land, so long as they lasted, is directly and positively declared. Why should he fix an earlier period, than the failure of this issue, as the epoch at which the second limitation should be determined? P. Bell and his immediate family, were the first objects of his bounty; his other sons and their families, the second. Why should he fix the period of Pleasants' death, as the moment at which, if his brothers could not take his estate, they never should take? Suppose P. Bell had left a child at his death, and that child had died the day or the hour after him. Did the testator mean, in such a case, that his other sons should have no part of, or interest in, P. Bell's land? I can neither feel nor understand the motive, which could prompt a father to this. Why he should postpone the interests of his other sons to the failure of the issue of P. Bell, I can clearly see; but, I cannot perceive why time should be so important with him, as that he should say to his other sons, "though it is my will that you have the land of P. Bell if he has no child at his death, yet if he leave a child, you shall not have it, though that child die the next hour." If he had had this idea in 278 his mind, *would it not have been more natural and direct to have said, "It is my will, that if either of my sons die without issue living at his death, his part shall be equally divided among his surviving brothers?"

It is insisted, however, that express words are not necessary to tie up the failure to the death; that any words which make the intention clear are sufficient; and that those used here, leave no doubt of the testator's meaning. The words are, that the part of the son dying without issue "be equally divided among the surviving brothers, children of my last wife." Great reliance was placed on the words "surviving brothers;" but the word survivor, is not a word of limitation. Dying without issue, have been long settled as words of limitation, giving an estate tail. The question is, do these words, surviving brothers, indicate so strong an intention to tie up the failure of issue to the death of the first taker, as to prevent the words dying without issue, from having their settled meaning and effect? There are numerous cases upon this subject. I shall not attempt to cite them all; nor to reconcile them with each other. I will state a few to shew the ground on which I rest, in thinking that the words surviving brothers have not the effect contended for.

Chadock v. Cowley, Cro. Jac. 695, decided four years after Pells v. Brown, and by three of the same Judges. The testator devised all his lands in B. to Thomas, his son, and all his lands in E. to F. his son; and added, "Item, I will that the survivor of them shall be heir to the other, if either die without issue." Held by all the Judges (absente Lea, C. J.) that it was an estate tail in Thomas.

In Hope v. Taylor, 1 Burr. 268, R. S. devised to J. W. his sister's eldest son, his house in the brook with the out buildings and 30l.; to his nephew R. T. 50l.; to his nephews C. T., R. T., W. T., 29 acres of arable and meadow land, &c.; then to W. T. his sister's son, the house in question, and gives him also 10l.; to his brother-in-law, W. T. 5l.; and declares his will 279 and meaning to be, that *if either of the persons before named die without issue lawfully begotten, then the said legacy shall be divided equally between them that are left alive. Lord Mansfield and the whole Court decided, 1st, that the word legacy comprehended the land as well as the personal estate mentioned in the will; 2d, Lord Mansfield said, the testator meant this second clause as a restraint on the first, and meant that the issue should have it; and the whole Court decided that an estate tail was given.

In Roe v. Scott & Smart, decided in C. P. 27th George 3d, 2 Fearn, 209; testator devised certain lands to his son James, to him, his heirs and assigns for ever; other lands to his son John, to hold to him, his heirs and assigns for ever; other lands to his son Thomas, to hold to him and his heirs and assigns for ever; and after charging the land of Thomas with an annuity, added, that his will and mind was, that if either of his three sons should depart this life without issue of his or their bodies, then the estate or estates of such sons should go to the survivors or survivor; and if all his said sons should happen to die without such issue, then he devised all the said premises to his four daughters, their heirs and assigns forever. Held, that the sons took estates tail. It would be difficult to distinguish this case from the one before us. They are alike in all their branches; the fee given to the three sons; then if either die without issue, his estate to the survivor or survivors. If it be objected, that the word estate here operates to carry the fee to the second taker; I will shew presently that our case has this feature also.

In Barlow v. Salter, 17 Ves. 479, the devise was in these words: "All my estate, real and personal, to my daughter, M. V. to her and her heirs, and half the navigation money for her natural life; and in case she dies without issue, all to be divided between my four nephews and nieces, N.

W. C. and E.; C's part only for life, and her part to be divided between the survivors." The bill was filed by one of the nephews against the daughter, praying 280 *that the nephews and nieces might be declared entitled on the event of the daughter's dying without issue living at her death, and praying an account accordingly. It was admitted that there was no real estate; and this makes the case the stronger; for, it is well known that slighter words will be taken to tie up the failure to the death, in personal than in real property. The Master of the Rolls went into the consideration of the words "in case she die without issue." The Judges in some of the early cases, he said had inclined to hold these words to mean issue at the death of the person named; but, he thought that ever since the case of Beauclerk v. Dormer, a different rule had prevailed. "The Court ought not certainly to profess to adopt one of these rules, and yet to proceed as if the other was the right one; which however is done, where the meaning of the words is held to be narrowed by expressions or circumstances that do not raise any fair inference of a restrictive intention. The single circumstance in this case relied on in favour of the restrictive construction is, that one of the four persons to whom the bequest over is made, is to take a life interest in her part, which is to be divided equally among the survivors." In a further part of his opinion, he observes that the word "survivors as used here, has the same sense as to word others, as has been frequently decided." He concludes by pronouncing it an estate tail in the daughter, and dismissing the bill.

Let us come now nearer home, and examine some of the decisions of this Court. If I mistake not, we shall find that they settle this question even more conclusively than the English cases.

Carter v. Tyler, 1 Call, 143. Will made in 1759. "My will is, that my son W. C. have all my lands" (describing a particular tract,) "to him and his heirs lawfully begotten, for ever; &c. I give to my son J. C. all the remaining part of my land," &c. (describing the tract,) "to him and his heirs lawfully begotten, for ever; and if either 281 of my sons should die without issue, my will is that the whole *go to the survivor; and if they both die without issue lawfully begotten, then my will is, after my wife's death, that the lands be sold, and the monies thereon be equally divided between my daughters then living, and their heirs forever." I consider this a case deserving the utmost weight. It is the first we meet with in our books, after the passing the laws docking entails. It was decided by the unanimous opinion of the Court, consisting of Pendleton, Lyons, Carrington, Fleming, and Roane. These venerable and able men were actors in those eventful scenes, which gave birth to these laws; some of them, probably, members of the Legislature which passed them. The cause was argued with great learning and ability by the most distinguished counsel then at the bar. Mr. Call, and Mr. Washington, put forth all their strength to prove that the limitations over were not destroyed by the statutes. The ground was taken very strongly, that they were executory devises. But the Court, in a clear, forcible, and decided opinion, delivered by their President, pronounced that the sons took estates tail, and that the limitations over were void.

Let us examine for a moment the points of resemblance between this case, and the one at bar. I think we shall find, that it contains much stronger evidence than ours, of an intention to tie up the failure of issue to the death of the sons. 1st. If one of them die without issue, the whole goes to the survivor, without any words of inheritance superadded. 2d. If both die without issue, then, after my wife's death, the lands to be sold. Here is a provision which shews that he thought the event he was contemplating, (the death of his sons without issue,) might occur in the life of their mother; strong to evince that it was not an indefinite failure of issue. But, this is not all. 3d. The lands were to be sold, and the monies thereon to be "equally divided among my daughters then living and their heirs." When living? Why, living at the death of the sons without issue, and of the mother, if she 282 *should survive them. To me this appears vastly stronger than the case at bar, to shew an intention to restrain the failure of issue to the death of the sons; and yet a full Court unanimously decided against the executory devise. This decision was made in 1797, near thirty years ago. It has never been questioned, but often referred to by the later cases as authority. If we now overrule it, who can tell how many titles, resting on the basis of this very decision, we may shake to their foundation?

The next case is that of Hill v. Burrow, 3 Call, 342, decided in 1803. The contest was renewed upon the old battle ground; whether it was an estate tail, or a fee with an executory devise limited upon it. The intention of the testator, and its decisive weight in the construction of wills, were strongly pressed; and Porter v. Bradley, Roe v. Jeffery, and that whole class of cases brought before the Court. They were again unanimous in their decision, that it was an estate tail. Judge Lyons has the following sound and pertinent remarks: "It is to no purpose to be arguing about the intention, unless the words will authorise a restricted construction; for, mere intention cannot prevail against a settled rule of interpretation, which has fixed an appropriate sense to particular words; because, when the sense is once imposed, they become the indicia of the testator's mind, until the contrary is shewn by countervailing expressions. It is better that it should be so too; for, the law ought to be certain; and where the rule is once laid down, it should be adhered to. Otherwise, what is called liberality at the bar, will degenerate into arbitrary discretion, and all depends upon the will of the Judge." He adds, "An infringement of the rule, instead of supporting the Legislative intention, would go directly to defeat it; and would tend, under the notion of executory devises, to introduce that very clog to alienation, which the statute meant to abolish."

The case of Tate v. Tally, 3 Call, 354, followed soon after. The words of the devise were nearly the same; *but, the will was made after the Act of 1776, and this furnished to the ingenuity of counsel a ground of distinction at least plausible. Mr. Wickham pressed this point with great power. He argued, that in England estates tail were implied for the benefit of the issue: that here such implication would have exactly the contrary effect: that a devise of lands since 1776, should be placed on the same ground with personal estate; because, the first devise will now give the whole estate in lands as in personals; and the implication would disappoint the intention of the testator. The Court, however, held fast to the former decisions, pronounced it an estate tail, and that the construction must be the same since as before the statute.

Next comes the case of Eldridge v. Fisher, 1 Hen. & Munf. 559. Will in 1784. Devise of land and personal estate to his son and his heirs, and if he die without lawful heirs, to the grand-son of the testator. The counsel for the grand-son, in whose favor the Court below had decided, said that after the former decisions he should surrender the case, if it did not present an important distinction. Real and personal estate were devised by the same words in the same sentence. The whole Court considering the case settled, decided the estate of the first taker to be an estate tail, and reversed the judgment of the Court below.

Sydnor v. Sydnor, 2 Munf. 269. Will in 1779. Testator gave to his four sons a tract of land each, to him and his heirs for ever. "And it is my desire, that if any of my four sons should die without heirs of their bodies, that then the parts of them so dying, shall be equally divided among the survivors and their heirs." One of the sons died without issue, and devised his land to a nephew. The surviving brother sued for it; and the Court below, on a special verdict, decided the law to be for them. On the appeal, great reliance was placed on the word survivors, and the whole doctrine again gone into. The Court unanimously (Fleming, Roane, 284 Brooke, and Cabell.) considered *it a settled case; and without delivering opinions, reversed the judgment of the Court below. I consider this a case strongly in point. The only imaginable distinction between it and the case at bar, is, that there the devise is to the survivors and their heirs; in our case, to the survivors, without words of inheritance superadded. But to me, this seems a distinction without a difference. For I hold, that in this case equally as in that, the survivors were intended to take, and would take, (if they took at all) a fee simple. Because, in the commencement of his will, the testator declares his intention of disposing of his worldly goods; and we know that these words, and others of the like kind, will, in favor of intention, and to prevent a partial intestacy, be transposed to any subsequent devise in the will, and make such devise as effectual in carrying the fee, as if words of inheritance had been used. For the reasoning and authorities on this subject, I refer to Goodrich v. Harding, 3 Rand. 280.

The other cases in our books on his subject, are M'Clintick v. Manns, 4 Munf. 328; Tidball v. Lupton, 1 Rand. 194; Kendall v. Eyre, 1 Rand. 288, and Goodrich v. Harding, 3 Rand. 280. These cases are in perfect harmony with the former, and present an unbroken series of decisions for the last thirty years. Surely this ought to settle the law.

As to the idea that the law of 1819, is an expression of the Legislative opinion, that the Courts have heretofore decided wrong on this subject, and furnishes us with a fair opportunity to break the toils in which former decisions have bound us, I would remark, 1. That it is not the province of the Legislature to censure the exposition which the Courts give to any law; nor ought we to impute to them, on slight ground, such usurpation; 2. That the words of the Act imply no such censure; but acknowledging the existing law to be as settled by the Courts, mean merely to change it for the future; saying that in a will or deed hereafter made, a contingent limitation depending upon the 285 *dying of a person without heirs, heirs of the body, issue, issue of the body, &c. shall be held to take effect, when such persons shall die without heir, issue, &c. living at the time of his death, or born within ten months. This law is entirely prospective. The Legislature have justly thought, that to give it an ex post facto effect, would be wrong. Shall the Courts then give it such operation? So far from this law furnishing a fair opportunity to overturn the settled course of decisions, I think it shews us the propriety of a different line of conduct, of leaving this subject exactly where the law has left it. The great advantage which a change of the law by the Legislature, has over a change by the Courts, (even if this could properly be done) is, that the one is a public rule, binding all alike, and looking to the future only. The other is a rule, which, as the Court makes, it may break; and which affects past, as well as future cases. For the last century or two, dying without heirs, issue, &c. has been settled to mean a general failure, not tied up to the death of the first taker. If we say now, that these decisions are all wrong, will not our successors have more right to reverse our decision, than we have to reverse one with the frost of centuries upon it? But our decision will be retrospective; for, as we do not assume the power of making, but only declaring, the law, if we say that these decisions are wrong, all the estates which have been settled, all the contracts which have been made, all the titles which rest on the foundation of their correctness, are uprooted. Nor can we see the extent of the mischief. A few cases only have come before us, for some years back; because, the law being settled, counsel would generally advise against it. But, only open the door; proclaim to the world that all which has heretofore been done is wrong; and then we shall see the wild uproar and confusion among titles, which will follow. Is it not better to prevent this, by holding on in the course we have so long run? The cases which arose prior to the law of 1819, must cease after a time; and then that law settles the matter.

286 *JUDGE GREEN.

If in this case, the limitation over to the surviving brothers of Pleasants Beil, had been to them and their heirs, no question could have been raised, that the intention of the testator to provide for the issue of Pleasants indefinitely, so long as any existed; and upon the general failure of his issue, for his brothers and their heirs, would have reduced the express estate in fee given to Pleasants, to an estate tail, for the purpose of effectuating this general intention, which could not, upon any other construction, be carried into effect. It would be precisely the case of Sydnor v. Sydnor, 2 Munf. 269, over again. In that case, it would be immaterial to determine, whether the testator intended by surviving brothers, all the other brothers; a meaning sometimes given to the word survivor; or whether he intended only, such of the brothers and their heirs who survived Pleasants, to take. In either case, the limitation over would be a remainder after the estate tail; in the first case, vested, in the other, contingent; and in both, defeated by the operation of our statute converting estates tail into absolute estates in fee simple.

It is however insisted, that as the law was before the 7th day of October, 1776 the limitation over to the surviving brothers, without the words and their heirs, or any other words of perpetuity, gave them only life estates, upon the contingency of their surviving Pleasants; and as that contingency must happen within a life or lives in being, the limitation over could be supported as a good executory devise; and therefore, there is no necessity to reduce, by construction, the express estate in fee given to Pleasants, to an estate tail, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator. This would be true, if there was nothing to prove that the limitation over to the surviving brothers was a limitation of the fee, and if the case of Roe v. Jeffrey is law, of which I doubt. It may however, be admitted as law, for the purpose of this 287 case. In enquiring *whether the limitation over was of an estate in fee, I pass over the effect which the introductory clause of the will may have upon this question, and put it entirely upon the force of the Act of 1785, which took effect on the 1st day of January, 1787, and provided that "every estate in lands which shall hereafter be granted, conveyed or devised to one, although other words heretofore necessary to transfer an estate of inheritance be not added, shall be deemed a fee simple, if a less estate be not limited by express words, or do not appear to be granted, conveyed or devised, by construction or operation of law." The will being made, and the testator having died in 1787, after this Act was in force, the statute is decisive, that the surviving brothers took a fee, if any estate; and Pleasants, therefore, an estate tail, unless we are not at liberty to take into consideration the effect of this statute, in determining whether Pleasants took an estate tail or not. This question has an important influence in the construction of wills made since the 1st day of January, 1787, and before the 1st day of January, 1820, when the Act respecting executory limitations took effect, and ought therefore to be at once decided.

Estate tails were unknown to the common law. They were created by the statute de donis conditionalibus, which provided, "voluntas donationis secundum formam in charta doni sui manifeste expressam de cætero observetur." In executing this law, it was the duty of the Court to ascertain from the whole will taken together, whether the intent of the testator was to provide for the issue of the first taker; and if so, without regard to the particular estates given in terms by the will, to hold that the first taker had an estate tail, if the issue could not otherwise be provided for, according to the intention of the testator. Thus, an express estate for life or in fee was converted into an estate tail, if that were necessary to effect this intent in favor of the issue. But, if not absolutely necessary for that purpose, the state expressly given was not disturbed. This statute was in force in Virginia, from the first settlement of the country, until the revolution; was adopted by the ordinance of the convention of May, 1776, with all other British statutes in aid of the common law prior to the 4th year of James 1st, as the law of Virginia; and continued in force until December, 1792, when it was repealed with all other British statutes. The statute de donis was in force when the will in question was made, and when the testator died; and if no other statute had any influence on the question, the Act of 1785 must have had a decisive influence on its construction. In England, and in Virginia, before the Act of 1785 took effect, a devise to one in fee, and if he died without issue, then to another and his heirs, was construed to give to the first taker an estate tail, notwithstanding the express estate in fee given by the terms of the will; because, it was apparent that the testator's intent was to provide first for the issue of the first taker, and after that, for the second taker and his heirs; both of which intentions would be frustrated, if the first taker had a fee simple estate, since in that case the issue could claim nothing per formam doni, and the limitation over would be void, as being a fee mounted upon a fee. But, the Court did not, by construction, destroy the express estate in fee given by the will, unless there was such a necessity for the sake of effectuating the testator's intention. If, therefore, he directed the estate to go over to another upon the death of the first taker without issue then living, there did not appear so decisive an intent in favor of the remote issue of the first taker; and the limitation over could take effect, in the event provided for, as an executory devise, and the testator's intent in that respect carried into effect. The express estate in fee, therefore, was not reduced by implication to an estate tail. Upon this principle, a limitation over of an estate for life was held to be a good executory devise, and not to affect the fee given to the first taker; and a limitation to one, without words of perpetuity, was, in effect, the same as an express limitation for life. In that case, if there were no ultimate limitation over of the fee, the heir of, or the purchaser from, the first taker, would be entitled to the estate in fee simple, after the estate for life expired.

After the 1st of January, 1787, a limitation over without any words of perpetuity or limiting a smaller estate, gave a fee; and the reason, upon which a limitation over for life was held to be good as an executory devise, no longer existed. Every reason, upon which it was thought necessary to limit the estate of the first taker to an estate tail, when the limitation over was in fee, would apply to the case arising under the statute. Can it be for a moment supposed, that if a statute like ours of 1785, was passed in England, it would not have this effect upon the construction of wills there? If it had not, the most extraordinary consequences would follow. The person to whom an estate was given after the failure of issue of the first taker, upon the argument that he was only entitled to an estate for life, having gotten the estate on that ground, would be entitled to it in fee; whereas, if he was only entitled in reality to an estate for life, the fee would remain to the heirs of the first taker, or the purchaser from him. In other cases, other consequences as absurd as this would arise. Loddington v. Kime, 1 Salk. 224. Thus a devise to A. who has no child, for life, and then to his issue and their heirs, if he should have any, and if he die without issue, then to B. and his heirs; A. would be entitled to an estate for life only, with remainder in fee to his issue as they came in esse, if he had any; and if not, then remainder to B. and his heirs. 3 Salk. 126. But, if the devise was, before the Act of 1785, to A. for life, and to his issue if he have any, and if he die without issue, then to B. and his heirs; A. would have an estate tail, with remainder in fee to B. In both cases it is apparent, that the testator meant to give only a life estate to A., and provide for the issue of A., as long as he had any; and then for B. and his heirs. In the first case, all those objects are effected by the estates expressly given by the testator, because the estate given to the issue of A. is a fee. But in the other, an estate for life only being given to the issue of A., the testator's object of providing for A's remote issue, would be frustrated, unless A. was held to have an estate tail; by which, all the testator's intentions would be carried into effect, except only that of limiting an estate for life to A. Suppose, after our statute of 1785, we refuse to apply the rule prescribed by it to a case like the last stated. Then the estate tail of A. raised by implication, being converted by our statutes into a fee simple, the intention of the testator, both as to the issue of A. and B., and the estate of A. would be utterly frustrated. But, apply the rule furnished by the statute, and consider the issue of A. to be entitled to a fee simple; and the testator's intentions as to A. and the issue of A. and as to B. and his heirs, would be carried into complete effect, without defeating any part of his intentions. It is hardly possible, that any Legislative provision could have been intended to produce such consequences. Let us examine the only statutes, which can possibly be supposed to prohibit the Court from giving effect to the Act of 1785, in construing a will with a view to ascertain whether it created an estate tail or not.

The Act of October 7, 1776, only declared, that "any person who then had, or thereafter might have, an estate tail, should, from thenceforth, or from the commencement of such estate tail, stand ipso facto seised in full and absolute fee simple." The Act of October, 1785, ch. 62, provided, that "every estate which, on the 7th of October, 1776, was an estate tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been; and from thenceforward to continue, an estate in fee simple; and every estate which since hath been limited, or hereafter shall be limited, so that as the law aforesaid was, such estate would have been an estate tail, shall also be deemed to have been, and to continue, an estate in fee simple."

The expression as the law aforesaid 291 was, refers *to the law as it was before the 7th of October, 1776, when the Act converting estates tail into fee simple estates, passed. This is the literal import of the words; and so they were understood by the Legislature at the revival of 1819, in which the revised Act refers expressly to the law as it was before the 7th of October, 1776. Was it intended by this expression to refer to all the particular decisions in England and Virginia, anterior to the 7th of October, 1776, as the rules for decision in all future time, without regard to the effect which future laws might have upon the reasons, on which those decisions were founded? Or, to adopt the principles upon which those decisions were founded? The decisions before that time were founded upon the principle, that where the intent of the testator was to provide indefinitely for the issue of the first taker, and that object could not be effected without implying an estate tail in the first taker, such an estate tail must be implied, although it controlled the will of the testator in respect to the particular estates given in terms by his will. This necessity to imply an estate tail, not given in terms, arose sometimes from the existing law of primogeniture, which would defeat the intent to provide for all the issue, unless the first taker was construed to take an estate tail; sometimes from the effect of the then existing law requiring words of perpetuity to give more than an estate for life; by force of which, the immediate issue of the first taker would be limited to an estate for life, unless the first taker took an estate tail. But, when the law of primogeniture was abolished, and all the issue admitted to participate in the inheritance, and an estate in fee was allowed to be given, without words of perpetuity, by our statutes, the reason upon which the former decisions, turning on these points, were founded, was taken away. By preserving the ancient principles, and applying them to this new state of things, the results would be different; but in both cases, conforming, as near as possible, to the main intentions of the testator to provide for the issue. When 292 the Act of 1785 was passed, the statute de donis was still in force; and by the expression as the law aforesaid was, the Legislature could not have intended to say, that an express estate tail should be construed to be an estate tail; but it was easy to foresee, that when a question arose whether an estate tail should be implied or not, it might be argued that, as an estate tail could not exist after it was implied, there could be no motive for implying it; and that, therefore, no such estate could be implied since the 7th of October, 1776; an argument repeatedly urged since, and overruled. It was to obviate this objection to implying estates tail, and for this purpose only, that the act declared that those estates which would have been fees tail as the law aforesaid was, should be deemed estates in fee simple. It was absolutely necessary to declare, that estates tail might be implied from the intent of the testator to provide for issue, in order to effect the object of the Act of 1776, which was to give to the first taker the power of providing for his issue by giving them the estate, without compelling him to do so, wherever it appeared that the testator intended to provide for the issue; a policy which might frequently be frustrated, if an estate tail could not be implied. As if a devise were to A. for life, and if he died without issue, then to B. and his heirs, the obvious intention of the testator that the issue of A. should take, would be frustrated, unless A's life estate could be enlarged to a fee tail (converted by the statute into a fee simple,) by implication: For, in no other way could they take any thing in any possible event.

This construction would have prevailed upon the statute of 1776, if the Act of 1785 had not expressly prescribed it. That Act prescribed it from excessive caution; and upon the whole, I think the rule prescribed by the Act of 1785 was, that an estate tail should be implied, whenever under our existing laws, it was necessary to do so, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator in respect to the issue; the Act 293 adopting for that purpose the reason *of the law, and not the particular cases decided before the 7th of October, 1776; and that upon the reason of the law. Pleasants Bell had, in this case, an estate tail, and not a fee, by force of the will; or, if he had an estate in fee simple by the will, the limitation over to his surviving brothers was in fee, and therefore void.

JUDGE COALTER.

This case arises on the will of George Bell, made on the 3d of March, 1787, and on which will these questions arise:

1. Whether Pleasants Bell took an estate in fee with remainder to his surviving brothers, which, by the Act of 1785, must be in fee, although no words giving a fee are in the will; and is that remainder limited on the contingency of a dying without issue at his death, so as to be good as an executory devise? Or,

2. Was it intended to give an estate tail to Picasants Bell, which would be the case if an indefinite failure of issue was intended?

It is said to be an established rule, that when a devise is to A. and his heirs, and if he die without issue, or to him generally, and if he die without issue, it is an estate tail; and that this rule does not yield except to express declarations to the contrary, or to effect some obvious intention in his mind at the time. On the other hand it is said, that the happening of the contingency need not be tied down by express words; but, if it appears from the whole will together, it is enough; that this is a good limitation, at least according to the more modern decisions in England, and at all events, would be a good limitation of a personal subject; and that however it may be, if an estate is given to one for life, and if he die without issue, as to inferring an estate tail, it is not so easily to be inferred when the first taker has an express fee by the will.

The difference between a will of real and personal property, in relation to estates tail by implication, is stated *by 294 Judge Pendleton in his clear and plain manner, in the case of Dunn v. Bray, 1 Call, 294. He says, cases have been cited to prove that in a devise of lands to one for life or in fee, and if he die without issue, remainder over, &c., this would turn the first estate into an estate tail, in order to favor the testator's intention of preferring the issue to the remainder-man; but in principle, the distinction, in case of personal property, is clear, since the implication in the case of lands to favor the intention, would be misapplied, if made use of to destroy that intention in the case of personals.

Our Act of 1776 docking entails, and the Act of 1785 reenacting that, and also dispensing with words of inheritance, introduced an entire new state of things in this State, on this subject. Lands were put precisely in the situation of personal property, not only as to the want of power to entail them, but as to the quantity of the estate taken, where no estate less than an absolute one is limited. Under this state of things it was reasonable to expect, that the Courts would have construed wills of lands and personals, made after 1776, alike. It is said, however, that not only the Acts of 1776 and 1785 themselves, but our decisions under them, have tied us down to construe wills as to real estates made since 1776, in the same manner as if estates tail could now be made; that is, that notwithstanding the essential change in the condition of testators here, we are to decide on their wills, as if made in England under their statute de donis; and that although we are thus not to permit the absence of power to make an estate tail, to weigh in the construction of wills, yet, on the other hand, we are not prohibited, either by the statute, or our decisions, from looking at the other part of the system, by which realty and personality are put on the same footing, to wit, that part of the statute, by which an absolute estate passes, unless where a less one is limited; and therefore we are to take that part of the Act into view, though not the other. Indeed it seems to me even to be insisted on, 295 *that we shall construe a will of lands, as if the words to him and his heirs, wherever they are supplied by the statute, were actually in the will. But the presence or absence of such words in a will of personals, has a great effect on the construction, when enquiring into the intent, in relation to the time when the contingency is to happen; though it will not affect the quantity of the estate given.

If, however, the Acts themselves oblige us to adopt the course of construction insisted on, as it regards one branch of the system, I cannot perceive why they shall not extend to the whole. The law dispensing with words of inheritance, is no more law aforetime, than that destroying entails. Whether we are to consider that part of the Act of 1785, dispensing with words of inheritance, in connection with this will, is, therefore, the point now to be decided in the first place; because, if we are not, but are to consider this will in the same manner in this respect, as if it was made before the Act of 1785 went into operation, then the case of Goodrich v. Harding, and many other cases in England and here, (it seems to me at present,) seems sufficient to support this as a good executory devise. The point now under consideration, seems purposely to have been left open by at least two of the Judges in that case.

It seems to me at present, then, that if either the Acts themselves, or the decisions of this Court, bind us down to construe wills of lands, independent of the change in our condition wrought by those very laws, that we are bound throughout. The change in placing realty on a level with personality, as to the power of entailing, was no less important as applicable to construction and finding out intent, than the change as to words of inheritance; and indeed, to my mind, much more so; and being part of the very same law, if we are inhibited from viewing or weighing the effect of the one, we must be bound also as to the other. There is the same reason too, for breaking through the decisions in toto, as for doing so in part.

Indeed more so; for, looking at a 296 part only of the system *may even lead to greater errors, than shutting our eyes to the whole.

What is the law, and what have been our decisions on this subject? And how far are we to be bound, especially since the Act of 1819, to construe wills in this country, as they do wills in England? This, to me, is a momentous question, especially since the Legislative construction by the Act of 1819. Do the Acts themselves of 1776, and 1785, tie us down to decide as if we were sitting in Westminster Hall, judging of a will made in England?

It is said, (and the idea has met with the approbation of at least some of the Judges of this Court,) that the use of the words, as the law aforetime was, in the Act of 1785, as well as the phraseology of the Act of 1776, do so confine us. This idea, I humbly, and with great deference think, is not well founded; and that, therefore, if we have erred in this respect, we cannot impute it to the Legislature; and consequently, if an erroneous supposition that the law imposed this duty on us, has led us into this error, it becomes a matter of serious consideration what course we ought to pursue. Were we bound by law, as it is said we were and are, to adopt and pursue this course of decision?

This leads to the enquiry, how and for what purpose, these words were introduced into the Act of 1785?

Before the statute de donis, all inheritances were estates in fee simple or fee conditional. Tenant of lands entailed had before this statute a fee simple conditional subsequent; and although he had issue, he had not thereby a fee simple absolute; for, if he afterwards died without issue, the donor could enter in his reverter. 1 Inst. 13. But after issue, he could aliene, so as to bar him; and as well before as after the issue, he could aliene, so as to bar his own issue. The object of the statute de donis was to restrain this right of alienation, which operated to the disherison of the issue of the donee and to the exclusion of the donor from the reversion; both of which was contrary to the will of the donor, 297 and against the form *of the gift. In carrying this law into effect, the Courts decided that the donee should not have a fee simple conditional as aforesaid; but, they divided the estates, and created a particular estate in the donee, and a reversion in the donor, so that the donee could not, by alienation, bar his issue or the donor as aforesaid. Thus it is, that tenant in tail is said to be by virtue of this statute. The power of alienation, however, was afterwards given by statute, if made by fine and recovery.

The Act of 1776, then, did not repeal the statute de donis, but only provided that any person who now hath, or hereafter may have, an estate in fee tail general or special, &c. shall, from henceforth, &c., stand seized, possessed, &c., in full and absolute fee simple, &c. as if the conveyance had been in fee, &c. The party was not thereby thrown back on his fee conditional at common law, although the statute de donis might be said to be virtually or substantially repealed. It was permitted, as it were, to remain in force, merely for the purpose of enabling tenant in tail to hold the fee absolute and unconditional, under this Act.

The Act of 1785, ch. 62, then takes up the subject, and declares, that "every estate in lands, &c. which, on the 7th of October, 1776, was an estate in fee tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and thenceforward to continue to be, an estate in fee simple; and every estate in land, which since hath been limited, or hereafter shall be limited, so that, as the law aforesaid was, such estate would have been an estate tail, shall also be deemed to have been, and to continue an estate in fee simple; and all estates which, before the said 7th day of October, 1776, by the law if it remained unaltered, would have been estates in fee tail, and which now, by virtue of this Act, are and will be estates in fee simple, shall from that time and henceforth be discharged of the conditions annexed thereto by the common law restraining alienations before the donee shall have issue; so that the donees, or persons in whom the conditional

298 "fees vested or shall vest, had and shall have the same power over the same estates, as if they were pure and absolute fees." Then follows the clause dispensing with words of inheritance in creating a fee. It is plain to be seen by this latter part of the clause concerning estates tail, that if it had either been suggested, or there was some fear entertained, that the Act of 1776, having virtually abrogated the statute de donis, it might be supposed that the common law conditional fee was revived, and stood as before that statute; and the case of Carter v. Tyler, 1 Call, 165, is perhaps sufficient to shew that this idea is not without foundation. The words, therefore, "as the law aforesaid was," I humbly conceive, had reference to the fee tail as created by that statute, to be adjudged of as if that statute was in force. This idea is fortified by the words of this second member of the clause, which declares, that all estates which, before 1776, "by the law if it remained unaltered, would have been an estate in fee tail," &c. What law is supposed here to have been altered? Surely the statute de donis, and possibly the common law as to conditional fees. But if they both had not been virtually repealed by the Act of 1776, the Legislature, by this very Act of 1785, did expressly alter or abrogate them both by this second clause, so as to make estates which, by the law aforesaid, were either fee tail or fee conditional at the common law, absolute fees. For these reasons, then, those expressions were deemed necessary and proper, and not for the purpose of laying down rules for the interpretation of wills or deeds, or to bind the Court down, in its search after the intention, to decisions and reasons, which, by the very Act, were rendered inapplicable. There was not, and could not be, any wish in the Legislature, to create estates in fee tail, contrary to the will of testators, so as to convert them into fee simple estates. There never has been any hostility to those limitations for family purposes, which are to take effect within the reasonable time prescribed by law. On the contrary, the Act of 1819 is a complete Legislative 299 *declaration, that the course of decision which has so long done violence to the wills of testators, by applying rules of decision here, which do not exist in England, (for there, where a fee tail cannot exist, their rule is as, I contend it ought to be here,) is no part of the Legislative will, but the reverse. Why has the Legislature by that Act said, that a limitation made so and so shall be good, unless it plainly appears that such was not the intention? Was it intended thereby to vest a different estate than was intended by the testator, as is done when an estate tail is converted into a fee? Surely not. It was to restore to wills their real and intended effect; to adopt the construction that no man ought to be supposed as intending to create an estate, which cannot exist by law, unless it manifestly appears that such was the intention.

Suppose a testator should preface his will by stating that he was without counsel, and unacquainted with the technicalities of law, and of Courts; but, that he knew he could not create an estate tail, and also, that a fee would pass if he did so, and he would be thereby defeated in certain provisions which he wished to make for his children and their descendants, for family purposes, and to keep the estate in his family as long as he could, without the violation of any law; and therefore hoped that his will might be fairly construed and supported, unless it plainly appeared that he had attempted to create an estate, which the law did not authorize; and a will, such as the present, and such as this Court is in the habit of deciding on, so prefaced, was submitted to us to decide what meaning was to be put on it. Could any other be put on it, than such as the Act of Assembly of 1819 aforesaid, has prescribed? But, is not this, in fact, the appeal which every testator, since the Act of 1776 was generally known to be in force, makes to this Court?

I once heard of a Scotchman, who, having acquired a good deal of property, had occasion to leave the country; but, before doing so, made his will. Not being heard of *for a long time, probate was taken of the will, supposing him to be dead. After some fifty years, a suit, depending on the construction of the will, was argued and about to be decided. An aged stranger attended the argument and decision; after which, he arose and told the Court that whatever they might say to the contrary, when he wrote and made that will, he intended so and so; very different from what the Court had decided. Could all the testators, since the Act of 1776, thus appear before us, we would hardly believe this assembled host from the dead, in how many instances their wills had been violated. The law then has not prescribed this course of decision.

2. But how far have we bound ourselves, and what have been our decisions on this point?

As to positive decisions, there are two; Tate v. Tally, 3 Call, 354, and Smith v. Chapman, 1 Hen. & Munf. 240; the first decided in 1802, on a will made in 1777; the other, on a will made in 1790. The point was made and ably argued in both cases; Lyons, Fleming and Roane, being the Judges, with Tucker in addition, in the second.

In Tate v. Tally, Judge Roane was inclined to the opinion, that even if we construed wills of lands made since 1776, in the same manner as wills of personals, it would not have been a good limitation of personal property; but says, "he will not waste time to enquire as to that, being equally clear that it is quite immaterial whether the will was prior to 1776, or since. The Legislative construction of the Act of 1792," he says, "accords with my opinion on the subject." (I presume he means the Act of 1785, as incorporated in the Revised Code of 1792.) "It is entitled to respect, but would not bind the Court to adopt the same construction, contrary to their own judgment, in relation to prior cases." &c.

Fleming, Judge, says, that "as well on general principles, as on the case of Hill v. Burrow, this was an estate tail in Jesse Tate, prior to the Act of 1776. The question therefore, is, whether its being made subsequent to that *Act has altered the case? And I think not; for the whole effect of that statute is, to convert estates tail into estates in fee simple; and not to alter the meaning of words, or destroy the established rules of construction." Lyons thought it a clear case of an estate tail; but said nothing on the point we are now considering. Nor do I understand Judge Fleming as pretending to say, that the Legislature had tied the Courts down to construe a will of a subject which cannot be entailed, in the same way as of one which can; and this will be entirely manifest by his opinion in Smith v. Chapman, 1 Hen. & Munf. 240, in which case, also, Judge Roane shews that his opinion in this case, which is the one usually referred to on this subject, does not contain his whole opinion. In Smith v. Chapman, he says, "Nothing is gained in favor of intention, by construing the limitation to be an estate tail; for, it is eo instanti converted into a fee simple by the general law, of which the testator could not have been ignorant," &c. The Act of 1776, he says, "cuts up by the roots the pretence of implying an estate tail," &c. In Tate v. Tally, he says, "The Court concurred in opinion with the Legislature, that in construing what was or was not an estate tail, we should have reference to former laws, and that as to the construction to be made in relation to that point, we should enquire what the law aforesaid (that is, before 1776,) was," &c. "In a case, however, where the intention of a testator is alleged, under pretext of providing for his issue, but in reality to infer an estate which will defeat them, it would seem proper to rebut that allegation by resorting to a posterior general law, without an ignorance of which, it is impossible that any such intention could have existed." This part of the opinion gives me almost every thing I contend for. The absence of a power to entail lands, according to it, is a circumstance to be weighed in this Court, when you are called on to infer an estate tail; which therefore, you ought not to do, if you can fairly avoid it, as you thereby *gain nothing in favor of intention. You can only create, in order, eo instanti, to destroy it.

Judge Fleming says, "It appears strange to me, that, so much pains have been taken to prove that the devise gave, by implication, an estate tail, which is now, and at the time of making the will had long been, unknown to our laws, that it might be magically turned into an estate in fee, in order of frustrate and defeat the plain intent of the will of the testator."

Judge Lyons said, "I shall make short work of all questions arising on the construction of wills made since the Act of 1776; so far at least, as it may be necessary to decide whether they meant to pass a fee tail or not. I will not suppose, after that Act, that a man intended to convey an estate tail, (which the law has expressly abolished,) unless plain and unequivocal words are used, such as would, of themselves, create a fee tail, as a devise to A. and the heirs of his body, or to A. and if he die without issue," &c.

Judge Tucker, who also sat in this case, said nothing particularly on this point, and it is therefore presumable that he assented to the doctrines contended for; especially as in parts of his opinion he strongly enforces the duty of searching out and obeying the will of the testator, when that can be done; and as he also concurred with the other Judges on the main question.

It cannot therefore, be maintained, that so far as a decision of this naked question goes, it has at all been decided by this Court, not to take into consideration the inability to entail land as well as personality, in searching for intent. On the contrary, I consider this a full and decisive case of the question, according with my opinion on that subject.

Has this case been overruled? It may be said that it has; because, in many cases, we have recognized the British doctrines, whereby a difference is made between real and personal estate, in a search after intention. Admit this to be the case; what then is the result? Here is one 303 "course of decision which accords even with the British decisions themselves, that where a subject cannot be entailed, you are not to construe a will as you would in relation to a subject that can be entailed. This course of decision accords also with the common sense of all mankind, and is expressly recognized and made a rule of property in future, by the Legislature. Here is also another course of decision by the same Court, running counter to all this; having, as I conceive, a mistaken interpretation of the Legislative will for its basis, and concerning which all that can be said is, stare decisis. It is now a canon of property, and if departed from, great mischief will be done. Sales have been made, titles will be broken, &c. &c.; so that a man who has purchased from me, who, according to our decisions, had a fee tail, will lose the benefit of his purchase, and future dealers will not know how to contract. We must, therefore, continue to take estates from the real owners, and give them to such dealers.

As to the first class, there are few cases, (unless indeed where a plain estate tail is given, and which, under the Act of 1819, may or may not be a safe subject of sale, according to circumstances,) in which there is not considerable doubt what will be the ultimate construction; so that most purchases of this kind are known to be hazardous; and purchasers ought also to know, that our decisions, as to this leading ground of construction, have been always questioned, and decided different ways. But, is it better to persist in error for the benefit of such purchasers, or to retrace our steps? Suppose the course of decision, now indicated by the Legislature, had taken place soon after 1787; or had been considered as settled by the case of Smith v. Chapman, as it ought to have been, and persevered in since; could any one have complained? So far from it, that the Act of 1819 would have been unnecessary. As to future purchasers, they would have been as much admonished by our decision as by that Act, and would govern themselves accordingly.

304 "But, if the Legislature meant to adopt British constructions on this subject, what class of cases have they adopted; those which relate to subjects that can be entailed, and therefore may be presumed to be so intended; or those which relate to subjects that cannot be entailed, and concerning which the presumption fails? Have they adopted rules of construction drawn from cases strictly analogous, or the reverse? One is as much law aforesaid as the other. Whatever doubts may have existed, and however we may have settled this matter, the Legislature, the whole people speaking through them, have said, that the correct rule of decision is not that which had heretofore been pursued, but the reverse. It is no longer a question, which is the right, and which is the wrong rule of construction. That is decided, and has become a rule of property, by law.

The only question now remaining for us to consider, is, whether we can now throw off the wrong, and take up the right rule? If we cannot go back, cannot now re-assert and establish the doctrines laid down in Smith v. Chapman, how can we justify a partial departure from our course of decision, by looking to the Act dispensing with words of inheritance. Judge Roane, who laid down the rule, and is most likely to have known its extent, in Tidball v. Lupton, 1 Rand. 203, speaking even of the Act of descents, says, "We are not at liberty to refer to it; we are confined in our construction, both by the Acts of 1776 and 1785, and by the decisions upon them. All these have referred to the lex temporis, and adopted it," &c. If we break through the decisions, then, because it is reasonable to do so, as to this matter, do we not shake the foundation of those decisions, and must they not fall at the next touch? I think so; and therefore, if I touch the foundation at all, which I must do if I depart from them in any respect, because it is reasonable that I should do so, (as I think it is in this case,) then I am at once for saying that Smith v. Chapman, gives the law of the land on this subject. I think the necessity of departing from those 305 decisions, in "regard to the application of this part of the Act of 1785 to the case, as well as the clear Legislative enunciation of the correct rule on this question, gives an opportunity, and indeed call, for an examination of our course on this subject, and it will be our own fault if we shall hereafter be reduced to the dilemma of deciding, that a testator who made his will on the day before the Act of 1819 was enacted, using the same words with one made on that day, nevertheless intended precisely the reverse of what the latter testator did.

But, it may be said, if all this is granted, if this was personal estate, the limitation over would not be good; for, the remainder-man will take in fee, under the Act of 1785; and there is therefore, nothing to tie it down to a dying without issue living at the death of the first taker. We must, however, recollect, that now there is equally an absence of power to entail lands, as personals, and therefore, it equally conflicts with intention to infer that one was intended; and that the absence or presence of words of inheritance are equally unimportant, both in case of lands and personals, as to the quantity of estate really given, whilst their presence or absence equally tend to shew what the testator had in view, as to the time when a contingent event was to happen.

Compare this case, then, with that of Dunn v. Bray, 1 Call, 338, above mentioned. That was a devise of negroes to W. B. and his heirs forever; but, in case he should die and leave no issue, then to C. and his heirs. This was held to mean a dying without issue living at the death of the devisee. It was admitted by Judge Pendleton, that if it had been an estate tail in W. B. as was contended, the remainder would be void; since in that case, it would be to take effect on a general failure of issue. He then goes on to repel the idea of an entail, in the manner I have before shewn, and says, that Lord Talbot, in Atkinson v. Hutcheson, 3 P. Wms. 258, fully illustrates the distinction between the devise of an express estate tail 306 and one by "implication, as well as the natural meaning of the words, "dying without issue," to wit, at the time of the death.

It is true, that in the case before us, there is neither the word "leave," nor the word "then;" but, the devise over in that case was to C. and his heirs, which is wanting in this case; and here, it is to be divided among the surviving brothers, children of the last wife, excluding the children of brothers that may have died; which shews, in fact, that it was a dying without issue, living some one or more of the brothers, who would take as survivors. This view of the case will even bring it within that of Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; for, if P. Bell had left issue at his death, and brothers also surviving, they never would have taken, although that issue had become extinct before their deaths. This would also bring it within the cases of Porter v. Bradley, 3 Term Rep. 143, and Roe v. Jeffery, 7 Term Rep. 589.

What is the principle of these cases? There is, say, a devise to A. and his heirs, but if he die without heirs, then to B. the brother of A. Now here, to die without heirs does not mean without heirs generally; because B. who was to take after A. would be his general heir, if there was none nearer. The use of the word heirs, therefore, meant the same in both instances in which that word was used, to wit, heirs of the body. This, it has always been said, is a mere matter of construction; and in such a devise, has always been so construed, as will be seen by the cases cited in Pells v. Brown, and other cases. So that, in that case, it would stand as if the devise had been to A. and the heirs of his body, and in case he should die without such heirs, &c. This would make it, as it were, an express estate tail. But very different, as Lord Kenyon says, is the case of a devise to A. and his heirs, and if he die without leaving heirs of his body, then to B. and his heirs. Here is an express fee; and it is not necessary to cut it down to an estate tail, with any view to the issue, for a fee also provides for 307 them. An intention to "cut it down must, therefore, manifestly appear, as I understand the authorities, even in England; because, here is a remainder-man who is evidently an object, as well as the issue. Had the first estate been for life, then, as the issue is the primary object, the estate must be enlarged to an estate tail, or that intent would be defeated; and therefore, the remainder-man must yield to the issue, as in Tate v. Tally, 3 Call, 354. But, when the issue are provided for by the fee in the ancestor, and the remainder-man is also an object, which object must be defeated if you provide for the issue, otherwise than at first contemplated, viz: by changing the fee into an estate tail, you must have full warrant for so doing; that is to say, you must clearly see that an indefinite failure of issue was intended. If so, then, inasmuch as it now clearly appears that the intention was to provide for the issue, not by a fee in the ancestor, but as issue in tail, then the will is to be again construed, as if it had in the first instance been a devise to A. and the heirs of his body, and if he die without heirs of his body, &c.; that appearing now to be the meaning in which the word heirs was at first used.

But, if the subject of the devise be one of which an estate tail cannot be made, then it will require clear proof indeed, that it was intended to provide for the issue, as issue in tail, which they could not be; for, to give it this shape, is not done in order to give them any thing, and thereby advance the intent; they get nothing by it. The only effect is, to shew that the testator ignorantly created an estate which could not exist in law; and in consequence of which, his intentions in favor of the remainder-man are defeated. But, having done this, in such plain terms that no other construction can fairly be put on his words, the Court is forced, by the rules of law, to defeat his intention.

But a limitation over to survivors, as well as the absence or presence of words of inheritance, though otherwise of no avail, as before said, have affected the construction, in many cases.

308 *In Brewer v. Opie, 1 Call, 214, the testator gave his whole and sole estate, real and personal, to his son I. L. and in case he should die before twenty-one, or lawful heir, then his estate to be equally divided between the children of I. B. and L. O. It was held, that I. L. took a contingent fee, (though there were no express words of inheritance,) to become absolute upon either event happening; and as his dying must determine both events, the remainder was good as an executory devise.

He died without issue, and under twenty-one years.

Timberlake v. Graves, 6 Munf. 174; Gresham v. Gresham, Ib. 187, on a will dated in 1803; James v. M^cWilliams and wife, Ib. 301, and Cordle v. Cordle, Ib. 455, on a will dated in 1805, (the Reporter does not give the dates of the wills in the other cases,) are all cases of this description.

On the whole, I incline to think, that the limitation over in this case was good as an executory devise.

JUDGE CABELL concurred with JUDGES CARR and GREEN, and the judgment was affirmed.

June, 1827.

Wills—Construction—Estates Tail—Docketing.—By a will dated in 1778, the testator gave a tract of land to his two sons, to be equally divided between them, to them and their heirs forever; but in case either of his said sons should die without issue lawfully begotten, he desired that the survivor should have the whole. But if both his said sons should die without lawful issue, he desired that his land should be sold by his executors, and the money arising therefrom should be equally divided among his daughters then living, &c. This is an estate tail in the sons, which was converted into a fee simple by the Act of 1776.

This was an appeal from the Fredericksburg Chancery Court, where Fanny Turner filed her bill against Thomas Broaddus and Rebecca his wife, and a great number of *other parties, who were children of John Turner, George Turner, and Elizabeth Brock, and the heirs of Nathaniel Anderson, and William Beazley and Maria his wife.

The question arose on the will of William Watkins, dated the 25th day of September, 1778. The clause on which the controversy depends, is fully stated in the following opinion of Judge Green, as well as the relations of the parties. The question is similar in principle to that of the preceding case of Bells v. Gillespie; and the full examination in that case of the whole doctrine involved in this, will supersede the necessity of a more minute report in the present instance.

The Chancellor was of opinion, that the devise in the will of William Watkins, the elder, was good as an executory devise, and therefore the limitation over was not too remote; and he decreed accordingly. From this decree, Broaddus appealed.

Stanard, for the appellant.

Leigh, for the appellee.

JUDGE CARR.

I shall not pretend to travel over again in this case, the dull and tedious round of cases on the subject of estates tail and executory devises. That task has been performed in Bells v. Gillespie; the authorities and reasoning in which apply directly to the case at bar. I will barely remark, that this case bears a more exact resemblance than that, to the case of Carter v. Tyler. First, the land was given to the sons in fee. Secondly, if either die without issue, the survivor was to have the whole.

310 Thirdly, if both die *without issue, the land to be sold, and the money to be divided among his daughters then living, &c. In those features, the two cases do not merely resemble each other, but are precisely the same. Sydnor v. Sydnor, 2 Munf. 263, also governs this case clearly, upon the principles explained in Bells v. Gillespie.

I am of opinion that the decree be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

JUDGE GREEN.

William Watkins, by his last will and testament, devised as follows: "Item, I give to my beloved sons John and William Watkins, the land whereon I now live, containing three hundred and fifty acres, to be divided between them;" and after specifying the dividing line, the will proceeds, "the above mentioned land I give to my above named sons, to them and their heirs for ever. But, in case either of my said sons should die without issue lawfully begotten, then it is my desire the survivor should have the whole. But, if both my said sons should die without lawful issue, then it is my desire my said land be sold by my executors to the highest bidder, and the money arising therefrom be divided among my daughters then living; and if in case any of them should be dead and leave children, then in that case, it is my desire that the children of the deceased have an equal share with those living, so that each child or their children have an equal part." The testator appointed his said two sons and John Turner his executors. The will was dated September 25, 1778, and admitted to probate at September Court, 1780. The sons entered upon their respective portions of the land. John died without issue in 1797, and devised his part of the land to his brother William in fee. William afterwards died without issue, and devised the whole of the land (except about sixty acres sold by one of the brothers) to his wife Rebecca, (who, with her second husband Broaddus, 311 *are the appellants) for life, with several remainders over. The appellee is a surviving daughter of William Watkins the elder. She filed her bill in the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg, against the purchasers of the sixty acres of land, and the devisees of William Watkins, the younger, and the children of her deceased sisters claiming under the will of William Watkins the elder, and praying for a partition according to the rights of the parties. The Court held that the limitation over to the daughters and their children, was (in the events which had happened) good as an executory devise, and decreed accordingly.

It was admitted in the argument of this case, that in determining whether, upon the true construction of the will, an estate tail was vested in the sons, converted by our statute into an absolute estate in fee, the will is to receive the same construction as if the statute de donis had been in full force in Virginia, at the time of making the will, and the death of the testator; and that what would have been a remainder after an estate tail, if that statute were in force, cannot be construed into an executory devise, because the estate tail is converted into a fee simple by our statutes. Indeed, no question can possibly now be raised on those points, since the decisions of this Court in Hill v. Burrow, Tate v. Tally, Carter v. Tyler, and many others upon that point.

The limitation over to the executors, was a limitation of a fee simple estate, (Co. Litt. 9, b,) and would be defeated, if the sons took an estate tail; or, if the sons took a fee simple estate, was void as an executory devise, unless it was, by the terms of the will, necessarily to take effect, if at all, within the time allowed by law for the vesting of an executory devise. On the part of the appellee, it is contended that the sons took an estate in fee simple; that the limitation over to the executors was good as an executory devise; and that it was limited to take effect on the death of the sons, without issue then living, which was in good time. To prove this, the circumstances that the 312 *limitation over was to the executors to sell and divide the money between the daughters then living, and the children of the daughters who were dead, are relied on. The terms of the will certainly do not make it a condition, that there should be no issue of the sons living at their deaths, in order to give effect to the devise over. The sons might have died leaving issue surviving them, which might have failed in the life-time of one of the executors, or of one or more of the daughters; and in that event, it was clearly the intention of the testator, that the devise over should take effect. If it was the intention that the limitation should not take effect but upon the condition, that the issue of the sons should fail in the life-time of one of the executors or of one or more of the daughters, it might be good as an executory devise; being to take effect within a life or lives in being. But, I do not think that the will is susceptible of this construction. The testator did not intend to make the limitation over depend upon the failure of issue in the life-time of the executors, to whom it was to go in fee upon the failure of issue; for, there were but three executors, two of whom were the sons, who must have been dead before the event of the failure of their issue was determined; and the testator did not intend that the interest of his daughters should depend upon the event of the other executor's dying before or after the sons, or the failure of their issue. Nor did he intend, as a condition upon which the devise was to take effect or not, that the failure of the issue of the sons should happen in the life-time of one of his daughters. He obviously mentioned one of the daughters then surviving, with the children of those that might then be dead, for the purpose of prescribing a rule for the partition of the proceeds of the land; so that if any daughter should be then living, and others dead leaving children, the children of the deceased daughters should represent their parent, and have an equal share with the living daughters. The testator expressly declares, that this was the reason why he mentioned the living daughters and 313 "the children of any deceased daughter; "so that each child or their children have an equal part." The testator intended, that whenever the issue of his sons failed, the children of his daughters, if they were all dead, should succeed to the property, in the same proportions to which their mothers would have been entitled, if alive. It was, if the sons took a fee simple, a limitation of a fee upon a fee after an indefinite failure of the issue of the sons, and therefore void.

But, the sons had only estates tail. The ultimate limitation to the daughters in fee, upon the indefinite failure of the issue of the sons, had the effect of converting the express estate in fee simple given to them, into an estate tail, for the purpose of effecting the intent of the testator, to provide for that issue in the first place, and afterwards for his daughters and their heirs, by giving them a remainder upon the estate tail to the sons.

If, however, the ultimate limitation was to take effect, if at all, within a life or lives in being, and was therefore good as an executory devise, and had not the effect of reducing the express estate in fee simple given to the sons, to an estate tail; yet the estate, given in terms to the sons, was reduced to a fee tail, by force of the express cross-remainders in fee limited to them. In that case, the ultimate limitation, instead of an executory devise, was a contingent remainder, under the rule in Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Lev. 39, that no limitation shall be construed to be an executory devise which can take effect as a contingent remainder. After giving an estate in fee to each of the sons, the will proceeds, "But, in case either of my said sons should die without issue lawfully begotten, then it is my desire the survivor should have the whole." "The whole," refers not only to the property, but to the estate given to the son who should die without issue. The will, then, has the same effect, as if the words "heirs" or "issue" followed the word "survivor;" and to the purposes

314 of this case, it *is not necessary to enquire, whether an estate tail or in fee was given to the survivor in the land devised to the sons dying without issue. Nor is it necessary to determine upon the effect of the word "survivor," whether it gave to each son a vested remainder in the land devised to the other, the word survivor being understood as other, as has frequently been done, and which I think is the true construction; or, whether each had a contingent remainder in the land devised to the other, to take effect only in case he actually survived the brother, whose estate was to go over upon the failure of his issue. For, upon either construction, whether these remainders were vested or contingent, they had the effect of reducing the estates given in the preceding clauses to both the sons, to estates in fee tail. If the ultimate limitation to the daughters were to take effect only in case both the sons had died in the life-time of one or more of the daughters, yet there was no limitation as to the time of the failure of issue of one of the sons, which should give to the other surviving him, (if a surviving was necessary to give the other a right,) a right to the whole, and to effectuate the general intent of the testator to provide for all the issue of both sons, as long as any issue existed, and the whole to the other and his heirs or issue, if the issue of one failed. The particular intent to give to each son an estate in fee, which would frustrate the other intentions of the testator, must yield to this general intent, and the fee simple be considered as reduced to an estate tail in each of the sons. The effect of this will was to give to each of the sons an estate tail with cross-remainders between them, with remainder in fee to the daughters; and whether all these remainders were vested or contingent, is immaterial; since all of them were defeated by the statute converting the estates tail in the sons, into estates in absolute fee simple.

The decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

315 *JUDGE COALTER.

The will in this case is dated in September, 1778, and it is contended, must be construed as if made before 1776. On this point I have given my opinion in the case of Bells v. Gillespie. But, suppose this to be so; how stands this case?

It is contended, that the testator clearly intended that this land should remain entire with his sons, or one of them, and their posterity, as long as they existed, and that if ever it went over to those in remainder, it was to go as an entire estate, as one whole: that this being the case, the interest of the sons must be so arranged, as that a part is not to pass over, unless the whole can do so also; and that to effect this, they must take estates tail in possession in their respective shares, with cross-remainders in tail, remainders to the daughters. Nothing else can prevent the possibility of its going to them in parts.

I am not clear, even admitting that if the estate went over at all, it was to go entire, that the conclusion follows the premises; though, if the other postulatium is also granted, (to wit, that the entire lands were intended to remain with the sons, or one of them, and their posterity, so long as any should remain,) it might follow that such an estate tail, as is mentioned, was intended.

By the first clause, a fee simple is created, which, if cut down to a fee tail, must be in consequence of some general or primary intent, which must be defeated unless this is done. This, it is said, is made necessary by the clause, "but, if either of my said sons should die without lawful issue, then it is my desire the survivor should have the whole;" because, this is an indefinite failure of issue, and makes it an estate tail. But, if these words can be supposed to mean, that if either should die, "living the other," then as to this part, it would not go to the survivor, unless, at the time of the death, there was no issue. It would be the case of Pells v. Brown, and not be an estate tail. Why shall we say that this was not the intention? The issue, if any, of the brother so dying, is provided for by the fee to the father, who, it may well have been intended, should have the fee and sole disposition of the estate, in case he had issue at the time of his death. But, if he had no such issue, it was intended that then it should go to the survivor; not that when the issue of the one first dying should afterwards, and at any remote day, become extinct, it should then go to the survivor, if he should be alive at that time, and if not, to his issue, if any.

But, if the other proposition is true, that it was intended to go entire, it seems to me that the testator looked to, and had in his mind, the death of one leaving no issue, living the other, and who was then to take the whole; and that should he afterwards die, leaving no issue, that then the land should be sold by his executors, &c.; and although two of these were his sons, (who of course were both to be dead before such sale,) and whilst this shews some inconsistency or want of reflection, it nevertheless shews very clearly to my mind, that the testator was not thinking of events which might happen one hundred years after, but of what was to happen on the death of the surviving son. The natural meaning, and grammatical construction, too, of the words, is, a dying without issue at the time of the death; and therefore it is wonderful to me, that these substantial beacons and landmarks, (to say nothing of the consideration that estates tail cannot be created, and ought not therefore to be inferred, unless that is unavoidable,) should not be looked to, instead of supposing things that the testator evidently never thought of. What was his plain intention? To give his lands to his sons in fee simple. But, then one or both might die without issue at his death. If he had issue, the testator had nothing more to say; he might give it as he pleased, or it might descend to them, or he might sell it, provided that when he died he left issue; he is satisfied that he will take care of his own issue. But, if he have no issue at his death, then he wished it to go to his surviving brother in fee, provided he left issue at his death.

317 *But, he might also die without leaving issue, the whole having accumulated on him; and if so, then it is to be sold and divided among his daughters. If, however, it has not so accumulated; if his son who died first should leave issue, (and so the estate has, as to his part, become a fee in him,) and then his other son dies without issue at his death, the fee in him is determined, and must go to his testator's right heirs. Possibly, they may be the issue of the son who died first, or his daughters. The testator did not, and could not, intend to provide for this case, and was willing to let the law provide. But, if his sons successively die without issue at their death, he then knew precisely what was his wish, to wit, that the whole estate should enure to his daughters, and be sold, &c.

The case of Carter v. Tyler, was an entirely different one from this. There, the estates to the first takers were to them and the heirs of their bodies; and if they die without heirs of their bodies, &c.; so that there was no implication about it. It was a direct and express fee tail. The only question was, whether the Act of 1776 destroyed the remainder limited on this estate tail, the events having happened, on which that remainder could take effect in possession, if not destroyed.

Had this been a case of express estates tail to the first takers, and even to terminate on the death of the first taker, if he had no issue then alive, it would, I presume, be equally within the Act, as it will be if the fee is cut down to an estate tail. But, in that case, there would be no implication about it, no estate in fee to cut down; and there would be no necessity for so often reminding us, (of which perhaps I am too forgetful,) that we must construe this will, just as we would in England. But, I think that in England, the Courts would not interfere with this fee simple estate for the purpose of defeating a plain intention in favor of daughters, on the happening of events clearly within the view of the testator, and which have actually happened within a life then in being. If the King's Bench, with Lord Kenyon at its head, 318 would not do so, *(as it seems to me they would not,) I think I may be excused for not doing so here.

Fearne, after noticing the case of Pells v. Brown, says, "But, here we are to attend to the distinction between the first limitation being in fee, and its being only in tail. In the first case, the limitation over on a dying without issue, living A., was good as an executory devise; for, the whole fee being first limited to a person in esse, there was no considering the subsequent limitation as a remainder;" that is, as I understand, you must be satisfied that an indefinite failure of issue was intended; that it was intended to provide for them as issue in tail, instead of children of an ancestor having a fee, before you can change the nature of that express fee that is created. But he says, if the first limitation had been in tail only, then the subsequent devise might have been considered as a contingent remainder depending on that estate tail, and as limited to take effect only in case that estate tail determined in the life of A.; that is, in case the first devisee in tail died, without issue, in A's lifetime.

So, in Porter v. Bradley and Roe v. Jeffery, when the first estate is in fee, it is said, the question is whether, from the whole context of the will, we can collect, that when an estate is given to A. and his heirs, but if he die without issue, then over, the testator meant "without issue living at the death" of the first taker. The rule was settled in Pells v. Brown, and has never since been questioned.

If Lord Kenyon was hard to convince that it was right, even in England, to construe the same words as to realty, different from what they ought to be construed as to personality, though one could be entailed, and the other not, I think he would have been harder to convince had he been sitting here, where neither can be entailed.

I am, therefore, for affirming the decree.

JUDGE CABELL concurred with the two first Judges, and the decree was reversed and the bill dismissed.

319 *Robertson and Others v. Archer, Adm'or, &c.

June, 1827.

Practice—Reliance on Executor's Account—Effect.*—

The rule that where a party relies on an account furnished by the other party, and claims the benefit of credits, he is bound to take it all together and admit the debits also, unless he can surcharge and falsify it by proofs, is not applicable to an executor's account, nor to any case where there is a trust or confidence.

Executor—Suits against Legatees for Advances—Lapse of Time—Effect.*— A suit by an executor against the legatees for advances made to the estate beyond the assets, will not be entertained after a great length of time has elapsed since the qualification of the executor, and the estate has been distributed with the consent of the executor.

William S. Archer, administrator of John Archer of Amelia, deceased, filed his bill in the Chancery Court of Richmond, against James Robertson and others, children and legatees of John Archer of Chesterfield, deceased, and the descendants of such of the children of the said John Archer as were dead. The bill was filed on the 30th day of October, 1816; and set forth, that John Archer of Amelia, deceased, was appointed by John Archer of Chesterfield his executor: that the former undertook the execution of the will, and made sundry payments and advances, by which the estate became considerably indebted to him: that the legatees possessed themselves of all the estate and effects of the said John Archer of Chesterfield, without the assent of the executor, and without having executed refunding bonds to him: that the executorial accounts were referred, by agreement between the parties, to an accountant, who found a considerable balance to be due to John Archer of Amelia, the intestate of the complainant; but, as this account was taken without judicial authority, the complainant had no power to establish it: that several suits are pending against the estate, by which large sums will probably be recovered against the complainant. He therefore prays for an account of the administration of John Archer of Amelia, deceased, upon the estate of John Archer of Chesterfield, deceased: that he may recover what is due to him from that estate; and that he be made safe against the claims now hanging over him.

320 *The answer of John Archer, one of the defendants, denies that the legatees took possession of the estate of their testator without the assent of John Archer, the executor, and asserts that the estate was divided by a decree of the County Court of Chesterfield; which decree also directed a settlement of the executor's account of administration; but, that he neglected to do so, from the date of the decree in November, 1802, to the day of his death: that the defendant never did consent that the accounts should be settled by the person stated in the bill, or that he had any notice of the proceedings in that settlement, till he was informed of the account long after it was stated: that the account so stated was entirely ex parte, as respects him; and that the executor repeatedly neglected and refused to come to a settlement, &c.

The answers of the other defendants are to the same effect.

The accounts were referred to a commissioner, to state and settle the same, and the plaintiff was directed to render an account of his intestate's administration of the estate of John Archer of Chesterfield.

The commissioner reported a balance due to the complainant of $3061 13.

The defendants excepted to the account stated by the commissioner, inasmuch as it dispensed with vouchers to establish the items of debit in the said account. The grounds of this exception are fully stated in the opinion which follows.

The Chancellor confirmed the report of the commissioner, and decreed that the defendants should pay their proportions of the sum reported to be due.

The defendants appealed.

Leigh and Stanard, for the appellants, contended, 1. That the commissioner was wrong in allowing the charges in the administration account, without any evidence to support them. They admitted the 321 general rule, "that if the defendants rely upon the credits of the account, they ought to admit the debits. But, all the authorities which lay down this rule, relate only to the simple case of debtor and creditor; not to the case of executors or trustees. 1 Phill. Evid. 84; Wagner v. Gray, 2 Hen. & Munf. 603; Jones v. Jones, 4 Hen. & Munf. 447; Freeland's adm'r v. Cocke's ex'or, 3 Munf. 352. The case of Cavendish v. Fleming, 3 Munf. 198, does not contradict this principle. An executor differs from a man acting for himself, because he is bound by law to keep the account on both sides. 1 Rev. Code, 379, 380. The persons interested are often infants, who are unable to produce evidence against the executor. The case of an executor and of one acting sui juris are materially different. It is the duty of an executor to shew, not only that money has been paid, but that it is paid properly. This latter cannot be shewn by the account alone. There is no inventory in this case, which is positively required by law, and by which the persons interested might know what property came to his hands.

2. The Court of Chancery ought not to have sustained this bill, because of the long delay, and implied admissions of John Archer of Amelia. Bolling v. Bolling, 5 Munf. 334; Hercy v. Dinwoody, 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 257. In Jones v. Fitzgerald, 1 Munf. 150, a neglect of seven years was sufficient to exclude interest. Here interest is charged for a much longer time.

The rule of evidence which requires an account to be taken altogether, if a part is relied on, is a rule of universal operation, and is founded on that well known principle of justice, that you are not to take a garbled statement of the evidence. The reason applies to an executor, as well as any one else. A merchant who keeps the account on both sides, if his credits are relied on, is entitled to consider 322 *his debits as admitted. An inventory would be of no importance in this case, because it is only of the original estate which came to the executor's hands, not of the increase or profits. An executor is chosen by the testator himself, and renders his account upon oath. Cavendish v. Fleming, 3 Munf. 198, and M'Call v. Peachy, 3 Munf. 298, prove, that an executor is not chargeable with credits, unless it is proved that they were received. This principle is not contradicted by the case of Beckwith v. Butler, 1 Wash. 224. Freeland v. Cocke, 3 Munf. 352, is strongly analogous to this case.

June 12. JUDGE COALTER delivered the opinion of the Court.*

This is a suit by the appellee, as administrator of John Archer of Amelia, who was executor of John Archer of Chesterfield, against the appellants, charging that his intestate was largely in advance to the estate, and that suits were brought against him in his life-time, and which were still pending against the appellee as his representative, to recover large sums as due from the estate; that the appellants are legatees of the said John Archer of Chesterfield, and had illegally and without the consent of the executor, possessed themselves of the whole of the assets, without giving refunding bonds according to law, &c. The object of the bill is, to have a decree against the appellants for the monies so advanced by the executor beyond what he had received, and to have refunding bonds, in case future debts should be established.

It appears from the answers and documents in the cause, that about twelve years after the executor had qualified and undertaken his trust, the appellant Robertson and his wife, in right of his wife, exhibited their bill in Chesterfield County Court, against the executor for a settlement 323 *of the executorial account, and for their one-fifth part of the slaves and other personal property, after specific legacies, and which they claimed under the will. To this bill, no answer could ever be obtained, though various conditional decrees were made. Finally, another of the daughters married, and she with her husband, and also the other appellants (then under age,) were made parties plaintiffs; and in 1802, about 18 years after qualification of the executor, a decree is entered by consent appointing commissioners to allot to the plaintiffs severally their one-fifth part as aforesaid; and Duncan Rose was appointed to state and settle the executorial account. He states that he gave notice to the executor to attend him, but he did not do so; nor did he make any reply on the subject.

In 1804, the commissioners report that they had made allotment, which is confirmed, and the executor directed to deliver over the property so allotted, on the parties, or some one for them, giving bond to indemnify him against debts thereafter coming against the estate. This bond, the appellants, in their answer, say, was never demanded of them. The suit still went on; and different sets of commissioners were appointed to settle the executorial account, some of whom, it appears, gave notice to the executor to appear with his accounts and vouchers; but this he never did. The last of those orders is made in July, 1810, about twenty-six years after the qualification of the executor; but, from that time until his death, (which happened about the year 1811, or 1812,) no account was rendered. This suit was instituted and the bill filed in 1816, to which the answers were filed in 1817; and in 1819, (about 35 years after the qualification of the executor,) the accounts are referred to a commissioner. He reports, that the appellee produced the books of his intestate, containing his administration accounts, acknowledged to be in his own hand-writing; but, not having vouchers for all the debts, he insisted that those accounts were either to be taken as correct throughout, or that he had a 324 right to throw off from *the credits, a sum equal to the debits which were not vouched for; or, he proposed to the appellants, that the commissioner should make out his account of debits from the vouchers, and allow all credits which the appellants could establish by evidence. The appellant John Archer, however, who attended the settlement, stated that from the lapse of time, he could not establish credits, so as to change the accounts in their favour, from what they appeared on the books; and the commissioner, therefore, proceeded to state the accounts from those books, merely correcting some errors apparent upon their face, and reported a balance of principal and interest as due to the executor, of $3061 13.

The appellants excepted to this report in toto, alleging that the principle so established by the commissioner, was illegal as applicable to administration accounts.

Two questions present themselves; the first, arising on the report of the commissioner, and the exception thereto; the second, whether, after such a lapse of time, and under all the circumstances aforesaid, it was competent for the appellee to call for a settlement of the executorial accounts, so as to charge the appellants for advances made by the executor, beyond assets received; or for any other purpose, except to have refunding bonds executed, as directed by the decree of the County Court, so as to place the estate, as to the debts now claimed from it, in the same situation, as it would have stood, had such bonds been originally given?

We are of opinion, as to the first point, that the rule, that where a party relies on an account furnished by the other party, and claims the benefit of the credits, he is bound to take it altogether and admit the debits also, unless he can surcharge and falsify it by proofs, is not applicable to an account furnished by an executor. Where there is no trust or confidence, neither party is bound by any legal obligation to furnish the other with charges against himself, since each can and ought to preserve the evidences of his charges against the other; and the account rendered 325 by *either must be taken as the confession of the party, and as such, on the general principles of evidence, must not be garbled, but taken altogether, except so far as it may be disproved. But as to executors, they are under a moral and equitable, and indeed a legal obligation, from the very nature of their undertakings, to furnish those to whom they are accountable, the means of charging them to the full extent of their liabilities; White v. Lady Lincoln, 8 Ves. 363; for, those having a right to claim an account have no other perfect means of getting this information.

The decree is, therefore, erroneous in not sustaining the exception to the commissioner's report, in this particular.

As to the second question, we are of opinion, that after so great a lapse of time, and particularly in a case accompanied with the other circumstances above stated, it might be of mischievous tendency to sustain a suit like the present, except for the purpose of procuring refunding bonds against legatees, who had so long ago received their share of the estate, and consequently had no right to suppose that they were in debt to the estate; unless indeed, it was the wish of such legatees to have an account taken.

But, if we are further of opinion, that as the appellants did not revive or renew their suit, but permitted the matter to rest for four or five years after the death of the executor, the most certain way of obtaining justice in this case is, to consider all matters between the executor and the legatees, so far as relates to actual receipts and disbursements by the executor, up to the time of his death, as finally closed: that the appellants ought, respectively, to have been decreed to execute bonds with good security to the appellee, to indemnify the estate of his intestate against all future demands coming against the estate of the testator John Archer, so far as the value of the estate respectively received by them; so as to place the parties in the situation they would have been in, had such bond been given when the property was received; and that the bill, for every other purpose, be dismissed; and that each party pay their own costs in the said Court of Chancery.

Suits by Corporations—Proof of Incorporation.—In a suit by or against a corporation, at common law, while it was not necessary to aver in the declaration that the plaintiff or defendant was a corporation. It was necessary to prove that fact whenever that fact was put in issue by proper plea, and it was held that the general issue put such fact in issue. To this effect, the principal case is cited in Jackson v. Bank of Marietta, 9 Leigh 245; Gillet v. American Stove, etc. Co., 29 Gratt. 568; Hart v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 347, 350; Anderson v. Kanawha Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 537; Central Land Co. v. Calhoun, 16 W. Va. 375; Greenbrier Lumber Co. v. Ward, 30 W.

may be put in issue by the defendant, or raised upon the trial of the general issue.

Negotiable Paper—Blank Indorsement.—A blank endorsement of a note is sufficient to vest a title in the holder, though it be not filled up before the judgment.

Judgment by Default—Entry of—Writing for Payment of Money.—A judgment by default, for want of appearance, founded on an instrument of writing for the payment of money, on which an endorsement of a credit is made by the plaintiff himself, ought to be entered subject to such credit; or, if the plaintiff refuses to take the judgment in that way, a writ of enquiry should be awarded.

Clerical Error.—What shall be deemed a clerical error?

The President and Directors of the Conococheague Bank, assignees of Jesse Payne, who was assignee of Henry Payne, brought an action of debt in the county court of Berkeley, against David Rees, on a promissory note, executed by the latter to the said Henry Payne, negotiable and payable at the Conococheague Bank. The note was for $1899. It was endorsed in blank by Henry Payne, and afterwards, in the same manner, by Jesse Payne; and protested for non-payment. On the back of the protest there is this endorsement: "$550 has been received, at sundry times, on account of the within note. July 19th, 1819."

The defendant having failed to appear, judgment by default was rendered against him and his appearance bail, for $1899 with interest thereon from the 4th day of March, 1819, until paid, and the costs, &c. An execution issued, and a forthcoming bond was taken. On the back of the execution, this endorsement was made by the plaintiff's attorney: "The plaintiff will receive, in part of this execution, the check of Joseph Sexton upon the Conococheague Bank."

(Signed) "P. C. Pendleton."

Judgment was rendered on the forthcoming bond for $2,039 47, with interest from the 29th of November, 1819, till paid, and the costs.

327 *A supersedeas was awarded by the Superior Court of Berkeley to the judgment below, which was affirmed.

Negotiable Paper—Indorsement—Note for Payment of Money.—Before the statute was changed to its present form, a negotiable note was not, as to the endorser, a writing for the payment of money, although so as to the drawer, because the undertaking of the indorser is not for the payment of money absolutely, but it is a collateral contract to pay it under certain circumstances. Commercial Union Ass'n Co. v. Everhart, 88 Va. 956, 14 S. E. Rep. 836.

Same—Credit on—Judgment by Default—Writ of Inquiry.—Where a judgment by default for want of appearance is founded on an instrument of writing for payment of money, on which an indorsement of a credit is made by the plaintiff himself, the judgment should be entered subject to such credit; or, if the plaintiff refuses that, a writ of inquiry should be awarded. Elb v. Pindall, 5 Leigh 117, 118, citing principal case. To the same effect, see principal case cited in James River, etc., Co. v. Lee, 16 Gratt. 428.

See the principal case also cited in Brewis v. Lawson, 76 Va. 44; Brummel v. Enders, 18 Gratt. 899.

Inquiry of Damages.—An order of inquiry of damages, where it is necessary, is confined to cases where the defendant has not appeared and pleaded. Where an issue is made by the pleadings, and it is tried by a jury, then the jury, at the same time that they try the issue, assess the damages, so that in such case no writ of inquiry is necessary. This is the usual and immemorial practice. George Campbell Co. v. Angus, 91 Va. 443, 22 S. E. Rep. 107, citing principal case as authority.

From this judgment the defendant appealed.

Stanard, for the appellant, made three objections to the judgment of the Court below:

1. That "President and Directors" is not a sufficient description of the plaintiffs, if they sue in their natural or personal character; and no right for them to sue in a corporate character, is shewn, or can be intended.

2. That the endorsement being and continuing in blank, no right is shewn to be in the plaintiffs to demand the contents of the note. 12 Mod. 244; Clark v. Pigot, 1 Salk. 126; Lambert v. Pack, Ib. 128; Lucas v. Haynes, Ib. 130; Bull. N. P. 275.

3. That the original judgment should have been for no more than the residue of the amount of the note, after deducting the credit endorsed, and that all the proceedings subsequent to the original judgment are erroneous by reason of the errors imputable to it. Bates v. Johnson, (not reported.)

Johnson, for the appellee.

The objection to the description of the plaintiffs is not sound. It does not appear, that they sue as a corporation; for, the name by which they sue may be the name of an individual, as far as can be discovered from the pleadings. But, if it be the name of a corporation, it is not necessary to state in the declaration how they got that name. The defendant should put that matter in issue. Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. 465; Dutch East India Company v. Henriquez, 1 Stra. 612. After judgment by default, it is too late to make those objections.

As to the blank endorsements, they give a right to the holder to fill them up and bring suit; because an assignment need not be in writing, and the bringing 328 the suit *and producing the note is complete evidence of the assignment, and of the assent of the holder to consider it as such. Ritchie & Wales v. Moore, 5 Munf. 388.

The credit which is contended for, is not endorsed on the note. It is not signed by any body. It was open to controversy, and therefore, the Clerk could not take notice of it; and the County Court, if any, was the proper tribunal to have corrected it, not the Appellate Court. Richards, qui tam v. Brown, Doug. 114; Short v. Coffin, 5 Burr. 2730; Green v. Bennett, 1 Term Rep. 782; Bent v. Patton, 1 Rand. 25; Humphreys v. West, 3 Rand. 516.

This case comes up by supersedeas to a judgment by default for want of appearance, which was made final in the office without the execution of a writ of enquiry. The suit was in the name of the President and Directors of the Conococheague Bank, assignees of Jesse Payne, who was assignee of H. Payne, upon a promissory note dated at Williamsport, payable and negotiable at the Conococheague Bank. The declaration alleges, that it was made and assigned in succession by J. Payne and H. Payne at the Conococheague Bank, with a scilicet laying the venue in Berkeley county, where the action was brought. The judgment was entered against the defendant Rees (the drawer of the note) and the bail for his appearance.

Several objections were made in the argument of the cause to this judgment. First, that there is no averment in the declaration, that the Conococheague Bank is a corporation duly constituted, or that "the President and Directors of the Conococheague Bank" are authorized by law to sue in that name. Secondly, that the endorsements being in blank and not yet filled up, vested no title in the 329 *plaintiffs. And thirdly, that the judgment was given without regard to a credit endorsed upon the protest filed with the note.

As to the two first objections, I do not think they are well founded. A blank endorsement does not per se transfer a title, but is an authority to the holder, either to hold it as the agent of the endorser, or to claim it as his own by assignment, at his election, without any further act to be done by the assignor. The blank endorsement is conclusive proof of the assent of the endorser to transfer the note to the holder, if he elects to take it as a transfer. The assent and election of the holder to treat the endorsement as a transfer, is proved as well by suing upon it in his own name, as by writing over it an assignment to himself; and it is the assent of both parties to the transfer, which perfects it, and not the form in which that assent is evidenced. The possibility that the note might be withdrawn and again put in circulation, has no influence upon the question. The defendant could not thereby be injured; for, even if it were commercial paper, being past due, the new holder would take it subject to all objections.

It was decided in the Case of the Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. 465, that a foreign corporation may sue in our Courts upon a contract with them, valid according to the laws of the country in which the contract was made; unless it was contrary to the policy of our laws; and that the making a note in Virginia to be negotiated at a foreign bank is not liable to this objection.

Whether the Bank of Conococheague is an incorporated bank or not, or whether they have a legal right to sue in the name of the "President and Directors" only, are questions which might have been put in issue by the defendant, or raised upon the trial of the general issue. No averments as to those subjects were necessary in the declaration. In order to maintain their action, it would have been necessary to prove, if the defendant had appeared and 330 pleaded, that they were incorporated, and legally empowered to *make the contract under which they claim, and to sue in the manner in which this suit is brought. If they failed to shew that they were incorporated, their action could not be maintained. For, it is contrary to the act of 1805, re-enacted in 1819, Rev. Code, ch. 207, sec. 2, to circulate any note payable to bearer or any other person, emitted by any banking company not having a charter, whether that company exists in Virginia or elsewhere. If such an unchartered company existing in a foreign country could, by the laws of the country, contract and sue in the names of their agents, it would be contrary to the policy of our laws for our citizens to procure their notes, to be there discounted; since it would tend to violate the law, by encouraging the circulation of their notes here. That private corporations may sue, without alleging their charter of incorporation, although the Courts cannot ex officio take notice whether they are or are not incorporated; and that the question whether they are a legal corporation or not, and have a right to sue in the name used;—are proper to be put in issue by the defendant's plea, or enquired into upon the general issue, appears from the Case of The Mayor and Burgesses of Lynn Regis, 10 Co. Rep. 120; in which the declaration did not aver the existence of the corporation, but upon the trial of the general issue, their charter was produced, and the only question in the cause thereupon arose, whether the bond and the suit brought upon it were in the proper legal name of the corporation.

The third objection is, I think, well taken. A final judgment, when no plea is filed, may be rendered in the office at rules, for principal and interest, when the action is founded upon any instrument in writing for the payment of an ascertained sum of money. But, if the plaintiff, by any paper filed by himself, shews that the defendant is entitled to a credit, the judgment ought either to be entered subject to such credit, or if the plaintiff refuses to take a judgment in that way, a writ of enquiry should be awarded. In this case,

331 *to the credit endorsed on the protest filed with the note, it was sufficient prima facie evidence to prevent a judgment from being given for the whole sum, without a writ of enquiry.

It is objected, that this error cannot be taken advantage of here, because being a clerical error, it might and ought to have been corrected on motion in the Court below. If this be so, the plaintiff as well as the defendant had a right to have it corrected, and it was as much his fault as that of the defendant, that it was not; and not being corrected, the judgment is erroneous. Indeed, the plaintiff might have cured the error by releasing the amount of the credit endorsed upon the protest, if he admitted it to be a credit. But he obviously contests this, by his endorsement on the execution that Mr. Sexton's check would be received in part payment to the amount of $548 25, the amount of the credit on the protest, deducting $1 75, which was the cost of the protest; which they intended to secure in this way, as it was not embraced in the judgment.

The judgment should be reversed, and the proceedings since the common order set aside, and the cause remanded, with directions to send it to the rules, to be there further proceeded in, and a writ of enquiry awarded.

The other Judges concurred, and judgment was entered accordingly.

June, 1837.

Injunctions—Dissolution—Filing of Answer.—Where an injunction is awarded until the answer comes in, the injunction is not dissolved by the coming in of the answer, but is a subsisting injunction until it is dissolved by the subsequent order of the Chancellor.

Same—Same—Revival by Appeal.—A dissolved injunction is revived by an appeal taken by the plaintiff in the Court of Chancery; and it is improper in the appellee to take out an execution, so long as the appeal is depending.

Contempt—Jurisdiction.—Quere, whether the party offending should be punished by the Court of Appeals, or the Court of Chancery?

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg.

Turner and others filed a bill against Scott and others, to restrain the defendants from proceeding on two judgments at law obtained by one of the defendants. The Chancellor awarded the injunction until the answer comes in. Afterwards, the answer was filed; and the Chancellor, on motion, dissolved the injunction, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The defendants issued an execution on the judgments which had been enjoined, under the idea that the injunction had ceased to operate by the very terms of the order itself.

Johnson, for the appellants, moved the Court for an attachment against the appellees, for proceeding to take out an execution under these circumstances; and contending that it was not regular to grant an injunction till the answer comes in; and that the Court of Chancery must, in all cases, make an order before an injunction can be dissolved.

June 13. The Court pronounced the following opinion:§

The Court is of opinion, that the injunction was not dissolved by the coming in of the answer, but was a subsisting 333 *injunction until it was dissolved by the subsequent order of the Chancellor: that the injunction was revived by the appeal allowed by this Court; and that it was improper in the appellees to proceed to execute the judgment at law, so long as the appeal is still depending in this Court, &c.; and that the appellee, John Scott, having reasonable notice of this order, do shew cause on, &c., why an attachment should not be awarded against him for his contempt in issuing, or causing to be issued, an execution on the judgment enjoined, after notice of this appeal and serv-

Accommodation Paper—Sale of—Usury.—A note is made and endorsed for the accommodation of the payee, and afterwards put into the hands of a broker by the payee, to be sold in the market. It is purchased of the broker by a third person, who has no knowledge that it is accommodation paper, or for whose benefit it is sold. This transaction is not usurious. The principle of the Case of Taylor & Co. v. Bruce, Gilm. 42, confirmed.

[Accommodation Paper—Sale of—Usury.—In Brummel v. Enders, 18 Gratt. 394, it is said, "The case of Whitworth v. Adams, 5 Rand. 333, must be considered as settling the law of Virginia on the subject of usury in the purchase and sale of negotiable paper. It was the decision of a majority of a full court, after a most thorough discussion and examination of the subject by each of the judges. Though contrary to decisions in many, if not most of the states, it was in accordance with the decision of two judges in a court of three in Taylor v. Bruce, Gilm. 42, and for more than forty years it has been acquiesced in by the legislature, and been regarded by the courts and the community as establishing the law. I shall not, therefore, enter into any discussion of the principles involved in that case. Indeed, the authority of that case has not been questioned in the argument." Again, in Danville v. Southerlin, 20 Gratt. 579, it is said, "There is no doubt, whatever, that the owner of a note has the right to sell it for the most he can get; as he would have the right to sell any goods or wares he owned. But, on the other hand, it is quite as certain that no one has a right to make his own note and sell that for what he can get; for this, while in appearance the sale of a note, is, in fact, the giving a note for money. It is a lending and a borrowing, and nothing else. It is said in Whitworth v. Adams, 5 Rand. 333: 'If A, wishing to raise money, were to make his note payable to B, and then go to B and offer to sell it to him; and B, supposing that a man might lawfully sell his own note, were to give the money for it, verily believing he was purchasing a note, and not lending his money on the security of a note this would unquestionably be a loan; on the ground that he had intentionally done that which the law makes a loan. And this intention would, if the note were taken at a high discount, be a corrupt intent sufficient to vacate and contract.' This principle of law is in conformity with leading adjudicated cases, and is recognized universally by the elementary writers. Parson's Mercantile Law 266; Brummel v. Enders, 18 Gratt. 373; Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 17 Gratt. 43." And in Gordon v. Dooley, 10 Fed. Cas. 785, the court citing as its authority the principal case, Hansbrough v. Baylor, 2 Munf. 34, and Taylor v. Bruce, Gilm. 42, lays down the rule that a man may purchase bonds or negotiable paper in the market at any discount whether they were manufactured for sale or not, and not be guilty of usury. Furthermore, in Moseley v. Brown, 76 Va. 481, on the authority of the principal case, it was held that where the maker of notes endorsed them in blank and put them in the hands of a broker for sale on the maker's account, and the notes are purchased by one who is ignorant of the purpose for which they are made, at a greater discount than legal interest, the transaction is not usurious. To the same effect the principal case is cited with approval in Bank v. Cowan, 8 Leigh 22; Hoghead v. Baylor, 16 Gratt. 105; Brummel v. Enders, 18 Gratt. 388, 395, 405, 406, 407; Gimmi v. Cullen, 20 Gratt. 447, 456; Bank of Radford v. Kirby, 100 Va. 504, 42 S. E. Rep. 305, and distinguished in Bailey v. Hill, 77 Va. 497. See further, monographic note on "Bills, Notes and Checks" appended to Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 622; monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 698.

Same—Must Be Negotiated to Bona Fide Holder.—It is agreed on all hands that an accommodation note is not available as a security for money, until it is issued or negotiated to some real holder for valuable consideration. May v. Boisseau, 8 Leigh 193, citing principal case as its authority. To the same usurious consideration as between endorser and endorsee, will not vitiate the note in the hands of a subsequent bona fide holder without notice of such usury.

Same.—Endorsement—Usury.—A note, valid in its inception, is afterwards endorsed by a party to whom it has regularly come, to a third person, at a greater discount than legal interest; such transaction is usurious.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for the town of Petersburg.

Robert C. Adams, endorsee of Wilson & Orr, brought an action of debt against Whitworth & Yancey, on a promissory note, negotiable, &c., executed by the defendants to Wilson & Orr, purporting to be for value received, and endorsed by them to the plaintiff.

334 *The defendants pleaded Nil Debet, and several pleas of usury; and the plaintiff replied generally, on which issue was joined.

On the trial, the jury found a special verdict, the substance of which is fully stated in the following opinions.

The defendants filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the Court, stating, that on the trial of the issue, joined on the plea of the statute of usury, the defendants offered the evidence of George N. Belches, a broker in Petersburg, who proved that he sold to a citizen of Petersburg the note in the declaration mentioned, for John Wilson, at the rate of three per cent. per month, for money belonging to the said citizen of Petersburg, without any questions being put, or information given him by the said broker. Whereupon, the defendants, by their counsel, put the following question to the said Belches: Was the citizen, to whom you sold and delivered the said note, in the habit of purchasing and advancing money for such notes, at such a discount of 3½ per cent.? To which question, the plaintiff's counsel objected, and moved the Court to exclude it, as tending to draw unlawful information from the witness, in relation to a person who was named to the jury, but was not a party to this suit, and whose general conduct could not be the subject of this investigation. The Court sanctioned the objection, and the question was not permitted to be put; to which opinion, the defendant excepted.

A motion was also made by the defendants, to instruct the jury, that a broker who sells the negotiable note of any person, endorsed by the payee or payees, is the agent of the purchaser of such note, as well as of the payee or payees who sell it. This instruction was refused by the Court; to which opinion, the defendants excepted.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff on the special verdict, and the defendants appealed.

The case was submitted without argument.

JUDGE CARR.

This is an action of assumpsit, by the effect, the principal case is cited in Bank of the United States v. Jackson, 9 Leigh 236; Douglass v. Scott, 8 Leigh 44; May v. Boisseau, 8 Leigh 205; Brummel v. Enders, 18 Gratt. 887, 888.

holder of a negotiable note against the maker. It was a note made for the accommodation of the payees, who endorsed it in blank, and gave it to a broker to raise money on. He sold it to Johnson at a discount of 3 per cent. a month. The statute of usury has been pleaded in various forms, and a special verdict found, which will be considered hereafter.

It has been a good deal the fashion of late, to decry the policy and justice of our laws, regulating the rate of interest. These considerations, I know, do not belong to us. It is our duty to give to every law an honest and manly support, whatever may be our opinion of its wisdom. It may be permitted to observe, however, that if the experience of ages, and the general opinion of mankind, deserve weight in legislation, their voice is in favor of usury laws. They have prevailed in all civilized countries, and in all time. Their object too is a humane one. In Brown v. Morris, Cowp. Rep. 792, Lord Mansfield says, "These statutes were made to protect needy and necessitous persons from the oppression of usurers and moneyed men, who are eager to take advantage of the distress of others; while they, on the other hand, from the pressure of their distress, are ready to come to any terms; and with their eyes open, not only break the law, but complete their ruin." In Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 736, the same Judge says, "The statute of usury was made to protect those who act with their eyes open;—to protect them against themselves. Upon this principle, it makes it penal for a man to take more than the fixed rate of interest; it being well known, that the borrower, in distress, would agree to any terms."

336 *The early statutes against usury attempted to put it down, by legislating in detail against the various forms, which it from time to time assumed; and it is curious to trace the progress of the contest between the law, constantly attacking, and the usurer, ever ready with some new device to elude and baffle the pursuit. Sometimes a colourable risque was added to the loan, or it was disguised under the form of a post obit or bottomry bond; sometimes, what was called dry exchange. The borrower drew a bill on a fictitious person, supposed to reside abroad. The bill was never sent abroad, but protested for non-payment, and the borrower charged with exchange, re-exchange, and other expenses beyond legal interest. Sometimes stock was lent, or money in the funds, to be returned by the borrower at a future day, till which time he is charged with interest for more than the market price of the stock. Sometimes, by advancing money on a pretended partnership; by which means the lender gets exorbitant interest, under the pretext of partnership profits. Sometimes, by giving the loan the shape of the purchase of a life-annuity. Sometimes, by obtaining a beneficial lease, in consideration of a loan of money. Sometimes, by discounting notes and bills of exchange, under the cloak of a purchase and sale. These are a few of the thousand devices resorted to, for evasion of the usury laws. The Legislature, in their later statutes, giving up the vain pursuit of usury in its particular forms, and striking at the root of the evil, have forbidden the taking exorbitant interest directly or indirectly; thus throwing upon the ministers of the law, the duty of detecting and defeating every attempted evasion of it. Well may these ministers exclaim, quo teneam vultus mutantem Protea nodo? Yet are they bound to pursue this Proteus through all his changing forms; and the law has given them ample powers.

In Barton's Case, 5 Co. Rep. 70, it is said, "If in truth, the contract be usurious, against the statute, no colours nor shews of words will serve, but the party 337 may shew it, and *shall not be concluded or estopped by any deed or any other matter whatsoever, for the statute gives averment in such case."

In Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 112, Lord Mansfield says, "The statute of 12th Anne, prohibits any body from taking, any how, on the loan of money, above 5 per cent. (6 with us) for forbearance of payment; and all contracts for any loan of money, goods, merchandise, &c. bearing interest above 5 per cent., with an agreement for principal and interest, are null and void. It depends principally upon the contract's being a loan, and the statute uses the words directly or indirectly. Therefore, in all questions, in whatever respect repugnant to the statute, we must get at the nature and substance of the transaction. The view of the parties must be ascertained to satisfy the Court that there is a loan and borrowing; and that the substance was, to borrow on the one part, and lend on the other; and where the real truth is a loan of money, the writ of man cannot find a shift to take it out of the statute. If the substance be a loan of money, nothing will protect the taking more than 5 per cent.; and though the statute mention only for 'loan of monies, wares, merchandise, or other commodities,' yet any other contrivance, if the substance of it be a loan, will come under the word indirectly."

Again, in Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 736, Lord Mansfield says, "Before the statute of Henry 8th, all interest on money lent was prohibited by the common law, as it is now in Roman Catholic countries. This gave rise to many shifts and devices to evade the law. One, which was then most common, was provided against by that statute; but, the prohibition being confined to that particular sort of transaction, usurers were thereby put upon other contrivances; and experience taught the Legislature, in more modern statutes, not to particularize specific modes of usury, because that only led to evasion; but to enact generally, that no shift should enable a man to take more than legal interest upon a loan. Therefore, the only question
* 338 "in all cases like the present is, what is the real substance of the transaction, not what is the colour and form."

The correctness of these views I have never seen or heard doubted; and surely they tell us, that the usury laws are not to be construed strictly like penal statutes; but liberally, with a view to advance the remedy, and suppress the mischief. Every transaction is to be stripped of the covering, which ingenuity has thrown around it, and exposed in its nakedness. In this spirit, let us look at the special verdict before us, and see what was the real substance of the transaction.

Wilson & Orr, and Whitworth & Adams, were two mercantile houses, doing business in Petersburg. On the 10th of September, 1817, Wilson, the acting partner of his house, applied to Belches, a broker of the town, to know whether he could raise money for him; who answered, "yes, on good paper." On the evening of the same day, Wilson sent a verbal message to Belches, to enquire whether the names of Whitworth & Yancey would do; but Belches not being at home, did not receive the message. On the 11th of September, Whitworth & Yancey, for accommodation merely, made the note in question to Wilson & Orr, being a negotiable note in due form, purporting to be for value received, which was endorsed by Wilson & Orr in blank, and on the day of its date delivered by Wilson to Belches, without stating what was the consideration, or why it was made, but requesting him to get the money for it. Accordingly, Belches, as broker, sold the note to Johnson, a citizen of Petersburg, at 3 per cent. a month discount, but did not communicate to him any thing about the note, or the intention of the persons, or the names of the owners; and said nothing on the subject, except that he offered the note for sale; and without further conversation, it was purchased by Johnson, with his own (and not the broker's) money, which he advanced at the said discount, without any questions asked, or 339 information *given. To my mind, these facts clearly prove, that "the real truth of the matter," "the substance of the transaction," between these parties, was a loan. A cover indeed is attempted, by assuming the form of a sale, and interposing the broker as a shield. But, it is a cobweb covering, too thin for disguise; a shield too weak for protection.

That the object of Wilson & Orr was a loan, the advance of money now for money to be paid in 60 days, is expressly proved, first, by their application to the broker to know if he could raise money for them; secondly, by delivering the note to him, with a request that he would get the money for it. Get the money how? Why, in the way uniformly practised with such paper, by discounting it at usury. Can we doubt this for an instant? Do not the whole res gestæ proclaim it? Do we hear of any restriction on the broker? No! He was to raise the money. No doubt he understood the phrase. "Twas his vocation." He went instantly and discounted the note at the rate of 36 per cent. a year; and we hear no complaint of his having exceeded his powers. And can we suppose that Johnson was ignorant of all this; that he took it for a note which Wilson & Orr had received of Whitworth & Yancey in the ordinary course of business, and which they meant bona fide to sell out and out? (Not that I think such ignorance would protect him;) but can we possibly suppose it? I cannot. The facts found, the whole port and bearing of the broker and the buyer, proclaim to my understanding the buyer's knowledge of the real transaction, just as distinctly as if it had been found in so many words. It is expressly found that Belches sold the note as broker. This negatives at once the idea that Johnson could have dealt with him as owner. A broker is the factor of another; the agent of him for whom he is doing business at the time. Dealing with him in this character, if Johnson did not ask for whom he was acting, this wilful and designed omis-

340 sion charges him as strongly *with the fact and its consequences, as if it had been fully declared to him; and in truth, proves to my mind his knowledge of it. The broker offered the note for sale, the buyer took it, and paid his money without a question asked, or a word of explanation. Of this cautious silence of the parties, it may be truly said, qui tacet clamat. It speaks most emphatically to my mind. Who ever heard of a sale conducted in this way, where there was no consciousness of guilt, no apprehension of danger from the law, but all was fair and above board? In such cases, the seller fearlessly proclaims the title and circumstances of the property; and he who is about to vest his money in it, is eager to search out every fact connected with or bearing upon it. But here, conscious that they were doing a deed which the law would reprobate, and that their safety depended on concealment, we see them, in the very birth of the transaction, cautiously stifling the evidence, and preparing, by anticipation, the defence on which they now rely. They acted perfectly in concert. I ask no better proof that there was a secret understanding between them. In a special verdict, the jury need not find the usury. They find the facts, and the law infers the usury. Roberts v. Tremayne, Cro. Jac. 507; Chesterfield v. Jansen, 2 Ves. 147; Gibson v. Fristoe, 2 Call, 62; Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pull. 153. The finding proves to me, that the note was made and endorsed to raise money at usury, and that Johnson purchased with notice of these facts. If my understanding of the verdict be correct, the conclusion of law is inevitable, that the note was void in its inception. Young v. Wright, 1 Camp. 141; Comyn on Usury, 172; 15 Johns. Rep. 44, 355.

But, if I should be wrong in this, there are two other grounds, on which, it seems to me, that the appellants must succeed.

1. This being accommodation paper, was never an available negotiable note, until it was discounted by Johnson; and that discount being at a premium higher 341 than the legal *rate, the note was usurious and void; and this, though Johnson did not know that it was accommodation paper.

2. Though the note should be considered perfect and available as between Wilson & Orr, and Whitworth & Yancey, yet as the transaction by which it passed from the payees to Johnson, was a discount beyond legal interest, and so usurious, no subsequent holder could maintain an action on it.

As to the first: That a note, usurious in its creation, is void, into whose hands soever it may pass, is agreed on all sides. It is equally well settled, that if A. execute his note or draw his bill of exchange, and B. take these of him or his known agent, at a discount beyond the legal rate, it is just as much usury, as if B. had first advanced the money, and then taken the bill or note to secure it. The shift of a pretended sale is not suffered to protect such a transaction for a moment. The acts of the parties speak, and this language is much more worthy of trust than words. There must be two parties to every contract. I may draw any number of promissory notes, payable to A., B., C., &c. and finish them all in due form. While I keep them in my desk or my pocket, they impose no obligation; they are waste paper merely. So, if I agree to purchase property for which I am to give $1000, and bond with three or four sureties is required, I execute my bonds, and get my friends to sign as sureties; this is still a one-sided, imperfect transaction. The bond as yet binds nobody; there is no contract; it is the delivery which gives it life. Suppose, instead of a bond, the vendor preferred to take a promissory note with A., B. and C. as sureties. I could execute the note payable to A. and get him B. and C. to endorse it. This would make them, in truth, security for me, just as effectually, as if they had joined me in executing the bond. Or, suppose the obligation took the form of a bill of exchange. I might draw on A. payable to my own order; he would accept; then I would endorse it; and B. and C. would endorse after me. Still 342 the note or bill, *while in my hands, would be mere waste paper. A., B. and C. to be sure, had agreed to become my sureties, and had assigned the instrument in such a way, as to put it in my power to bind them: but they could only be bound when I became bound, and that could only be, when I delivered the note or bill, upon a real transaction. If I never did this, though the time for which the note purported to run had elapsed, no one of the parties to it could sustain any action on it, against another. It had never received the animating touch, and was still a lifeless body. So, if I wish to raise money at usury, a little caution must be used; a decent cloak. I get a friend to lend me his credit; he executes a note to me for $1000, payable in 3 months, which I endorse. While I hold this paper, it is nothing; it imposes no obligation on my friend; it is a mere preparation which I am making to get money. When I part with it, then I give it being, and stamp its character, by the nature of the contract I make. If I discount it beyond the legal rate, whether by myself or agent, it is usury. The note is usurious in its inception, and void.

To prove that the bill or note dates its existence from the first real transaction, I will first cite some English Cases. In Arden v. Watkins, 3 East, 317, reconsidered in Wills v. Freeman, 12 East, 656, A. having committed a secret act of bankruptcy, prevailed on B., for his accommodation, to accept a bill of exchange, which

A. drew on him, payable to his own order. This bill A. indorsed to C. for a valuable consideration, and without knowledge of the act of bankruptcy committed by A., C. the endorsee sued B. the acceptor. It was contended for the defendant, that the property of the bill was in the assignees of the bankrupt, as his act of bankruptcy overreached the endorsement. But the Court held, that the bill being accepted for accommodation of A. he had no property in it, nor right of action as against the acceptor; and therefore, that none could pass from him to his assignees; but, that 343 *the endorsee for value might well maintain an action against the acceptor. This I consider a decision, that the bill, while in the hands of A. was waste paper, and only received its existence as a bill, by the endorsement for value.

In Wallace v. Hardacre, 1 Camp. 45, the same point is decided upon the same reasoning. But, the case most strong and decisive, on this subject, is Downs v. Richardson, 5 Barn. and Alderson, 657, and 7th Com. Law Rep. 227, decided in 1822. Three persons, Rains, Lacklan and Thompson, joined as drawer, acceptor and first endorser, in making an accommodation bill. The bill was properly stamped in the first instance; but afterwards, and before it was passed away for value, the date was changed from the 6th to the 16th of March. The acceptor agreed to this change; but afterwards becoming bankrupt, his assignees set up the defence, that the change of date made the bill a new one; and rendered another stamp necessary. Abbot, C. J. says, "The difficulty arises from the act of Parliament, which requires that every bill of exchange shall have a stamp. The question then is, whether this alteration made it a new bill? Now undoubtedly, when an accommodation bill has the names of the different parties written upon it, it is, in some sense of the word, a bill of exchange; but it is utterly unavailable as a security for money, until it is issued to some real holder for a valuable consideration. It seems to me, on the facts of this case, that this was an accommodation bill, in the strictest sense of the word; and that the principal parties to it had no right of action inter se. This being the nature of the instrument, it follows that until it was negotiated, it was an unavailable instrument; and that it first became a bill of exchange, when it was issued to Howell for a valuable consideration." Bayley, J. "The question arises as to the provisions of the Stamp Act. Now, if an alteration be made before a bill is issued, a fresh stamp is not necessary. Then, when is a bill issued?

I am of opinion, that it is issued as soon 344 as there is some person *who can make a valid claim upon it; but, if it remains in the hands of the original drawer, even with names upon it, under such circumstances as that he cannot have any legal claim upon those persons, the bill is not issued. Here it was clearly an accommodation bill drawn by Rains upon Thompson, and endorsed by Lacklan, and those parties could not have a valid claim upon it inter se. It was, I think, not issued, until the 10th of April, when it was passed to Howard; but at that time, the alteration was made." Holroyd and Best were of the same opinion. The latter says, "Here, at the time when the alteration was made, the bill was a perfect bill in form, but it did not constitute a valid contract between the parties. A bond is, in form, a perfect instrument, before delivery; but still an alteration made before delivery, will not vitiate it." This is a very strong authority, when we consider how exceedingly strict the Courts in England are, in looking to, and preventing evasions of, the revenue laws.

Bowman v. Nichol, 5 Term Rep. 537; Cardwell v. Martin, 9 East's Rep. 190; Bathe v. Taylor, 15 East, 412, shew, that after a bill of exchange is once perfected, the slightest alteration in it, even though all parties consent, will render it void, unless there be a fresh stamp.

I will also refer to the Cases in New York on this point. The commercial habits of that State have rendered them perfectly familiar with the subject. It is every day before their Courts; and their decisions seem to me to deserve all the weight which can be derived from learning, talents and diligent investigation, both in the bar and bench.

Jones v. Hake, 2 Johns. Cas. 60, A. made a note payable to B., which was endorsed by B. and C. for accommodation of A., and sent by him to E., a money broker, to raise money. E. returned the note, saying he could not get the money with the names then on it, but if D. were added, he could get it at 2 per cent. a month. A. then got D's name, and returned it to E., who advanced the money on the note, deduct-

345 ing 2 per cent. a month. In "an action against the first endorser by G., it was ruled at Nisi Prius, that the note was usurious and void. The jury, however, gave a verdict for the plaintiff, and there was a motion for a new trial. Radcliffe, J. said, "If the contract be viewed in its true light, it was a contract made through the agency of the broker, between A. on the one part, and in the lender on the other, who took the note as his security. The lender was, in fact, the first holder of the note, for the value given, whatever that may have been. If, then, we admit no shift or device to evade the statute, and look through the forms under which the parties intended to cover the loan, it appears to me that there can be no doubt that the contract and the note are void." Kent and Benson concurred. Lansing and Lewis against the new trial.

Wilkie v. Roosevelt, 3 Johns. Cas. 66. A. made a note payable to B., who endorsed it for A's accommodation, who passed it to C., to raise money on, by discounting in the market. C. discounted the note at 3½ per cent. a month, and applied the proceeds to the payment of monies lent by him to A.; and afterwards, in the course of his business, passed the note to D., who sued B., the endorser. Held, that though B. had endorsed, yet as this was for A's accommodation, the note passed immediately from A. to C.; and that the transaction was, in its inception, usurious, and void.

Mann v. The Commission Company, 15

Johns. Rep. 44. Herman Ruggles drew a bill of exchange, in favor of Oliver Ruggles or order, on Darling, the agent of the defendants. The bill was accepted by Darling, and endorsed by O. Ruggles. The plaintiff was the holder of the bill. It appeared in evidence, that O. Ruggles had given the note to a broker to raise money on, and that it had been sold to the plaintiff, at a discount beyond the legal rate. Two points were made in the cause. The second was, that there was usury in the sale of the bill. Spencer, J. delivered the opinion of the Court. He said

346 "that there had been considerable doubt in the minds of some of the Judges, principally with respect to the part which O. Ruggles had played, whether he had a real interest, and could, after the acceptance of the bill, have maintained a suit upon it. "This (he remarks) appears to the Court the true test in distinguishing between a case, where the discount of a bill at a higher premium than the legal rate of interest, will render the transaction legal, by considering it the purchase of a bill already perfect and available to the party holding it, and where it will be illegal as an usurious loan of money." He then goes on to state it as settled law, that a bill, free from usury in its creation, and available to the holder, may be sold at a discount greater than the legal rate, without usury, and assigns the reason. "And I take it (he adds) to be equally clear, that if a bill or note be made for the purpose of raising money upon it, and it is discounted at a higher premium than the legal rate of interest, and where none of the parties, whose names are on it, can, as between themselves, maintain a suit on the bill when it becomes mature, provided it had not been discounted, that then such discounting of the bill would be usurious, and the bill would be void."

Bennett v. Smith, 15 Johns. Rep. 355. A. applied to B. to lend him money. B. refused, but said he would buy good notes at a discount of 21 per cent. A few days after, A. brought B. several notes executed by the defendants to A., which B. bought at a discount of 21 per cent., not knowing at the time but that the notes were given to A. in the ordinary course of business. The fact was, that they were executed to A. by the defendants (as a loan of their names) to be sold to B. at the discount he had offered. The Judge charged the jury, that if they believed the witnesses, the transaction was usurious, and the notes void, under the statute: that it was immaterial whether B. knew the manner in which A. obtained the notes; he took them at his peril, and though he may have supposed them to "have been given in 347 the ordinary course of business, they were nevertheless void. The plaintiff was non-suited; and upon a motion to set the non-suit aside, on the ground that there was no usury, the Court overruled the motion, as a clear matter; Vann Ness, J. saying to the counsel, "The case of Mann v. The Commission Company is decisively against you upon this point. We decided, that a note made for the purpose of being discounted at an usurious interest, and endorsed for the accommodation of the maker, was void in its original formation."

Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns. Rep. 176. Wood made a promissory note, which Waters endorsed for Wood's accommodation. It was made to be discounted at the Newburg Bank, and for this purpose was delivered to Smith, who also endorsed for Wood's accommodation. Smith applied to the Bank, who refused to discount. He then called on one of the firm of J. & T. Powell, who discounted the note, being informed of the purpose for which it was made. The note on which the suit was brought, was a second note made by Wood, and endorsed by Waters, for the purpose of taking up the former. Waters did not know, when he endorsed the second note, that the first had been discounted by Powell & Co., and not by the Newburg Bank; and he supposed that the second note would go to that Bank to take up the former. The second note was discounted by Powell & Co., and the first taken up with the proceeds. On this second note, Powell & Co. brought assumpsit against Waters. There were several minor questions; but the important one was, as to the usury in discounting the note. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court on the case stated. Spencer, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court. He considered it of no importance that the note was intended to be discounted at the Bank, and was in fact discounted by Powell & Co. It was made to raise money, and such discount did not increase or alter the responsibility of the endorser. On the 348 question of usury, he says, "It may be urged that the purchase of the note by the plaintiffs at such a discount, as would amount to usury in case the note was originally intended to be sold to them, is not, under the circumstances, usurious, and in fact, that it was the mere purchase of a note at a less sum than its face. The case of Mann v. The Commission Company settles this point. It is there said, that if a bill or note be made for the purpose of raising money, and is discounted at a higher premium than the legal rate of interest, and none of the parties whose names are on it, as between themselves, can maintain a suit on the bill at maturity, provided it had not been discounted, that then such discounting would be usurious and the bill void. In the present case, the note was discounted for the accommodation of Wood, and it was not an available paper in the hands of either the payee or endorser, until it had been negotiated to the plaintiffs; and the transaction, therefore, would be usurious, if the plaintiffs purchased the note at a less sum than its nominal amount, deducting the interest for the time the note had to run." A new trial was awarded.

These cases are all in point, and, I think, settled on clear grounds of law and reason. The last is a much stronger case than the one at bar. It is clear that Wood made the note and Waters endorsed it, with the intention of discounting it at the bank, and of course, at the legal rate. But yet, as the contract which gave it being as an available note, was a discount at a premium higher than the legal rate, it was usurious, and the note void. In our case, the note was made and endorsed for the express purpose of raising money at usury; and Wilson & Orr, through the broker Belches, sold it to Johnson, at a discount of 36 per cent. a year. If a shift so gross and palpable as this be suffered to pass as an innocent transaction, then indeed I should be inclined to think it best to repeal at once the statute against usury. Such a step would, at least, give fair notice to our citizens, of the ground they occupied.

349 *I said that the transaction would be usurious, and the note void, though Johnson did not know that it was accommodation paper. I am met here by the objection, that there must be a corrupt agreement to constitute usury; and that there could be no such agreement, without the concurrence of two minds, in the commission of some act in violation of the law. This seems to have been the consideration which principally weighed in Taylor v. Bruce, Gilm. 42. I have, therefore, felt myself bound to examine this point, with my best attention.

In the first place, it does appear to me that there is much good sense and soundness in the construction of the statute, contended for by the counsel in Taylor v. Bruce, and used also by counsel in a later case in New York, 2 Cowan's Rep. 740, to wit, that there is a material distinction between that part of the statute, which avoids notes, assurances, &c. for usury, and that which subjects a party to the pains and penalties of the law. The first declares that no one shall take directly or indirectly, for loan of money, &c. more than 6 per cent. and all bonds, assurances, &c. by which a higher interest is reserved or taken, shall be void. The second enacts, that if any one shall, by corrupt bargain, loan, exchange, shift, &c. receive more than 6 per cent. he shall forfeit double, &c. In the first clause, no corrupt bargain is made necessary to that avoidance of assurances. In the second, it is expressly required to constitute the offence. If we had to pass upon this subject for the first time, I think we should feel little difficulty in pronouncing, that there was a substantial difference between them. Even in England, where under the influence of the statute of Hen. 8th, the corrupt agreement is said to be necessary to constitute usury, in both its branches; there is in fact a marked distinction between avoiding a note, &c. and subjecting a party to the penalties of the act. For instance, in Barnett v. Tompkins, Skinn. Rep. 348, the wife of the plaintiff used to lend money, to be paid by the week. She lent to the defendant 350 ant 20l. to be paid by *20 shillings a week, and 1s. 6d. per week for interest. The husband sued on this bond. Lord Ch. J. Holt ruled, that it was an usurious contract, and that though it was not sufficient to charge the husband criminaliter, it was sufficient to discharge the bond civiliter.

Again. As to the corrupt intent, although it be necessary in England to lay it in the pleadings, they seem to have dispensed with any proof of an actual corrupt intent, by substituting for it a legal corrupt intent, saying that wherever any act is done, which shall be considered a violation of the statute, it shall be taken to be corruptly done, though the party had not the least idea, that he was offending against the law. They make a distinction very properly in this respect, between a mistake of fact, and a mistake of law. Thus, a bond is meant to be taken for the proper sum, and the scrivener mistakes it, and puts down a larger sum. This shall not avoid the obligation, or make the contract usurious. The most authoritative decision on this subject in England, and one which is there considered as having settled the law, is the case of Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pull. 154. The opinion of the Court is delivered by Lord Alvanley, C. J. and is elaborate and able. The jury had expressly found, (after stating the facts) that they believed the plaintiff Marsh did not think he was acting contrary to law. In the course of his opinion Lord Alvanley says, "I stated to the jury, that if a man agree to take more than 5 per cent. for the forbearance of money, the law declares such an agreement corrupt within the statute of Anne, whether the party thought at the time, that he was acting contrary to the statute or not; and though the jury have found that Sir Charles Marsh did not think he was acting contrary to law, there is nothing in that finding to prevent us from examining the transaction, and declaring it to be corrupt, if it appear to us to be so in point of law, without sending the case back to a jury to find the corruption."

And accordingly the transaction was 351 declared usurious, and the *bond void. This is the construction of equity, as well as law.

Bernard v. Young, 17 Ves. 44. A case was brought before Sir William Grant, involving the question of usury. He discusses the subject with his usual clearness, and concludes thus; "Therefore, though it was not probably so intended, this is an usurious contract." 'These opinions seem to me to be founded in sound reason; and without such construction, it would be impossible to enforce the statute.

The Courts of Massachusetts and New York have, I find, acted upon this as a settled principle. Thus, in The Bank of Maine v. Butts, 9 Mass. Rep. 49, usury was relied on as a defence to a claim of the Bank, on notes discounted. The mode of discounting pursued was this: Notes payable at 63 days were discounted at the legal rate; but a week before the expiration of the time, the borrower was obliged to procure a new loan of the Bank; thus paying for that week interest both on the original and the renewed loan. The Judge who tried the cause, instructed the jury, that this was not usury, as there was no corrupt intent, the Bank believing that they had a right to calculate in this way. On exceptions to this opinion, the Court decided that the Judge had misdirected the jury. They say, "It is probable, that in this case, there was no intentional deviation on the part of the Bank, but a mistake of their right. This, however, is a consideration which must not influence our decision. The mistake was not involuntary, as a miscalculation might be considered, where an intention of conforming to the legal rate of interest was proved; but a voluntary departure from that rate. An excess of interest was intentionally taken, upon a mistaken supposition that Banks were privileged in this respect, to a certain extent. This was, therefore, in the sense of the law, a corrupt agreement, for ignorance of the law will not excuse."

352 *New York Firemen Insurance Company v. Ely, 2 Cow. Rep. 678. The plaintiffs had discounted a note for the defendant. In a suit on the note the defence was usury. It came out in evidence, that the company, in their calculations upon discounting notes, were in the practice of taking 90 days as a quarter of a year, 60 days as a sixth, and 30 days as a twelfth; thus making the year to consist of 360 days, and gaining five days to the Bank. It was admitted that this was the general rule of the Banks of the State, and that the plaintiffs, in following this rule, had no idea of violating the law. But, the Court decided that the transaction was usurious, and the notes void, Southerland J. says, "There can be no usury without an intention to take a greater rate of interest than 7 per cent. (6 with us,) but it is not necessary to the offence that there should be an actual intention to violate the statute. It may be committed by one who never heard of the statute. Whether the party intended to take more than 7 per cent., is a question of fact for the jury. If it be found that he did, it is an invariable inference of law, that it was taken in pursuance of a corrupt agreement which consummates the offence. The intent of the parties is a legal inference from established facts. In a special verdict, it is not necessary that the jury should find that the agreement was corrupt. They find the facts and circumstances, from which the law infers either that it was or was not corrupt." See also The Bank of Utica v. Wager, 2 Cow. Rep. 712, where the same points were raised, and settled in the same way, after arguments (of the bar) among the very ablest I have ever seen.

These cases shew, that there may be a legal intention, as contradistinguished from an actual intention, a corrupt agreement in law where there was no corruption in fact, as there may be fraud in law involving no moral turpitude. These legal conclusions are correct in the main, though there may be individual exceptions. They have been found necessary for the protection of the community, and 353 *the execution of the laws, and cannot be safely departed from. Having thus shewn, first, that to discount a note given for accommodation, at a higher rate than 6 per cent., is a violation of the statute and usurious; and secondly, that every agreement in violation of the statute is per se a corrupt agreement; I think the conclusion follows, that Johnson, who purchased the note at a discount of 36 per cent. per annum, (which note received its existence by the transaction) has violated the law, and stands convicted of the corrupt agreement, though he did not know the note to be accommodation paper. It is supposed (in Taylor v. Bruce,) to be absurd and impossible, that when a man has purchased two notes, under precisely the same circumstances, the one shall turn out to be a fair and legal transaction, and the other an usurious and illegal transaction. The seeming absurdity results from considering actual corruption, moral turpitude, a necessary ingredient in the composition of usury civiliter, instead of that legal corruption, of which I have shewn the necessity from reason, and the existence, from authority. The hardship is not greater than where a man purchasing in the market two available, perfect notes, under the same circumstances, shall find one turn out to be a good note, given for a valuable consideration, and the other tainted in its origin with usury or gaming. The notes, in either case, have no earmark; they bear no brand on their forehead. These, therefore, are the risks and hazards of the trade, and must be encountered by those who follow it. But these traders know (none so well!) that there is a great mass of accommodation paper made and thrown into the market, to raise money at usury. They know (or if not, ignorance of the law excuses no man) that it is usury to buy these, at a discount beyond 6 per cent. Let them, therefore, make such inquiries as will satisfy them; or, if there be any doubt, let them avoid the traffic, or be content with the legal discount.

354 *Surely this cannot be requiring too much, in a class of cases, to which (as I think) the rule caveat emptor most appropriately and emphatically applies. Even if this restriction should narrow a little the range of this trade, is it not better, than, by freeing it from all restraint, to open a door for the evasion of the statute, so wide, that all who wish it, every necessitous borrower and grasping usurer, may enter at it?

If it be objected, that the contract between the broker and Johnson was not usurious, because a note may be sold in the market for less than its face, without committing usury, I answer, that it is very true, provided it be a real, bona fide, fair sale out and out of a note, perfect and available before such sale. But, between such a sale and the transaction here, there is a broad and marked distinction. If the holder of a note transfer it without endorsing it, the transaction is prima facie a sale; and if it be a real sale, and not a cover to evade the statute, the contract will be valid, though the discount be greater than the legal rate. But if the holder, when he parts with the note, endorses it, it becomes substantially a mere security for money borrowed. Upon a sale without endorsement, the seller enters into no engagement to re-pay the purchase money, nor is he liable in any event, if he has committed no fraud. In such a sale there can be no usury. But when he endorses the note, he binds himself absolutely, that the whole amount of it (the sum he receives, as well as the discount) shall be re-paid to the endorsee or holder; and being thus bound to pay money in future, for money advanced, if the discount be beyond the legal rate, is it not equally usury, whether the obligation to pay be incurred by an original note, or an endorsement? The difference between the discounting a bill, when the holder endorses, and the sale of a bill without endorsement, is very strongly and clearly laid down by the whole Court in Feun v. Harrison, 3 Term Rep. 757. It would be a waste of time to refer to all the cases which shew, that where the note is endorsed 355 and discounted at a rate beyond the legal interest, it is usury. The Books, both English and American, are full of them. Rich v. Topping, 1 Esp. Rep. 176; Beard v. Akerman, 5 Esp. 119; Jones v. Brook, 4 Taunt 464; Parr v. Eliason, 1 East, 92, are a few of the English Cases. Those from New-York, before referred to, prove the same thing. Loyd v. Keitch, 2 Con. Rep. 192; Churchill v. Suter, 4 Mass. Rep. 162. This last was a case agreed, and the facts almost exactly like ours. Parsons says, "If a sale under these circumstances is not to be considered usurious, it is not easy to conceive what sale is within the statute."

The second ground, on which I think the appellants must succeed, is, that the note (even supposing it perfect and available as between maker and endorser) was passed by Wilson & Orr, through the broker, to Johnson, at an usurious discount: that by this usury, the endorsement of Wilson & Orr, the payees, was rendered void; and no one holding could claim under it. The statute declares all usurious contracts "utterly void." Now, that contract which is utterly void, can produce no effect, can operate nothing, and is, in truth, as if it had never been. If the endorsement of Wilson & Orr transferred their interest in the note to the buyer, could it possibly be said to be "utterly void?" What more could it do than pass the title, if it had been valid? Is it not a contradiction in terms, to say that a void endorsement passes the title? In the case of Barnard v. Young, 17 Ves. 44, Keighly executed a deed assigning 8,500l. of East India stock to Young. Keighly afterwards became a bankrupt, and his assignees filed their bill, praying that the defendant might produce the deed, and charging that it was illegal and void, as being founded on an usurious contract. Sir William Grant says, "It was objected that Young's assignment was void, as being usurious; and if it is usurious, the consequence must follow, that it is wholly void. The party, in whose favor an usurious contract has been executed, cannot 356 not make "use of it for any purpose whatever." The endorsement of the payees being utterly void, the property of the note remained in them. If the endorsement of the payees had been valid, and any subsequent endorsement void, the holder might still have sued on the note; for, he might strike out all the intermediate endorsements, and claim under the endorsement of the payees. But, every subsequent holder must claim through the payees; and when their endorsement is void, no holder can maintain a suit. I know that in Daniel v. Cartony, 1 Esp. Rep. 275, and Parr v. Eliason, 1 East's Rep. 92, Lord Kenyon overruled a defence of this kind; deciding, that usury in any intermediate transaction respecting a note, can never make it void in the hands of a bona fide endorsee, where there was no usury in the original transaction. But, I consider these decisions overruled by a case before Lord Ellenborough in 1816, where he decided, that if the payee has endorsed the note on usurious terms, such endorsement will be void; and that, therefore, a subsequent holder cannot claim through such endorsement. For the reasons I have given, I am clearly of opinion, that this is the better law. The case I refer to is Lows v. Mazaredo, 1 Starkie, 385, more fully reported in Comyn on Usury, 175. M. being indebted to L., the latter drew a bill of exchange on M., payable at two months, to his own order. M. accepted. L. took the bill to a broker, who discounted it at an usurious rate. L. endorsed it in blank. The broker passed it without endorsement to A., who passed it to the plaintiffs. They sued M., the acceptor, and the defence was usury in the contract of the payee. The plaintiffs (at Nisi Prius before Lord Ellenborough) relied on the case of Parr v. Eliason. Lord Ellenborough, after observing that that case had been doubted, allowed the plaintiffs to take a verdict, with liberty to the defendants to move to enter a non-suit. Upon this rule, the case was well argued for the plaintiffs. The Court stopped the counsel on the other side. Lord Ellenborough observed, "that the bill 357 "having been stained by the payee with usury, could never be effective until it was cleansed. Had it been called in by the payee and re-published, it might have received an effect de novo. But tainted as it was, every one must take it subject to its vice. It was impossible to reject one part of an endorsement, and retain another part; but, that it would be necessary, either to receive or repudiate the whole unsound matter." His Lordship added, that he had turned the case of Parr v. Eliason in his mind, with great doubt, and that having been of counsel in that case, he remembered that at the time of its decision, there was great conflict of opinion on the subject. The rest of the Judges concurred; Mr. Justice Bayly remarking, that "as every endorsement was considered in law as a new drawing, the plaintiffs must necessarily claim under this new drawing, which was usurious." The rule for a non-suit was made absolute. This is a much stronger case than ours, in this respect, that the bill was given for a full and valuable consideration, and was perfectly available between the payee and acceptor; whereas here, the note was made to raise money at usury, and was mere waste paper, till the usurious discount gave it being. See the case of Chapman v. Black, 2 Mau. & Selwyn, 589, decided in 1819, where discussing the question whether usury in the endorsement of the payee disabled any subsequent holder from claiming through him, C. J. Abbott, delivering the opinion of the Court, says, "The case of Lows v. Mazaredo being subsequent to Parr v. Eliason and Daniel v. Cartony, must, in our opinion, be taken as furnishing the rule of law upon the subject; more especially, as the law has since been altered by a statute,* passed probably in consequence of the decision of that very case."

358 *The case of Hansborough v. Baylor is objected; but the differences between that and this case, both as to the circumstances and the subject of the contract are so striking, that the one can never be considered as governing the other. These differences I will not now stop to point out.

Upon the whole, I am clear that the facts found, prove the note usurious in its inception, and void: that if not void in its inception, the endorsement of the payees was usurious and void; and that on both grounds, the judgment of the Court below must be reversed, and a judgment entered for the appellants.

JUDGE GREEN.

This is an action of debt by R. C. Adams endorsee of Wilson & Orr against Whitworth & Yancey, in which the jury found a special verdict, that the negotiable note on which the suit was brought, was drawn by the defendants without consideration, payable to Wilson & Orr, who endorsed it in blank, and delivered it to Belches a broker, and requested him to get the money for it; without stating what was the consideration, and why it was made; Wilson, the acting partner of Wilson & Orr, having the evening before asked the broker whether he could raise money for him, to which the broker replied, "yes on good paper;" and Wilson afterwards having, on the same evening, sent a message to the broker, which he did not receive, to know whether the names of Whitworth & Yancey would do. That the said Belches, as broker, took the note, and sold it to Wm. R. Johnson, at a discount of 3 per cent. per month, without communicating any thing to Johnson about the same, as to the intention of the parties, or the names of the proprietors of the note; and said nothing upon the subject, except that he offered the note for sale, and without further conversation the note was purchased as aforesaid; and that the money paid for the note, was Johnson's and not the broker's money.

359 *Upon this verdict, the Superior Court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defence was, that the note and the transfer of it by Wilson & Orr were both void for usury; and the questions which arise are, whether the note itself was, in the words of the statute, "made for the payment of money lent, on which a higher rate of interest was reserved than is allowed by the statute," or in other words, was it usurious in its inception, or to use the phrase of Lord Kenyon, in its concoction? And whether, if not void for usury in its inception, the contract by which it was transferred to Johnson, was usurious and void; and if so, whether the drawers of the note (the defendants) can avail themselves of the fact, that the transfer was void, as against the plaintiff, a subsequent bona fide holder of the note?

Before proceeding to examine the effect of the facts found in this particular case, it will be useful to advert to some of the general principles settled in relation to questions of usury.

The statutes of usury are said by several of the English Judges to be penal statutes, and consequently, to be construed strictly. This declaration is remarkable, inasmuch as the statute, 13 Eliz. ch. 8, sec. 7, directs, that the statute 37 Hen. 8, ch. 9, enacted against usury, should be construed largely and strongly against the party offending by way of device directly or indirectly. However this may be in England, our statute having no such provision as that of Elizabeth, is certainly penal; and the general rule is, that penal statutes are to be construed strictly. This rule is, however, liable to exceptions in cases of statutes intended to prevent a general mischief, or to promote the public good; as the statute of frauds, which is highly penal in England, Twyne's Case, Co. Rep.; and when it applies, it means nothing more than that a penal statute shall not be extended by equity, to persons or things, not expressly provided for by its terms. It ought, however, even when construed strictly, to be carried into 360 *effect according to its true intent and meaning, 9 Vin. Abr. 521, pl. 97.

This is a rule for the construction of the terms only of the statute, and, it seems to me, can have no sort of influence upon the enquiry as to the truth of the fact alleged as coming within these terms. In enquiring into the fact, whether a transaction was a loan or a sale, the weight and effect of the evidence cannot be impaired or increased by the consideration that the statute is to be construed strictly or liberally. No construction of the statute can have even the least tendency to prove or disprove the fact alleged.

The statute of Hen. 8, which governs, and has in some measure given a construction to all the subsequent statutes of England upon the subject of usury, expressly requires, in order to constitute usury, that there should be a corrupt intent; and this must, therefore, be alleged in pleading the statutes. Our statute, on the contrary, whilst it in terms requires a corrupt intent, in order to subject the parties to the penalty prescribed by the act, declares all bonds, &c. void, if made for the payment of money lent, on which a higher interest is reserved than the law allows, without requiring a corrupt intent on the part of the lender. This distinction between the English statutes and ours has no practical effect upon any question of usury. In England, the allegation of a corrupt intention is mere form of pleading. It is an inference of law from the fact of the intentional taking or securing more than legal interest; and is inferred by the Court, either from the facts found by a jury, or agreed by the parties, or alleged in pleading and admitted by demurrer. Roberts v. Tremayne, Cro. James, 507; Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call,

*Note.—The statute here referred to, is 58th Geo. 3d. ch. 98, which provides, that no bill of exchange or promissory note, though given for an usurious consideration, shall be void in the hands of an endorsee for value, unless, at the time of his discounting or paying the consideration of the same, he had actual notice of usury.—Note in Original Edition.

62; Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pull. 153; Reynolds v. Clayton, Mod. 397—2, and 15 pl. 8, S. C. and so conclusive is this inference of law, that if the jury find facts shewing that the party intentionally took or received more than legal interest, the Court will infer the fact of corrupt intention, against the expressed opinion 361 of the jury, that "the party did not think he was acting contrary to law;" as was the finding in Marsh v. Martindale.

It was said in Price v. Campbell, 2 Call, 110, that in order to constitute usury, there must be a corrupt intent on the part of both the contracting parties. In that case, Braxton purchased bonds of Campbell, and in payment drew bills of exchange on several persons in Great Britain, with whom he had no correspondence, and which he knew would not be paid; and that consequently, he would be liable to pay in damages and costs, largely more than legal interest. His object was obviously to raise funds by this expedient. It did not satisfactorily appear, though there was strong reason to suspect, that Campbell was privy to Braxton's views. The Court held, that inasmuch as there was no agreement between the parties that the bill should not be paid in Great Britain, but should be paid in Virginia, with damages after protest, that Braxton might have provided funds in Great Britain, to take up the bill, and so have avoided the liability to pay the damages, it was not an usurious transaction, as it would have been, if there had been such an agreement. Nothing could deprive him of this right to avoid the payment of a sum exceeding legal interest, but such an agreement, which could not exist without his concurrence. The Court were, therefore, right in declaring, in that case, that to constitute usury, both parties must have concurred in such corrupt agreement; and the rule is applicable to most cases; for, there are few cases in which a party can be bound by any contract without his express assent. But, cases may occur, in which a party, who has no intention to make a contract to pay more than legal interest, may be bound by such a contract, unless he can avoid it by the plea of usury; and the true rule is, that any transaction in which the lender reserves intentionally more than legal interest, is void, for that cause only, even if the borrower does not concur in that intent; and this proposition was sufficient for the decision of Price v. Campbell. The statute, in terms, prohibits the taking, 362 *not the giving, or giving and taking, or contracting to give and take, more than legal interest; and avoids assurances made for the payment of money lent, on which illegal interest is reserved or taken, not contracted to be received or given. The literal terms of the statute apply exclusively to the lender, and do not require the concurrence of the borrower in the illegal intent. If the security for money lent, is, by mistake of the scrivener, made to secure a greater interest than is legal, and the lender parts with his money without a knowledge of the mistake, there being no corrupt or illegal intention on his part, the security is valid, and cannot be impeached at law. Nevison v. Whitley, Cro. Car. 501; Booth v. Cook, Freeman, 264; Rush v. Buckingham, 2 Vent. 83; Glassford v. Laming, 1 Campb. 149. But, if the lender discovered the mistake, before he parted with his money, and with this knowledge, had proceeded and advanced his money, with intent to avail himself of the mistake, this fraudulent and corrupt intent would be usury, and avoid the security. This is the opinion of Mr. Ord, in his Treatise of Usury, and is, I think, well founded; although there is no express adjudication on the point. In such a case, the borrower would be no party to a corrupt agreement.

In the case of Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns. 176, the defendant executed his note, endorsed by another for his accommodation, with intent to procure it to be discounted at bank at a legal rate of discount, and delivered it to an agent for that purpose. The bank refusing to discount it, the agent, without the knowledge or consent of the drawer or payee, endorsed it himself, and procured it to be discounted at more than legal interest, by one who knew the facts; and in a suit against the drawer, the note was held to be void for usury.

In Ackland v. Pearce, 2 Campb. 599, a bill drawn and accepted for the accommodation of the acceptor, without any knowledge on the part of the drawer, that it was agreed, or intended to be discounted on 363 usurious terms, was held, "in a suit by the person discounting it against the drawer, to be void for usury; and in Young v. Wright, 1 Campb. 139, there was the same decision in a similar case. In all these cases, the defendant was not a party to the illegal agreement, unless the person to whom the bill was entrusted, being his agent, the contract was to be considered as a contract made by the party through his agent; in which case, both parties concurred in the illegal intention; which is, I think, the legal effect of such a transaction, as will be hereafter more particularly noticed.

In respect to the intent which constitutes usury, I think it is the intentionally taking or receiving, under any circumstances, more than legal interest, on the part of the lender or creditor, with or without the concurrence of the borrower; and that this intent is an inference of law, which may be made by the Court from the facts submitted to it by the verdict, agreement of the parties, or demurrer to pleadings.

The only remaining ingredient necessary to constitute usury, is that the illegal interest shall be taken or reserved upon a loan, or for forbearance. Amongst the infinite variety of shifts to evade the statute, nothing has been more common than to give to a loan the appearance of a contract of hazard or of a sale, neither of which fall within the statute. Whether the transaction is a loan or a contract of hazard or a sale, depends entirely upon the real intent of the parties to the contract. This is also in many cases an inference of law, to be made by the Court from the facts ascertained by the pleadings, or by a special verdict, but may, in all cases, be determined by the jury, and in some cases, can only be determined by them, as in the case of Hamilt v. Yea, 1 Bos. & Pull. 144. A banker having discounted largely for the defendant, paid him the money by bills on London, and upon the transaction, made a profit beyond legal interest. But, whether this profit was allowed to him as extra interest, or as a compensation for the hazard and trouble of remittance, could not 364 be inferred from *the mere fact of the allowance being made; and the jury only could determine to which of these considerations to refer the allowance. But, that there are cases, in which the inference that a contract in the form of a contract of hazard or sale, was really a contract of loan or forbearance, may be made by the Court from the facts alleged in the pleadings, or found by the jury, is proved by a series of unquestioned authorities, which were cited in Stribbling v. The Bank, ante, 132.

The first enquiry, upon the finding of the jury in this case, is, whether the note was, in the words of the statute, "an assurance made for the payment of money lent, on which a higher interest is reserved than is allowed by law;" and to ascertain this, we are to consider, not the form or colour, but the real substance of the transaction. The note was not made as an assurance for the payment of money to any one, until it was discounted by Johnson. Neither Wilson & Orr nor Belches could have claimed any thing on this note against the drawers. It was not made with that intent; but, with intent that it should be a security to any other person, who might discount it, not as a security only for the money advanced by him, but for the nominal amount of the note. If a note made for valuable consideration may be sold at any discount, (a question which will be hereafter examined) it is because it is an assurance for the payment of a subsisting debt. The debt is the subject of sale and purchase. Here, however, there being no subsisting debt, and no assurance for the payment of a debt, which Johnson could purchase when he advanced his money, it was not a purchase, but a loan, upon the security of the parties to the note; and then, for the first time, the note was made for the security of the money lent, to be paid at the end of 60 days, with interest at 36 per cent. per annum; that being the rate at which the note was discounted. Johnson intended to lend his money at this usurious interest, and not to buy a note. A man wanting money at a distance, has a motive to buy a bill of 365 *exchange payable there. But, when he advances his money upon a note payable at a place where he resides, and where the parties to the note reside, and takes the engagement of the party to whom he advances the money, to re-pay it with legal or usurious interest, his only possible intent is to lend his money for the sake of the interest, and to hold the party borrowing bound for the re-payment. This is, in truth, to purchase the note of the man to whom the money is advanced; and is, in its nature, a loan, no matter by what name it may be called. This conclusion could not be doubted, if Johnson had had full notice of the facts, that the note was made without consideration, for the purpose of raising money for the accommodation of Wilson & Orr, and that Belches was acting as their agent in disposing of it. It was held in Taylor v. Bruce, by two judges against one, that under such circumstances, the purchaser of the note, at a discount greater than legal interest, was not guilty of usury, if he was not privy to the facts in relation to the making of the note, and the agency of the broker. This opinion proceeded upon the idea, that as to the purchaser without notice, the note, no matter under what circumstances it was made or discounted, was a bill of exchange, and that the law merchant attaching upon it, the bill imported a consideration not to be questioned in the hands of such a purchaser; and that an endorsement in blank was equivalent to an order to pay to the bearer; and the purchaser might therefore deal with the agent of the party to the note, not as agent, but as owner. These rules are unquestionably true in general; and if applicable to such a case as this, would preclude any enquiry as to the fact of usury in the making or negotiating of the note. It would have that effect, by suppressing the evidence as to the consideration, and of the agency of the broker in disposing of it. The cases of securities avoided by statute, for usury and gaming, are exceptions, and, I believe, the only exception to these rules. When a bill of exchange is impeached on the 366 ground of usury in its inception or *negotiation, the transaction must be tested by the principles of the common law, and not by those of the law merchant; and if, upon common law principles, the security is void for usury, then it has no existence as a negotiable security, and the law merchant cannot attach to it. If it could, the effect would be to shut out all enquiry as to the consideration, and as to the agency of the person with whom the purchaser dealt for one of the parties to the note. By the law merchant, a bona fide holder of a bill endorsed in blank, may acquire a valid title from a person having himself no title, and even from one who stole the bill. But upon common law principles, no man can transfer more right than he has; and whoever deals with an agent having no title, even without notice of his agency, and with a belief that he is dealing with him as principal, in effect deals with the real principal, and acquires the title or not, according as the agent has disposed of the property, according to his authority or not. As in the case of a factor, who having authority to sell only, cannot make a valid pledge of the property of the principal, even to a person dealing with him under the belief that he is the owner; and in the case of a sale by a factor, who acts in his own name as principal, and when the purchaser has no reason to suspect that he is acting as an agent, the principal can maintain an action against the purchaser. So in this case, the law merchant not having any effect in the enquiry whether the transaction was or was not usurious, Johnson dealt with

Wilson & Orr by their agent Belches, although he might not know that he was dealing with an agent, and so purchased the note endorsed by them from them, at a discount of 3 per cent. per month. When Johnson so purchased from Wilson & Orr, upon common law principles, he acquired no pre-existing right of action against Whitworth & Yancey, as Wilson & Orr had none; and the effect of the whole transaction was, that he advanced to Wilson & Orr a sum of money, and took their engagement with that of Whitworth &

367 Yancey, to re-pay the "money at the place where it was lent, with more than legal interest; and thus, whether he knew or did not know, that the note was without consideration, or that Belches was an agent, or believed that he was acting for himself, his whole object was to advance his money on this security, and upon these terms; and this is the act of reserving illegal interest intentionally, which constitutes usury. If he had discounted the note at a legal rate, then as there could have been no imputation of usury, the note would have had the effect of a bill of exchange, the law merchant would have attached to it, and the consideration and fact of Belches' agency could not have been enquired into.

These principles are fully established by judicial decisions in England, and in some of our sister States.

Thus, where the transaction is impeached, on the ground of usury, and the sale has been made by an agent or broker, for one of the parties to the bill, and the agent or broker endorses the bill without an agreement to that effect, and thus emphatically represents himself as owner; or if he does not endorse it; in either case, the purchaser is held to have purchased from the principal, whether he knew or did not know, that the person with whom he dealt acted as agent. This has operated sometimes to save the transaction from the imputation of usury, when the purchaser gave a full consideration for the bill, which would be void if the agent was considered as dealing as principal; and always to condemn the transaction as usurious, where the dealing with the agent was such, as would have made it usurious, if it had been with the principal.

The cases of Dogwell v. Wylie, 2 Campb. 33; Jones v. Davidson, 1 Holt, 256, and Young v. Wright, 1 Campb. 139, seem to me to have proceeded on these principles altogether. In the first of these cases, the action was by the endorsee against the acceptors of a bill. A broker swore that he had repeatedly discounted bills for the defendants, with his own money, at half per cent. more than legal interest; the last of 368 which becoming due, and the defendants "not being able to take it up, and the broker no longer having money himself, he offered to get two other bills discounted, (one of which was the bill sued on) for the same commission he received before; and accordingly, the defendants accepted two bills for this purpose, which the broker got discounted at legal interest, but paid no part of the money to the defendants. And he swore that the commission which he was to have for getting the last bills discounted, was intended as commission for his trouble as a broker, (which was largely more than the legal commission,) and not as interest for the loan of money. Lord Ellenborough held, as did the Court, upon a rule to set aside the verdict, that this was not usury, because the bill was not discounted by Rimmer (the broker) with his own money, and he acted in the transaction as a broker, and since the party who advanced the money received no more than legal interest.

The case of Jones v. Davidson was this. The bill was drawn by Richards on Davidson, accepted by him, and endorsed by Richards. Davidson applied to Duckworth to raise him some money upon his bill. The bill in question was accordingly drawn, which Duckworth promised to get discounted for 30 shillings, which was greatly more than the legal allowance for brokerage. The bill was delivered to Duckworth with this understanding, that he should get it discounted, giving the value of the bill (minus the 30 shillings which he was to take out of it) to the defendant. Duckworth's name was not on the bill at this time, but he carried it to Shore, who discounted it at legal interest, but required Duckworth to endorse it, which he did. Gibbs, C. J. held, that if Duckworth was by the original agreement to have been a party to the bill, and to discount it either with his own or another person's money, receiving thereout 30 shillings as so much of rebate from the principal sum, it would be an usurious contract; but if it were a mere agreement between the parties, that the bill should go out in its full security to the "world, and that Duckworth (who does not appear to have been an original party) should receive 30 shillings as a compensation for getting it discounted, it would not then be usury; although Duckworth, when he procured the money from Shore, endorsed it over to him, and became a party by the endorsement.

The case of Young v. Wright was this: Assumpsit by Young against Thomas Wright, on a bill drawn by him on Charles Wright, and endorsed by the defendant, by B. Tenant, and by P. Young. King testified, that he had long been in the habit of discounting bills for Charles Wright the acceptor, at first at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, afterwards at 40 per cent. per annum: that he had agreed to get the bill in question discounted for him, on these terms; and accordingly got it discounted by a Mr. Reeves, who gave for it some checks which were never paid, and goods, which, when sold, produced only 50l., this being the whole sum which C. Wright had received upon it. The counsel contended, that the bill was good in the hands of a bona fide holder for valuable consideration, because the supposed usury had been committed between King and Reeves, third persons no parties to the bill. There was no usury, therefore, in its original formation, but only in negotiating it; by which the present plaintiff could not be at all affected. Lord Ellenborough however held, that if the witness was believed, there must be a verdict for the defendant.

"According to the evidence given at the time the bill was drawn, there was a corrupt agreement, that it should be discounted at usurious interest, by which it was vitiated, into whatever hand it should afterwards come." This opinion of Lord Ellenborough was pointed to the argument of counsel. At that time, according to Lord Kenyon's doctrine in Parr v. Eliason, a bill good in its inception was considered as available to a bona fide holder, notwithstanding any usury in its negotiation by the payee; and there seems to have been an unsettled notion, that a bill was 370 not void "in its inception, unless it was made for the purpose of being discounted at usurious interest; as is intimated by Le Blanc in Ackland v. Pearce. The first point has been overruled in Lowe v. Mazaredo, in which it was held, that although the bill is not vitiated by usury in its first negotiation, yet that the holder can derive no title to it by such a transfer; and the second point never had any foundation in any judicial decision, and is directly repudiated by the leading case of Lowe v. Waller. Lord Ellenborough's observation, that there was a corrupt agreement, when the bill was drawn, that it should be discounted at usurious interest, was a direct answer to the argument of the counsel, taking into consideration that it was actually discounted at usurious interest. Without that, it would have been no answer. If Reeves had discounted the bill at legal interest, Lord Ellenborough, who shortly after decided the case of Dogwell v. Wylie, would have held, as in the latter case, so in this, that King, not having discounted or agreed to discount the bill with his own money, and not being by contract a party to the bill by discounting it himself, and for his own benefit, the party discounting it having received no more than legal interest, there was no usury in the case; whether King retained to himself, for his services in getting the bill discounted, the 40 per cent., or as in the case of Jones v. Davidson, the whole money. These transactions between the principal and agent, could not affect a party dealing fairly with the principal through the agent. It is impossible that Lord Ellenborough should have perceived any real difference between the expression in the case of Young v. Wright, "agreed to get the bill discounted for him at 40 per cent. per annum discount," and that in Dogwell v. Wylie, "he offered to get two other bills discounted upon the same commission he had before" (which was clearly usurious when the party discounted the bill himself;) and the expression used in Jones v. Davidson, "with this understanding, that he should get it discounted, giv-371 ing the value of the bill," *minus the 30 shillings he was to take out of it. All these expressions plainly import an agreement, not that the broker should purchase the bills, and pay agreed sums at all events, as parties, but that they should get the bills discounted for the parties, as their agents. If in the cases of Dogwell v. Wylie and Jones v. Davidson, the bills had been discounted at more than legal interest, (the opinion of Lord Ellenborough laying stress upon the fact, that the discount had been at legal interest,) I cannot doubt that the transactions would have been held to be usurious; although in the last, the broker, without any previous agreement to that effect with the parties to the bill, acted so decisively as a principal, and not as an agent, as to endorse the bill himself. I think all these cases clearly go upon the principle, that in enquiring whether a transaction in the form of a bill of exchange is usurious or not, the law merchant has not the slightest effect, that not attaching upon the transaction until it is ascertained, by the principles of the common law, whether it be a bill of exchange or not; that according to the common law, a party dealing with an agent deals with the principal, whether he knows it or not; and that, whether the rule benefits or injures him.

I observe too, that in Young v. Wright, the purchaser is not suggested to have had any knowledge, either of the original purpose for which the bill was drawn, or that King was acting as the agent of Wright. Why could he not, therefore, deal with King as owner, in which case, if the bill had been given for consideration, and assigned to King for value, King not endorsing it, the purchase might have been made on any terms, without usury? As I have before said, if the purchaser had given full value, the bill would have been good, notwithstanding the original purpose of the parties in making it; and giving less than its value allowing a discount of legal interest, the contract was usurious on that account, and not on account of the purpose for which the bill was drawn.

372 *It is not necessary, in order to avoid a bill of exchange on the ground of usury, if the first real negotiation of it be at a discount greater than legal interest, that there should be an agreement either between the parties to the bill, or between them or either of them and another, that the bill shall be discounted on usurious terms; although there is a dictum to that effect by Le Blanc, J. in Ackland v. Pearce, 2 Campb. 599. In the leading case of Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 736, no such previous agreement or intent appeared. All that appeared was, that the bill was accepted for the accommodation of the drawer, who transferred it on usurious terms; and in Ackland v. Pearce, the drawer, the defendant, did not know that the object of the acceptor was to discount the bill at usurious interest. And in Powell v. Waters, it was held that a negotiable note was void for usury, which had been made and endorsed for the purpose of being discounted at the bank at legal interest, and which was discounted at more than legal interest, at the instance of the agent of the drawer, for whose accommodation it was drawn and endorsed, and that, without the knowledge of the drawer or endorser. Nor is it necessary, in order to avoid a note for usury, in consequence of its being discounted at more than legal interest in its first negotiation, that the purchaser should know that it was without consideration, or made for the purpose of being discounted at more than legal interest. The purchaser does not appear to have had any knowledge of such facts in the case of Young v. Wright, 1 Campb. 139. This precise question was presented in the most imposing form, it being the only point in the cause, and presented as a naked question by a bill of exceptions, in the case of Bennett v. Smith and Philips, 15 Johns. Rep. 355, in which it was held, that an accommodation note, intended by the parties to be discounted by the person who afterwards discounted it, at a discount greater than legal interest, was void in the hands of a subsequent bona fide holder, although the person first discounting 373 it did not know, that *it was an accommodation note, or intended to be discounted, and made for that purpose; and the same doctrine was affirmed, though not directly applicable to the case of Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns. 176.

Upon principle and authority, therefore, I conclude that this note being, in its first negotiation, which alone made it a security for money, discounted at an interest of 3 per cent. per month, was void in its inception for usury, and cannot be the foundation of an action, even in the hands of a bona fide subsequent holder.

If, however, the note could be considered as valid in its inception, as between the drawer and payee, then any person claiming as endorsee against the drawer must shew, that a valid transfer has been made by the payee, without which he cannot possibly have a legal title to the debt due by the note; and if the plaintiff has not a legal title, it will be a good defence to shew that fact. If the transfer be void to all intents and purposes for usury, the title no more passes by it, than it would by the endorsement of a married woman, to whom a bill was given, or by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy, or by a person to whom the bill was not given, although of the same name. Conner v. Martin, 1 Str. 516; Philisbock and Wife v. Pluckwell, 2 Mau. & Selw. 393; Batteson v. Goodwin, 12 Mo. 50; Meade v. Young, 4 Term Rep. 28. The case of an infant endorsee is not an exception to this rule; his contract not being void, but voidable at his election only. So indispensable is it to prove a valid transfer by the payee, that it was required to prove this endorsement in the case of a bill accepted after it was endorsed. Smith v. Chester, 1 Term Rep. 655. And in enquiring whether the transfer of a bill is void for usury, it is to be determined by the rules of the common law, and not of the law merchant, for the reasons before stated.

The necessity of proving, on the part of the plaintiff, in a suit against the drawer or acceptor, a valid endorsement by the payee, so as to transfer to him the 374 legal title, has *never been questioned, except by Lord Kenyon in Daniel v. Cartony, 1 Esp. N. P. Cas. 274, and by the judgment pronounced by Lord Kenyon for the Court in Parr v. Eliason, 1 East, 92; in both these cases, the holder of a bill accepted for value, transferred it at an usurious discount. In the first case, the bill came to the hands of a bona fide holder, who sued the acceptor; in the second case, the bill passed into the hands of the assignees of the purchaser, and the endorser brought an action of trover for the bill against them. And in both cases, Lord Kenyon argued that the bill, being good in its inception, could not become void by any subsequent usurious transaction in the negotiating it; and that a bona fide holder could not be affected by such subsequent usury. It was unquestionably true, that the bill itself was not vitiated by the usury in the transfer of it; and the acceptor was still liable to pay it. That was not the question in either case. The true questions were, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover as endorsee in the first case, or the defendant to retain the bill in the second case; both of which turned upon the enquiry, not whether the bill was valid, but who was entitled to it; in short, whether the legal title passed by a void contract of assignment. This question was otherwise decided in the case of Lowes v. Mazaredo, reported in Starkie, 385, and better reported in Comyn on Usury, 175. In that case, the bill was accepted for full value. The payee transferred it at a discount exceeding legal interest and the usual commission for brokerage; and it passed through several hands, one of whom gave full value for the bill. The holder sued the acceptor; and it was held, that the first endorsement being void for usury, no subsequent holder could maintain an action upon it against the acceptor.

If, then, the transfer of the note in this case by Wilson & Orr was usurious, the action cannot be maintained by the plaintiff, although a bona fide holder, even if the note were valid, as if given for full and valuable consideration. The cases of

Daniel v. Cartony and Parr v. Eliason
375 son *admit, and that of Lowes v. Mazaredo, adjudged, that to discount a valid note at more than the legal interest, and the ordinary exchange and commission, when that is allowable, was usurious; and the English books abound with cases to the same effect. If one gives his own bill, in consideration of a sum of money advanced for a greater amount than the sum advanced and legal interest, this is clearly an usurious contract. Every endorser of negotiable paper is the drawer of a new bill, and liable to the payment of the whole amount of the bill or note, immediately upon the non-payment, protest and notice. This is the legal effect of his endorsement; and he would be bound to the performance of this contract, whenever he has endorsed for value, however inadequate, with an agreement and intent to transfer the note or bill absolutely, for the sole use of the endorsee; unless he was discharged upon the plea of usury. There are many cases when, as between the endorser and his immediate endorsee, the consideration of the endorsement may be enquired into; as, if there were no consideration, and the assignment only for the accommodation of the endorser; or, where there was a fraud in the assignment which went to the whole consideration; or, where the consideration has failed in whole or in part, and the compensation lies in estimate, not in damages; or, where the bill or note, although assigned in full to the assignee in form, was not in fact transferred to him wholly for his own benefit. As if it were agreed that he should hold it as a security for money due or advanced to an amount less than the bill or note; in which case, upon the non-payment of the bill, the holder could only resort to the endorser for the amount intended to be secured to him; or, if he proceeded against the drawer or acceptor of the note or bill, he would recover the whole amount, and be trustee for the endorser for all beyond what was sufficient to pay his claim; but this, only in cases where it was clear that the endorser was entitled to claim indemnity or satisfaction from the defendant.

376 *But, all these cases are wholly different from an absolute transfer for an inadequate consideration, for the use of the assignee. In that case, the contract of the endorser is to pay the whole amount of the bill; and he is, in effect, engaging to pay the full amount for the consideration received. If he was only bound to re-pay the actual consideration received, there could be no case in which the transfer of a bill for money advanced to a less amount than the nominal amount of the bill, after discounting the legal interest, and ordinary exchange and commission (where that is allowable) could be usurious on that account only. Yet, such transactions have been held to be usurious in innumerable instances. A careless note of a Nisi Prius decision of Lord Kenyon has given occasion to the opinion, that an endorser was bound for no more than he received; and that proposition was once adopted as law in New-York. The Courts of that State have, however, virtually renounced that proposition, in the decision of the cases before referred to; in which they held, that to discount a note at more than the rate of legal interest, was usury, even where the purchaser knew it to be an accommodation note. If they had adhered to the construction given to the case of Whiffin v. Roberts, 1 Esp. N. P. Cas. 261, they must have held, that the discount was a valid transaction, and the holder of the note only entitled to claim against the drawer the amount which he paid for the note.

The case of Whiffin v. Roberts was this: Roberts drew a bill in favor of Ould for 86l. payable in three months. The bill was for the accommodation of the drawer; and the plaintiff, who gave 29l. for it, knew that fact. Lord Kenyon said, that "when a bill of exchange is given for money really due, or is drawn in the regular course of business, the endorsee, although he has not given the endorser the full amount of the bill, yet may recover the whole, and be holder of the overplus above the sum he really paid to the use of the endorser. But, when the bill is an accommodation one, and that known to the endorsee, and he *pays but part of the amount, he can only recover the amount actually paid for the bill." The suit in this case was against the drawer. I am satisfied, that in this case Lord Kenyon proceeded upon the fact probably proved in the cause, that the bill was not sold out and out to the plaintiff; but was only pledged as a security for the money advanced. The enormous disparity between the sums, (29l. given for 86l. at 3 months,) leads to this conclusion; and his allusion to the cases, in which the holder may be trustee for the endorser for a part of the bill, fortifies this conjecture. The case of a deposit or transfer of a bill for the security of money advanced upon its credit, and not for its absolute purchase, is the only case in which the holder can be trustee for the endorser for a part of the bill, unless he as re-paid to the holder, on account of the bill, a part of its amount. If this bill was, by the contract between the endorser and endorsee, transferred absolutely for his own use to the latter, who knew it to be given for the purpose of raising money for the drawer, it would have been a palpable case of usury, according to all the decisions in England and the United States; and the holder could have recovered nothing.

There is a marked distinction between the effect of an assignment of a bond and of a negotiable note or bill of exchange. In the case of a bond, it is at law a valid security for its amount, even as between the parties, although there is no consideration for it. It is, therefore, a subsisting security before it is transferred. A negotiable note or bill of exchange, on the contrary, is not a valid or subsisting security as between the parties, if it be not made upon consideration; and acquires validity only from its first negotiation. The assignor of a bond is in no event liable to re-pay any thing more than the consideration which he received; and that not by force of the contract of assignment, but upon the general principle, that the consideration of the contract having failed, he is bound to restore what he has received.

These differences shew the grounds upon which the assignment of a bond for a consideration less than its nominal amount, deducting legal interest, is held not to be usurious, whether the bond be given for value or not; whilst a negotiable note or bill of exchange, if not given for value, and first discounted at more than legal interest, or a transfer of such a note or bill given for value, upon such terms, is usurious. A negotiable security may be purchased at any discount. If the endorsement by the payee be valid, (as it must be, if not made on an usurious or gaming consideration,) any holder may transfer it without assignment at any discount; and not being, in any event, liable to pay the amount of the bill, it is a sale of the debt, and if not shewn to be a shift to evade the statute of usury, would be unexceptionable. But, if he endorses the bill, and thereby binds himself to pay the whole amount of it at maturity, and that for a consideration in money received by him, not equal to the amount of the bill, deducting the legal interest for the time it has to run, the transaction is a loan prima facie. For, unless other circumstances appear, disclosing some other motive for advancing money for the bill, it is necessarily to be imputed to an intention to advance the money to the endorser, upon his own engagement and the engagement of others to repay it, with the profit at a future day; and only with a view to the receipt of the principal and profit beyond legal interest. This is, in its essence, nothing but a loan at more than legal interest.

But there may be cases, in which a discount greater than legal interest may be considered as a sale, although the seller endorses; as if the seller wants money at one place for a bill payable at another. A discount at a rate greater than legal interest, by the difference in exchange, would be a sale prima facie, and could not be impeached on the ground of usury, unless the discount was greater than could be fairly attributed to that circumstance; in which case, it would be considered as a shift for evading the statute; and private bankers are, in England, allowed 379 *to retain, beyond the legal discount, a commission according to the usage of trade, as a compensation for the trouble and expense of remittances, and other expenses and trouble attending such transactions. But, if more is retained for commissions than is reasonable according to the custom of trade, this too degenerates into a shift to evade the statute. Hamitt v. Yea, 1 Bos. & Pull. 144; Castairs v. Stein, 4 Mau. & Selw. 194.

No circumstance appears in this case, to give the transaction the appearance of a sale. The parties who procured the money from Johnson, received the money, and were to re-pay it at the same place. There was, therefore, no exchange; nor was there any expense of remittance, or any other expense or trouble, possibly to be encountered by Johnson in the collection of the money, other than that which is incident to every other loan of money, and which the law considers as compensated by the gain of 6 per cent. interest. There was nothing to justify a discount at a cent more than legal interest; much less, a discount at the rate of 36 per cent. per annum. I need not repeat what I have already said, to prove that the contract, by which the note was transferred to Johnson, was a contract between him and Wilson & Orr, and has the same legal effect as if it had been made between them in person, without the intervention of a broker. And if so, even if the note was originally made for full value, the transfer would be void, and the plaintiff could have no title.

The doctrine which I assert, would induce those who were about to discount a promissory note or bill of exchange, to enquire whether the party offering it to him is owner or agent, and in general he would be informed truly. But, if not, the party falsely affirming himself to be the owner, would be responsible for the injury done by his falsehood. The doctrine of Taylor v. Bruce, on the contrary, affords a strong inducement to the parties to such a transaction, to shut their eyes upon the truth, no matter how strongly the circumstances are calculated to excite * 380 suspicion. Thus, in this case, a professional broker offers a note for discount, at the rate of 36 per cent. per annum; and the note is discounted at that rate, without any questions asked, or information given. This transaction, on its face, shows almost to a certainty, that this broker, and this dealer in notes had come to an understanding, that whenever the broker offered a note made for raising money upon usurious terms, he should give no information, and the dealer should ask no questions; and this, with the sole view of sheltering the dealer, under the rule laid down in Taylor v. Bruce. Nor would the principles I assert, prevent any holder of a note given for value, from commanding funds, by disposing of it at a discount greater than legal interest, without the imputation of usury, by transferring it without his endorsement, or by endorsing it specially without any recourse to him.

JUDGE COALTER.

As several important questions on the subject of usury are supposed to arise in this case, it is to be regretted that we are obliged to decide them, unaided by the bar.

1. One question, which is said to arise, is this: If an accommodation note, payable at bank, is endorsed in blank by the payee, and handed by him to his agent for sale, and it is sold at a greater rate of discount than legal interest, without endorsement by the agent, and it is afterwards passed bona fide and for full value, by the purchaser to the plaintiff, also without endorsement, and without knowledge in the first purchaser, that he from whom he purchased was agent of the payee; is the note usurious and void in the hands of the innocent holder?

2. Another question is this; whether, if, for want of such knowledge, the note is to be taken as one given in the ordinary course of business, and the seller the real owner, yet as he paid the payee only the money he received as aforesaid, this endorsement by the payee is to be 381 *considered an usurious transfer of the note to the purchaser; and if so, whether any right or title passed to the bona fide holder under him, so as to enable him to maintain his suit against the maker?

3. The other question is, whether the facts found by the jury in this case, are sufficient to enable the Court to say, that Johnson the purchaser, knew that the note was for the accommodation of the payees, and that Belches was their broker and agent in the sale; or whether the jury must not find those facts positively, one way or the other?

These notes, standing under the act, as foreign bills of exchange, as it regards their negotiable quality, the two first questions involve the law of usury in relation to such securities.

In regard to questions of usury generally, some doubts have lately been suggested, whether there is not a difference in the effect of our statutes and those of Great Britain? That is to say, whether, under our statutes, the security may not be void, so that the debt may be forfeited civiliter when, if the unlawful gain had been received, it might not be a corrupt receiving, so as to subject the party criminaliter to the penalties of the statute? It seems to me, that on the existence or non-existence of this difference, much of the weight of the argument in support of the two first propositions must depend.

In the country which gave us birth, to which we at one time belonged, and from which, therefore, we have taken most of our civil institutions, and the common law of which is now our law, various statutes are found on this subject.

The first was that of 37 Hen. 8, ch. 9, by which it was declared, that no person, by any way of any corrupt bargain, loan, exchange, cheivance, shift or interest, of any wares, or by any other deceitful way, shall take in gain for one year, &c., above 10l. in the hundred; and if any person shall do any thing contrary to this statute, he shall forfeit the treble value, and 382 shall suffer imprisonment, &c.; "one moiety of the forfeiture to the King, and the other to the informer.

This was purely a penal statute, creating an offence, and punishing it criminaliter.

By the statute if 13 Eliz. ch. 8, all bonds and assurances for payment of money lent, or covenant to be performed, upon any usury in any thing, against the act of 37 Hen. 8, ch. 9, upon which there shall be taken above the rate of 10l. for the hundred for one year, shall be void. This statute, having forfeited the debt, reduces the penalty of the statute of Hen. 8, as I understand, "to so much as shall be reserved by way of usury above the principal," to be recovered as by the said statute.

By the 21 Jac. 1, ch. 17, the rate of interest was reduced to 8l. per cent.; and any contract directly or indirectly to take more, to be void, and the party guilty to forfeit treble the value of the money or other thing lent.

The statute of 12 Car. 2, ch. 13, altered the rate to 6 per cent., retaining nearly the same words; and that of 12 Ann. ch. 16, as also nearly in the same words, but changing the rate to 5 per cent.

In the case of Chesterfield and others, ex'ors of Spencer, v. Jansen, 1 Atk. 339, it is laid down, "that nothing is legally usurious but what is prohibited by the statutes; and that the material ones are those of 37 Hen. 8, ch. 9; 13 Eliz. ch. 16 and 21 Jac. 1; and that that of 12 Ann. ch. 16, varies in nothing from the former acts, but in reducing the rate of interest. For, in the penal clauses, all the words of the statute of Hen. 8. are taken in; so that the cases determined on the first of these statutes, are looked upon as authorities upon all the subsequent statutes." Thus we see that the statute of Hen. 8, was purely penal, and did not affect the contract. That of Eliz. avoided the contract in all cases of usury against the statute of Hen. 8. So that, thus far, it clearly required the same evidence of an usurious contract, under which unlawful interest was received, to convict under the statute of Hen. 8.

383 *As to subsequent British statutes, all the authorities agree, that they differ not from these, except in reducing, from time to time, the rate of interest, and perhaps, in introducing words of greater latitude as to the contracts to be avoided, and so as to extend to all shifts and contrivances to evade the laws. In England, therefore, no such idea has ever existed, as that there should be any difference in construction, or the evidence necessary to support the defence or prosecution, between the clause forfeiting the debt, and thereby, civiliter, (if I may use the expression) inflicting a punishment to that extent, and that imposing the penalty of treble the value for receiving the unlawful interest. In this respect, as I understand, it has always been held there as a penal statute throughout.

These statutes, owing, I presume, partly to their inaptitude to the condition of a new Colony, and partly to their penal sanctions, were not in force here; and we had no laws against usury, until the Colonial Legislature enacted them. 1 Black. Com. 108.

The first was that of 1730, 4 Stat. at Large, 294. It is much like the statute of 12 Car. 2, ch. 13; and in the Revision of 1733, it is noted in the margin as that statute.

There is another statute in 1734, which, amongst other things, provides for a discovery of usury by bill in equity, &c. Ibid. 395.

Thus it appears, that in this, as in many others respects, the Colonial Government pursued the course of legislation of the mother country; and consequently, we have always looked to their decisions on similar laws, as safe guides in this, as in all like cases.

I understand, until it has been lately questioned as to this country, that in England as well as here, whenever a party has received what is alleged to be usurious gain, if he could not be punished under what is called the penal part of the statute, the contract would not be considered as void, and vice versa. This I take to have been hitherto considered as settled law, 384 as a general rule; that is, as "applicable to the transactions of the original parties to the contract. The case of the debt being forfeited in the hands of an innocent holder of an usurious note, or of such holder receiving the money and not incurring the penalties, cannot be called exceptions to this rule; nor, I presume, is the case of a wife, who, without the knowledge, combination with, or contract of the husband, lends money at usury, and he receives or sues for it. Nor is the case of an agent taking such security, the principal giving no authority, and knowing nothing of the transaction.

Cases have been cited, where a man's ignorance of the law, and his belief that he was not acting contrary to it, would not avail him in a civil suit. But, that would no more avail him in defence of a criminal prosecution, than in repelling the defence of usury to a suit on the bond. Ignorance of law is no excuse; he has done the act which is contrary to law; his mind concurred in that, and he must abide the consequences. If it is usury for one purpose, it must be for every purpose of the act.

The argument, by which it is said, that one situated as in the case supposed, only runs the risque every man does, in taking an assignment, bona fide, of a security which turns out to be usurious and void, can only have its origin and support in this novel idea. How is this? The act done, and that by the party himself, is voluntary, and is the very act of usury complained of. It may, however, be perfectly innocent and legal, and so far as the party knew, was so. It is only unlawful and void, by reason of the acts of others, of which the supposed usury was ignorant, and as to which he may have been grossly misinformed and deceived. But his security is void. Those who deceived him and knew the facts, but concealed them, have got his money, and he has no recourse on them. If the debt in this case is forfeited under the act, it is a very different case, indeed, from that of him who is the assignee of an usurious security. He has his recourse against his assignor, and cannot be punished for 385 the usury, as the other can, *according to my views, if he committed the usury; and surely no one else did, if he did not.

But it is said, that when he purchased, he knew that he was giving less than the face of the note deducting legal interest, and therefore, he must risque the consequences. If it turns out to be a note for value, or in the usual course of business, as he believes it is, the purchase will be lawful and valid; otherwise, if it is for accommodation, he forfeits his money; or if he receives it, even although he knew nothing of this fact, he is guilty of usury, and forfeits double the amount of the debt. This would operate like an ex post facto law; and a construction resulting in such consequences, it seems to me, cannot be correct.

It is furthermore said, that such accommodation note must be usurious and void, because it had no legal existence as an available security, until it was delivered to the purchaser, on the sale. Thus coming into existence on a discount at more than legal interest, it is unlike a note for value, which is valid and available the moment it is executed; and it is, therefore, concocted in usury, notwithstanding it is a genuine note, and according to its face and attending circumstances, an available note in the hands of the holder who offered it for sale as his own property. This again, if usury, and punishable as such, must be a hard case; and the question is, whether the law will bear such construction?

An ordinary note or bond may be purchased at a greater discount than legal interest, without imputations of usury, although such bond or note be given for accommodation, the purchaser being ignorant of that fact. Gibson v. Fristoe, &c. 1 Call, 62; Price, &c. v. Campbell, 2 Call, 110; Brown v. Brent, 1 Hen. & Munf. 4; Skipwith v. Gibson & Jefferson, 4 Hen. & Munf. 490; Hansbrough v. Baylor, 2 Munf. 36. Why shall not this also be usury? Because, say our decisions on this point, there must be a loan or forbearance, and that on a contract between parties having a mutual intention to borrow and some supposition, that negotiable notes are more capable of being abused for purposes of usury, I am not able to distinguish between the two classes of cases; whilst, to attach the risque above insisted on, to the purchase of negotiable paper, is to say at once, that none, whether for value or accommodation, shall be sold for less than the face, with legal interest. This, it seems to me, would be more in the nature of legislation, than a decision according to laws and principles now understood. Indeed, it seems to me, that an accommodation note of the kind in question, is more than an available paper or security, before its negotiation, than an ordinary note given for accommodation; and therefore, that the principle insisted on would apply more strongly to the latter. Independently of any question of usury, the consideration of an ordinary note can be shewn at law, which is not the case with a bill of exchange. Even illegality of consideration, unlawful gaming and usury excepted, is no defence to a suit on a bill.

An ordinary note or bond, not delivered if lost, or stolen, is not the deed or note of the party, and can avail no one. Far otherwise is the law of bills of exchange. So soon as they are endorsed in blank by the payee, and whilst in his or the maker's hands, for accommodation, they have, to certain purposes, a species of existence; for, if lost or stolen, they are good in the hands of a bona fide holder. In the hands of the maker or payee, they may or may not be available, according as they are or are not for accommodation; and a party purchasing from either of these, at a greater discount than legal interest, will be more or less subject to the charge of usury. But, when it has been passed off by the payee to a third person, for the express purpose of sale, it would seem strange that a sale by such person, because he was entrusted to sell, should not avail, but he usury, when a sale by the thief would pass the title. In the one case too, the payee would 387 *receive his money, in the other he would receive no money at all; and yet the maker and endorsee are both liable to a fair and bona fide holder under the thief. If the holder and agent loses it, or it is stolen from him, and it passes into the hands of a bona fide holder, it is also good, though the payee gets nothing for it. It seems strange to me, therefore, that this should be law, and that yet, when it is voluntarily passed off by that agent, with the full consent of the payee, as the property of the holder, in a way which would be perfectly legal, if it was, what every bill on its face imports, on valuable consideration, it shall be void for usury.

In the case of a stolen note, it is certainly not an available security to any one engaged in, or cognizant of, the felony; and it only becomes so, when it is transferred to one ignorant of the felony; but, the felon is certainly not the agent of the payee.

To make it necessary, then, for the purchaser of a bill to enquire whether the holder is agent of the payee, and to subject him to all the disabilities and penalties of an usurer, in case he does not, or is misled and deceived in the matter, will essentially charge, as it seems to me the nature of those securities. In analogous cases in England, as where it was held that the transfer of a bill, after a secret act of bankruptcy, was void, and gave no title to the holder, the decision was soon found to have this effect, and was remedied by statute; as I believe was also done, when the effect of the decision, which avoided the transfer by the payee of a bill for value, if discounted at a rate greater than legal interest, was discovered. But, this point will be more fully considered hereafter. This too, would be to reverse the general and sound principle of law and justice, that whenever one of two persons must suffer by the act of a third, he who has enabled that third person to occasion the loss, must sustain it himself. There may be a dozen names on the bill or note; all for the accommodation of the maker or payee, or even for some one of the 388 *endorsees, or for the holder who never endorses; and yet, according to the argument, it is usury with the person accommodated, whoever he may be, although the holder had the absolute legal title, as to all the world, so far as they are ignorant of his agency; and when he parts with the possession, the legal title passes, and enures to any one who, bona fide, gets possession.

If the party purchasing had no reason to believe the note or bill was not the property of the holder, which is the case now under consideration, and the only true one by which to test this question, and he is to forfeit his money, it must be because he is not innocent. If he is, if he stands as the innocent holder or transferee of an usurious security, then he is not the usurer, subject to the penalties of the act; but may get clear of them, under the idea that there is a difference between what is denominated the civil and penal clauses of the act. Unless this doctrine, then, can be maintained, there is a case of usury without an usurious lender.

In the case before us, the holder and seller did not endorse. This is considered in law, as evidence of a sale out and out. He is not responsible to the purchaser, and on this ground also, that purchaser does not stand as an ordinary purchaser of a security, void for usury; nor was the transfer, as between these parties, usurious.

It has been held in New York, and is supposed there to be the doctrine in England, that a slave even by the payee, whose endorsement is necessary to make the paper negotiable at a greater discount than legal interest, is not, per se, usurious. I strongly incline to think, that this decision is correct. As between the payee and his immediate endorsee, the liability is no greater than in the case of an assignment of an ordinary note. It may go no farther; and if the money is not paid by the maker or drawee, the holder can only recover from his immediate endorser, the sum he paid for the note or bill. The payee offers to sell out and out, to the purchaser, at the rate agreed on; but he is 389 told, "you *must endorse, or I cannot pass off the note;" he does so, but with the express understanding, written or parol, that the purchaser will indemnify him for his endorsement; and though he thus makes himself liable to all the world but the purchaser, for the full amount, it is, as between them, a simple endorsement for the accommodation of the purchaser.

On general principles, then, it seems to me, the law cannot be as contended for in the first proposition. On authority, also, I feel myself sustained, with the exception of some cases from New York.

The case of Baylor v. Hansbrough, especially if I have been successful in showing that the scienter is as necessary in cases of bills of exchange, as in ordinary notes and bonds executed for accommodation, is a direct authority in point.

The case of Taylor v. Bruce, which was by a divided Court, consisting of three Judges only, cannot be considered as binding authority here, when the question is again presented for consideration. I have again weighed, with all my feeble powers, the arguments of bench and bar in that case, as well as the very able arguments of my brethren in this; but without experiencing that conviction of my error, which perhaps they ought to produce.

In the case of Ackland v. Pearce, 2 Campb. 599, the note was made and fabricated after an application for a discount was made, and the note then offered, refused, and the usurious rate agreed on.

So in Young v. Wright, 1 Campb. 139, the agreement was, with the broker, who had been in the habit of discounting for the party at 40 per cent. to have that bill discounted at that rate. But the jury did not believe the witness, and so found for the plaintiff.

The late case of the King v. Ridge, seems to have settled the doctrine in England, in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the Court in Taylor v. Bruce. There, the drawer himself sent the bill, which had 390 been drawn in his own favor, and accepted and endorsed by him *alone, into market, by one who was known to the person who discounted it to be the mere agent of the drawer in the negotiation. This person too had been in the habit of discounting such bills or notes for the drawer. It was held to be a negotiation with the drawer himself, and the same thing as if he had, on an usurious loan, given his note for the money, with the acceptor as his surety.

I have carefully examined the cases from New York, and especially that of Bennet v. Smith, 15 Johns. 355; in which alone, the question was made, whether it was necessary to prove that the person discounting knew the notes were for accommodation, and made for the purpose of raising money. In most, if not all, of the other cases, such knowledge appeared as a part of the case; and in that case, the jury might well have found the knowledge; for, the application was for a loan, not to sell notes. The party said he would not lend, but would buy notes, and they were afterwards made to the precise amount agreed. and the lender spoke of the transaction afterwards as a loan. Judges are more easily led away in establishing principles, when the case before them is one where, in fact, the principle can work no injury, than when it is applied to a case, where its hardship and injustice manifestly appears. Besides, the Courts there had, in other cases, laid down the general doctrine, that accommodation notes had no existence until negotiated for value; and that if that negotiation was at a rate greater than legal interest, it was usurious; a proposition undoubtedly true, if, as appeared in those cases, the fact of accommodation was known, and it was also known that the party accommodated was, in person, or by known agent, the party with whom the treaty was. The error was in considering this as a general proposition, without exception; and that it was enough to prove the note to be for accommodation, and to raise money, without further proof of a corrupt loan.

But even in New York, I understand this doctrine is not yet fully settled; nor can it be correct, as it seems to 391 *me, unless their statute contains different provisions in relation to the avoidance of the security, and the punishment of the offence. Even then, it would be a harsh construction, I think, to subject the party to the loss of his money, for a transaction, which, if the note was what it purports to be, would be legal and valid, according to their own decisions, even if the note was taken from the payee in person.

I must, therefore, be excused for not following the course of decision there, even if it is considered the settled law of that State.

The second proposition presents this question; whether, if a note is made in the ordinary course of business, and is available between the maker and payee, there being no usury between them, but is endorsed and transferred by the payee on an usurious consideration, and afterwards gets into the hands of a bona fide holder for value, this intermediate usury shall destroy the right in the holder to recover on this note against the maker?

The proposition is founded, as I understand, on this argument; that although, as to subsequent endorsements after that of the payee, usury in them shall present no bar, because you can erase them, and claim to stand at once as the endorsee of the payee, and so this intermediate usury shall not affect the right to recover; yet as you must claim under the payee, and cannot do without his endorsement, that endorsement is void for the usury, and no more title passed thereby, than if it had been forged: that the bill still remains the property of the payee, who could maintain trover therefor, he having still the legal title to the note and its avails; and consequently, that the maker can refuse payment, in fact is bound to refuse payment, if he has notice, as much as he would be, if he had notice of a forged endorsement; and that consequently, the bona fide holder, although he has paid full value, cannot recover.

In the first place, I am not satisfied that this question arises in this case. Here the note did not pass from the 392 *payee to the party who advanced his money, unless indeed, the other point is against me; and if it is, this point does not arise in the case; for, according to it, the note itself would be void for usury. The note passed from the payee to Belches. He had the legal title; and it is not pretended, that there was usury between him and the payee. If there was, that again would avoid the note itself for usury, and this question would not arise. Belches was his mere agent, and there was no contract between them, except that he would faithfully perform his agency. He lent no money, and incurred no penalty. Had he even endorsed, it would only have been for accommodation. His principal must have indemnified him. Had he endorsed, the usury would have been between the purchaser and him, and could not have been also between the purchaser and payee, and it is not perceived, how the purchaser can be held as negotiating with the payee, in the one case, when he would not in the other.

If it be said, that he must be considered as negotiating the note with the payee, because there is no other name on it, yet that is repelled by the fact that, in reality, he got it from another, and again, as above said, if it can be considered a purchase from the payee, the note itself is void, not the contract of transfer.

But, as it is supposed that the question does arise, it becomes my duty to examine it.

The decisions in England have been directly in opposition to each other. The Court of King's Bench, in the case of Parr v. Eliason, 1 East. 92, Lord Kenyon on the bench (about the year 1800,) deciding in favor of the holder; and the same Court (about the year 1816,) Lord Ellenborough, who had argued the other case when at the bar, being on the bench and deciding otherwise.

The effects of this last decision, on the negotiable quality of commercial paper, was soon felt; and the Legislature, as before remarked, were obliged to interpose.

393 *If this last decision be a sound exposition of the statute of usury, then ours contains the same defect which theirs did; but it will not be for this Court, but the Legislature, to remedy the evil. But my opinion is, that the law is not defective; but that the decision of Parr v. Eliason, is the sound interpretation of the act.

Lord Kenyon, in that case, said, there was nothing in the point, and it might be attended with serious consequences, if it should be supposed that the Court entertained any doubt about it. The commerce of the country subsists on paper credit. If this action could not be maintained, no man could take even a Bank of England post note, payable to order; for, however legal in its inception, if the payee passed it on usury, it is now contended that it would be void in the hands of an innocent holder. When the bill itself is usurious, it is void by the statute; and the construction has gone far enough in saying, it shall be void in the hands of an innocent holder without notice. No case has gone the length now contended for; nor do the words of the statute require it. Here the bill was fair and legal in its concoction; and therefore, no advantage can be taken of what happened afterwards, against bona fide holders.

The case of Lowe v. Mazaredo, (the best report of which, that I have seen, is in Comyn on Usury, 175,) is that in which the contrary decision took place; in which Lord Ellenborough said, the bill having been stained by the payee with usury, could never be effective until it was cleansed. Had it been called in by the payee, and republished, it might have received an effect de novo; but tainted as it was, every one must take it subject to its vice. It was impossible to reject one part of an endorsement, and retain another part; but it would be necessary either to receive or repudiate the whole unsound matter. He added, that he had turned the case of Parr v. Eliason in his mind with great doubt; and having been counsel in that case, remembered, that at the time of its decision, 394 *there was great conflict of opinion on the subject. That, however, he says, was an action of trover, and the holder of the bill would be entitled to the beneficial consequences arising out of the paper, to recover which trover was the proper form of action. Mr. Justice Bailey said, that as every endorsement was considered in law a new drawing, the plaintiffs must necessarily claim under this new drawing, which was usurious. The plaintiffs must here be considered as the substitute of Bloxam; by which, however, they would not suffer, because it was competent for them to recover against Ambrose, and Ambrose against Bloxam. The other Judges intimated a like opinion.

It seems to me, that the question was decided in this last case, without due regard, either to the true meaning of the statute, or to the nature of bills of exchange. A note endorsed in blank, is properly likened to one payable to bearer; and in Peacock v. Rhodes, Doug. 614, Lord Mansfield says, there is no difference between them. Both go by delivery, and possession proves property, &c. It seems to me, that the question does not depend so much on the title passing from the payee, who has endorsed in blank, as on the legal fiction, if I may so term it, by which the holder may claim on the ground of payment of value by him to the payee, and which enables him to strike out all other endorsements, even such as may be in full, and fill up the assignment to himself from the payee. That it does not depend on the title passing from the payee, at the time he parts with possession, is evinced by the cases of lost or stolen notes so endorsed, in which surely no title passed; if possible less so, than when voluntarily delivered on an usurious consideration. But in fact, the moment he voluntarily parted with the possession, the legal title did pass. The holder might have given the note to a friend, and he might have parted with it for full value, and the purchaser could recover. If not for full value, still this is usury only with a subsequent holder, and if both had endorsed, their names would be struck out.

395 *But in truth, is not this using one contract, which is usurious, to avoid or evade the performance of another contract, which is not usurious, though that assurance has been voluntarily sent into the world by the owner, who has thus parted with his legal title, and now seeks to visit the sin of another on an innocent holder, who has given full value for the paper, on the faith that it was legally and properly issued? It would be a different matter, under the law, if the payee had been sued on this new drawing, as his endorsement is called. Here would be a contract which was corrupt and unlawful; and we would be forced to apply the law in his favor, even against the innocent. This, as Lord Kenyon says, is as far as the law goes, and far enough too.

But, when we bring this case to the touchstone of common honesty between man and man, how does it stand? The payee has voluntarily parted with a note endorsed by him in blank, and which is an invitation to all the world to negotiate it. It passes through various hands without farther endorsement, not even by the usurer himself, so as to make him responsible to any one, unless perhaps, to him he sold it to. The last holder certainly has no recourse against any one whose name is not on it; and if the one from whom he got it was as innocent and ignorant as himself, and did not endorse, he will not be answerable as I understand to be settled law. Chitty on Bills, 117, 118. He has advanced his money to the full value of the note; the debt is justly due from the maker, who cannot resist the payment to some one; and the question is, to whom ought it to be paid, according to the principles of common honesty? Is it to be paid to the payee, because usury to the amount even of one dollar has been practised on him, and who will thus receive the money twice, or to the bona fide holder? If to the payee, then I say this is swindling, and that under the sanction of a Court of Justice, and worse than the most grinding usury. It is, moreover, to throw the forfeiture of the debt, not on the usurer, 396 *as the law throws it; but, on the innocent holder of the note. This, as Lord Kenyon says, is neither within the letter nor sound construction of the statute. Suppose a man sells or gives his horse to another at an usurious premium for a loan, and he is sold by the usurer to one bona fide; can he recover the horse from the innocent holder because he was passed off on an usurious consideration, and also recover his value from the usurer? If this can be done, it will be a more profitable business than usury itself, whilst it will be carried on without risque. But, determine that the innocent holder shall recover from the maker, and let the payee recover the usurious gain from the usurer, and then justice will be done to all, and injustice to none. Neither the spirit nor letter of the statute, in my humble opinion, will justify us in going further. Would a Court of Equity, with all the parties before it, come to this conclusion? If it would, as it seems to me it certainly would, can it be a sound construction of the statute, to vacate at law what equity ought to enforce, if the parties were before that forum, in a suit by the holder to recover the money, and in which suit usury could as well be pleaded as at law.

As to the third and last head of enquiry; if knowledge in Johnson, that the note was for accommodation, and that Belches was the mere agent of the sellers, must be proved and found, does the verdict sufficiently find that fact, or can the Court infer these facts from those found?

This knowledge is a matter of fact, as it seems to me, on which the jury alone were competent to decide. They alone could draw the inferences from the circumstances before them. But the verdict, so far from finding that Johnson knew the facts aforesaid, seems to negative even knowledge in the broker himself, that the note was for accommodation. The finding on this point is, "that it was handed to him, without stating what was the consideration, or why it was made, with a request to get money for it." So also, instead of finding 397 that Johnson knew "of the agency, it is found, that he, Belches, did not communicate any thing about the agency, or the intentions of the persons, or the names of the proprietors of the note; and said nothing on the subject, except to offer the note for sale. We cannot, therefore, it seems to me, infer, that because the jury also find, that Belches, as broker, took the note and sold it to Johnson, they intended to find that he sold it in the known character of broker of the payee. Such a fact, opposed as it is by the other findings, should not have been left to mere inference. Had they been satisfied as to these facts, it is hardly to be presumed that they would have found a special verdict. It is more probable, that they intended to submit the questions of law which have been above discussed; and particularly whether, as it was a clear case of usury, supposing Johnson cognizant of the facts, is it so, although there is not sufficient proof of the scienter in him, because it is in proof that the note was made for accommodation, and intended to raise money on?

But if it was intended merely to find circumstances, and to refer it to the Court to infer the facts, it seems to me they were imposing a duty on the Court, which exclusively belonged to themselves. Thus in Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 736, if goods are given in part, above their value, it is the province of the jury to decide, whether the difference is so great, that it is apparent they were taken only as a cover. So, whether the expense and trouble is colourable or bona fide, the culpable intention must always be left open to the jury, whilst the Court are to decide as to the legality of the transaction. Comyn on Usury, 97, 98, 99, 157, 158, 120, 121. In the case of Douglas v. M'Chesney, 2 Rand. 109, although the circumstances were strong, and though that was a case in Chancery, in what the Court might have determined as to the facts, yet it was considered most proper to refer them back to a jury to draw the inferences.

398 *The verdict seems to find evidence rather than fact, and if we say Johnson had notice, we only say what we think the jury might have said on that evidence. In the case of King v. Ridge, it was not considered the province of the Court, to decide as to the fact of notice, but as to the law arising on that fact.

I think there was no error as to the matter stated in the bill of exceptions, and on the whole, am for affirming the judgment.

JUDGE CABELL.

This was an action by Adams, as endorsee of Wilson & Orr v. Whitworth & Yancey, on a negotiable note.

The declaration claimed, as the debt due and detained, the sum of $954 03, with interest thereon from the 13th Nov. 1817, till paid; which said sum of $954 03, was composed of the sum of $950, the amount of the note, and the sum of $4 03 the cost and charges of protest.

The defence was usury.

The facts of the case are found by a special verdict, which states, "that the promissory note, in the declaration mentioned, was made by Whitworth & Yancey, on the 11th September, 1817, without any consideration having been given, or paid to them by Wilson & Orr for the note; but that the note is in due and usual form, purporting to be for value received, and was duly endorsed in blank, by the said Wilson & Orr: that on the evening of the 10th September, John Wilson, acting partner of Wilson & Orr, sent a verbal message to G. N. Belches, a broker in Petersburg, to know whether the names of Whitworth & Yancey would do, he the said Wilson having, on the same day, asked the said Belches, if he could raise money for him; 'yes, on good paper:' but, the said Belches not being at home, the message was not received by him. That on the said 11th September, the 399 said Wilson delivered the said note to the said Belches, without *stating what was the consideration, or why it was made, and requested him to get the money for it; that accordingly the said Belches, as broker, took the said note and sold the same to W. R. Johnson, at the rate of 3 per cent. a month discount; which discount exceeded the rate of six per cent. per annum; but, that the said Belches did not communicate to the person to whom he sold the said note, any thing about the same, or the intention of the persons, or the names of the proprietors of the note, and said nothing upon the subject, except that he offered the note for sale; and without farther conversation, the note was purchased as aforesaid. We find that the money paid for the note at the said discount of 3 per cent. per month, was not the money of the said broker, but of the said Johnson, who advanced the money for the said note, at the said discount, without any questions being asked, or information being given by the broker. And if upon these facts, the law be that the said note is usurious or void in law, then we find for the defendant, but otherwise we find for the plaintiff the debt in the declaration mentioned, viz. $954 03, with interest from the 13th Nov. 1817, till paid, and assess the damage to one cent."

The Superior Court, being of opinion that the law was for the plaintiff, gave judgment for $954 03, the debt in the declaration mentioned, with interest from the 13th November, 1817, till paid, and one cent damage, and the costs: from which judgment an appeal was taken to this Court.

Before we enter on the consideration of the question directly presented by this verdict, it may be useful to enquire, whether there be any material difference between the English statutes and ours, on the subject of usury? If there be no difference, we may, in expounding our statutes, avail ourselves of the decisions of the English Courts, in expounding theirs.

The most important English statutes on the subject of usury, are those of the 37th Hen. 8, ch. 9; 5th and 6th Edward 400 *6, ch. 20; 13th Eliz. ch. 8; 21st Jas. 1, ch. 17; 12th Chs. 2, ch. 13; 12th Ann. ch. 16, and 58th Geo. 3, ch. 93. All these statutes, except the last, are to be found in the Appendix to Comyn on Usury; all of them except the last two, are also to be found in Plowden on Usury; and the last, as also the statute of Ann. may be found in the last American Edition of Chitty on Bills.

The statute of Henry the 8th, contained no provision for vacating usurious contracts; it denounced and punished the taking and receiving more than 10 per cent. interest. It declared "that no person or persons, &c. by way or means of any corrupt bargain, loan, exchange, chivance, shift, interest of any wares, merchandizes or other thing or things whatsoever, or by any other corrupt or deceitful way or means, or by any covin, engine or deceitful way or conveyance, shall have, receive, accept or take, in lucre or gain, for the forbearing or giving day of payment of one whole year, of and for his or their money or other thing, that shall be due for the same wares, merchandizes or other thing or things, above the sum of ten pounds in the hundred, and so after that rate, &c. and no more or greater gain or sum thereupon to be had, upon the pain and forfeiture hereafter in this act mentioned and contained." A subsequent section declares that "if any person or persons, &c. shall do any act, &c. contrary to the tenor, form and effect of this statute, &c. every offender, &c. shall forfeit and lose, for every such offence, the treble value, &c."

The statute of 5th and 6th of Ed. 6th, ch. 20, repealed that of Henry 8th, and prohibited the lending of any sum or sums of money, "for any manner of usury, increase, lucre, gain or interest, to be had, received or hoped for, over and above the sum so lent, &c. upon pain of forfeiture of the value, as well of the sum, &c. so lent, &c. as also of the usury, increase, lucre, gain or interest."

The statute of 13th Eliz. ch. 8, reciting the beneficial effects of that of Henry 8th, and the evils of that of Ed. 6th, repealed the latter act, and revived that of Henry 401 *8th, by declaring "that the said late act, made in the said 37th year of King Henry 8th, &c. shall be revived and stand in full force, strength and effect."

But, as the provisions of the act of Henry 8th, went no farther than to denounce and punish the taking and receiving of more than ten per cent. interest, and was thought to be insufficient for the effectual suppression of usury, the statute of Elizabeth introduced a new provision, in addition to those of Henry 8th, in the following words: "that all bonds, contracts, assurances, collateral or other, to be made for payment of any principal or money to be lent, or covenanted to be performed, upon or for any usury in lending or doing of any thing against the said act now revived, upon or by which loan or doing, there shall be reserved or taken, above the rate of ten pounds for the hundred for one year, shall be utterly void."

In the 21st year of James the 1st, it was deemed advisable to reduce the rate of interest from 10 to 8 per cent. That was accomplished by the act of 21st of James 1st, ch. 17, which re-enacted, and reduced into one act, the several provisions of the acts of Elizabeth and of Henry 8th, by declaring, "that no person, &c. from and after the 24th of June, which shall be in the year 1625, upon any contract to be made after the said 24th June, 1625, shall take, directly or indirectly, for loan of any monies, wares, &c. above the value of 8l. for the forbearance of 100l. for one year, and so after that rate, &c. And that all bonds, contracts and assurances whatsoever, made after the time aforesaid, for payment of any principal or money to be lent, &c. upon or for any usury, whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken above the rate of 8l. in the hundred as aforesaid, shall be utterly void. And that all and every person and persons whatsoever, which shall, after the time aforesaid, upon any contract to be made after the said 24th day of June, which shall be in the year of our Lord 1625, take, accept and receive, by way or means of any corrupt bargain, loan, exchange, chev- 402 isance, shift or *interest of any wares, &c. or by any deceitful way or means, or by any covin, engine, or deceitful conveyance, for the forbearing or giving day of payment for one whole year, of and for their money, &c. above the sum of 8l. for the forbearing of 100l. for a year, and so after that rate, &c. shall forfeit and lose for every such offence, the treble value of the monies, wares, &c. so lent, &c."

It would be a waste of time to give extracts from the statutes of 12th Chs. 2, ch. 13, and 12th Ann. ch. 16; which last is now generally known in England as the "Statute of Usury." It is sufficient to say, that they are almost literal copies throughout from the statute of James, and certainly do not differ from it in any substantial respect; except that the statute of Charles reduced the rate of interest to 6 per cent., and that of Ann. to 5 per cent.

The statute of 58 George 3d, ch. 93, provides, that "no bill of exchange or promissory note, thereafter drawn or made, shall, though it may have been given for a usurious consideration, or upon a usurious contract, be void in the hands of an endorsee for valuable consideration, unless such endorsees had, at the time of discounting or paying such consideration for the same, actual notice that such bill of exchange or promissory note had been originally given for a usurious consideration, or upon a usurious contract."

The first statute in our own Code, against usury, is the act which passed in the year 1730, (4 Stat. at Large, p. 294.) I here copy its provisions, so far as they are applicable to the case under consideration, that it may be seen how exactly it follows the English statute of usury. It declares, "that no person or persons whatsoever, from and after the 29th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1730, upon any contract to be made after the said 29th day of September, shall take, directly or indirectly, for loan of any monies, wares, &c. above the value of 6l. for the forbearance of 100l. for one year; and so after that rate, &c. And that all bonds, contracts and assurances whatsoever, made after the time aforesaid, for the payment of 403 any principal *or money to be lent, or covenanted to be performed, upon or for any usury, whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken above the rate of six pounds to the hundred as aforesaid, shall be utterly void. And that all and every person and persons whatsoever, which, after the time aforesaid, upon any contract to be made after the said 29th day of September, shall take, accept and receive, by way or means of any corrupt bargain, loan, exchange, chevisance, shift or interest of any monies, wares, &c., or by any deceitful way or means, or by any covin, device or deceitful conveyance, for the forbearing or giving day of payment for one whole year, of or for their money or other thing, above the sum of 6l. for the forbearance of 100l. for a year, and so after that rate, &c. shall forfeit and lose for every such offence the double value, &c." And this is substantially our present statute of usury. Revised Code, 373.

It will thus be seen, that there is not the slightest substantial difference between our statute of usury and that of England; except as to the rate of interest; and except also that the person taking or receiving unlawful interest, forfeits, by our law, only the double value of the monies, &c. lent, &c.

It has been decided in England, that the statutes of Ann. of Charles, of James and of Elizabeth, are founded upon the statute of Henry 8th; that they partake of its spirit and expression, and indeed vary little from it, in any other substantial respect than reducing the rate of interest; and consequently that the cases decided on the statute of Henry, are to be taken as authorities applicable to all the subsequent statutes; and that the decisions upon the statutes of Elizabeth, James and Charles, are to be considered as applicable to the statute of Ann. Comyn on Usury, 10; 1 Atkins, 340; 2 Ves. 142.

As our Legislature seems studiously to have copied the very terms of the "Statute of Usury" in England, I have no doubt that it was so done, in order to give us the benefit of the English decisions as lieve it never was doubted that these decisions were applicable, until one of the counsel in the case of Taylor v. Bruce, Gilmer, 42, suggested that there was a difference between our statute of usury, and that of England; a suggestion totally unfounded in fact, as any one may see, who will compare the two statutes.

Having thus shewn the identity of our statute of usury with that of England, and, consequently, that they both admit and require the same exposition, I will now proceed to lay down some of the general principles, which have been established on the subject, and are supposed to have a strong bearing on the case before us.

The statutes of usury in England, have been always regarded and expounded as penal statutes. No one ever doubted the penal nature of the statute of Henry 8th. Its sole operation was to fix the rate of interest, and to inflict penalties for exceeding it. The statute of Elizabeth revived that of Henry, and was, of course, so far penal; and although it introduced a new clause, yet that also was penal in its nature, since it vacated the contract. The statute of James has no more reference to the statutes of Henry and of Elizabeth, than our statute has. But it incorporates into itself, by particular enactment, all the important provisions of both of those statutes; which provisions were afterwards transcribed and re-enacted in the statutes of Charles and of Ann. as they were also in our act of 1730. All the statutes subsequent to that of Elizabeth have been regarded as penal, not because they were governed by that of Henry, but because of the intrinsic nature of their provisions.

No difference of construction has ever been admitted between the clause vacating the contract, and that inflicting the penalty for the taking or receiving unlawful interest. In Hamitt v. Yea, 1 Bos. & Pul. 156, where the defence to an action of debt was usury, Brooke, Justice, said "on a penal statute shall we be so strict, for the purpose of defeating a fair claim;

405 for, I cannot but consider *the defence in the same light as I should a proceeding on the other branch of the statute, and think the present transaction entitled to as favourable a construction as if it were the object of a penal prosecution." A corrupt intent, a corrupt contract, is equally necessary in both clauses. All must agree that it is required by the clause inflicting the penalty; for, it would be monstrous to inflict the penalty of the treble value on the innocent assignee of a contract, in which, although it may have been usurious, he had no participation, and of which he had no knowledge. And a corrupt intent is equally necessary under the clause vacating the contract. For, the Legislature never thought of vacating, as usurious, a contract which was, in itself, fair and free from usury, but on which a greater rate of interest than the legal rate has been reserved by mistake in drawing the instrument; nor any other contract except where the parties intended to take or reserve more than 6 per cent. interest. And this intention to take or reserve more than 6 per cent. interest, is all that is meant by the corrupt intent spoken of in the books, as applicable to either clause of the law.

There can be no usury where there is not a loan, express or implied, or at least a forbearance; which, however, is included in the term loan. Comyn, 156-7; Cowp. Rep. 113-14; 1 Vesey, jun'r. 531; Barclay, qui tam v. Walmsley, 4 East, 55. In Barclay, qui tam v. Walmsley, 4 East, 55, Lord Ellenborough said, "that to constitute usury, there must either be a direct loan, and taking more than legal interest for the forbearance of payment, or there must be some device contrived, for the purpose of concealing or evading the appearance of a loan or forbearance, when in truth it was so."

But, whether there was a loan or not, depends on the intention of the parties to the contract. It is universally admitted, that in enquiring whether a transaction be usurious or not, the principal subject to be attended to, is the intention of the contracting parties. I do not mean to 406 say, "that the parties must intend to commit usury; for, a person may commit it who never heard of the statute. But, no man can be guilty of it, without intending to do the thing which, according to law, amounts to usury. He must intend to do that which, in law, amounts to a loan or forbearance, at a greater gain than the law allows. And in such case, it matters not whether he thought that the transaction was a loan or only a sale, for, whether a transaction, the facts being established, amounts to a sale or a loan, is an inference of law and not of fact; and his ignorance of the law, shall not excuse him. His guilt consists in intentionally doing the thing which, in reality, is a usurious loan; and therefore, the law infers that he intended to make the usurious loan. This inference of law, is usually made by the jury, whose exclusive province it is, to settle the facts when they are in dispute. Where, however, the facts are found by a special verdict, agreed by the parties, or admitted by a demurrer, the inference of law as to the intention of the parties to lend or to sell, devolves on the Court. Roberts v. Tremaine, Cro. Jas. 507; Chesterfield v. Jansen, 1 Atkias, 301; 2 Ves. 125; 1 Wils. 286; Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call, 62; Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pull. 153; Reynolds v. Clayton, 2 And. 15; Mason v. Abdy, 3 Salk. 390; Batton v. Dunham, Cro. Eli. 642; Stribbling v. Valley Bank, ante. 159. And this inference, whether it be made by the jury or by the Court, must be made from all the circumstances of the case. For it is impossible, in any other way, to arrive at the real intention of the parties. Thus, in the case of Floyer v. Edwards, Cow. Rep. 114, Lord Mansfield said, "it depends principally upon the contract being a loan: and the statute uses the words, directly or indirectly. Therefore in all questions, in whatever respect repugnant to the statute, we must get at the nature and substance of the transaction: the view of the parties must be ascertained, to satisfy the Court that there is a loan and borrowing, and that the substance was to borrow on the one part, and lend

407 on the other: and "where the real truth is a loan of money, the wit of man cannot find a shift to take it out of the statute." The same great Judge said, in Lowe v. Waller, (Doug. 738,) "the jury were to consider whether the transaction was not in truth a loan of money, and the sale of goods a mere contrivance and evasion. He then stated the material parts of the evidence, and made some strong observations to shew that it was not the intention of the parties to buy and sell, but to borrow and lend; and that the contract was in truth a loan of money, though under the mask of a treaty for the sale of goods."

But, before we attempt to apply these principles to the case before us, it will be necessary to ascertain the facts established by the verdict.

It sufficiently appears, that the note in question was made by Whitworth & Yancey to Wilson & Orr, without consideration, and solely for the accommodation of W. & O., the payees, to be sent into the market for the purpose of raising money; and that it was, for that purpose, put by W. & O. into the hands of a broker, who sold it to Wm. R. Johnson, at a discount greater than legal interest. But whether Johnson, at the time he made the purchase, knew that the note had been made without consideration, and was offered for sale by the broker, for the benefit of W. & O., the payees, is a matter of fact, which is not found by the jury. Whether the jury ought, from the other facts found by them, to have inferred and found the farther fact, that Johnson had such knowledge; or whether, if the facts actually found, had been presented to the Court by a demurrer, the Court ought to have inferred the farther fact, that Johnson had such knowledge, is a point not necessary to be decided. I will observe, however, that if I had been on the jury, I should have done as they have done; I could not have said, on my oath, that Johnson had such knowledge. How could they have said so, in the absence of all evidence on the subject? The broker himself had no reason to know that the note had been given for the accom-

408 modation of W. & O., by whom he was employed to sell it. He received no such information; and although it very frequently happens that one man endorses for the accommodation of another, it does not often occur that he gives his own note, and thus represents himself as the debtor, solely for the accommodation of another. But, even if the broker knew it, how could Johnson know it? It is expressly found, that the broker made no other communication to him than that he offered the note for sale. Do brokers sell none but accommodation paper? And if it had been real paper, given in the ordinary course of business, yet as it had been endorsed in blank by W. & O., how was Johnson to know, without information, that it was still their property? It might have passed into other hands since their endorsement. Knowledge of these facts, by Johnson, would have had an important influence on the cause. Knowledge by him, that the note had been made for the accommodation of W. & O., and was offered for sale by the broker for them, would have had a decisive influence on the cause; for, every body admits, that a purchase by him under such circumstances, at a greater discount than legal interest, would be usurious and void; for it would be, in truth, a loan at usurious interest, disguised by the mask of a sale. The jury had a right to find this fact, and it was their duty to have found it, if they thought the evidence justified it. Their omission to find it affords a strong presumption, that they were not satisfied of its existence. And the acceptance, by the plaintiff, of a special verdict which did not contain it, affords a strong presumption, that even he was not satisfied that it ought to have been found. But, it is useless to press this point farther; for, whatever the jury might have done, or ought to have done, we must take the special verdict as we find it; and as Judge Green said, in Stribbling v. Valley Bank, ante. 159, "it is an inflexible rule that the Court, upon a special verdict, cannot infer other facts from those found."

409 *We are, therefore, to consider the case arising on this special verdict, as the naked case of an accommodation note, made for the purpose of raising money, put by the person for whose accommodation it was made, into the hands of a broker, and sold by him, at a discount greater than legal interest, to a person ignorant of the character of the note, of the purpose for which it was made, and of the person for whose benefit it was sold. And, viewed in this aspect, it is precisely the case of Taylor v. Bruce, Gilmer, 42. It was decided in that case, by two Judges against one, that the sale under such circumstances, was a real, bona fide sale, and not a shift or cover for a usurious loan. But, as the Court which decided that case was a bare Court, consisting of three Judges out of five, and was divided, that decision has never been considered as settling the law, and is now to be re-viewed.

I did not sit in the case of Taylor v. Bruce, because it was supposed that the principle involved in it, was applicable to a case in an inferior Court, in which I was then a party. But that case has been, long since, decided in my favor, on other grounds; and the controversy forever terminated, by the refusal of a supersedeas to the unsuccessful party. The interest which I was supposed to have had in the decision in Taylor v. Bruce, if it could have had any effect on my feelings, would have inclined me to wish a decision different from that which was pronounced. But, that interest has certainly left no bias on my mind; for, after a laborious, extensive and careful examination of all the principles and authorities supposed to have any bearing on the subject, I entirely approve of the decision of the Court.

Our laws having put notes negotiable at bank, on the footing of foreign bills of exchange, this case must be decided by the principles applicable to such bills.

It is one of the privileges of a bill or note, that it imports a full and fair consideration; and it is consequently 410 *not competent to any party to it, to allege the want of consideration, as against any person who has given value for it.

If a bill be, by its terms, payable to a particular person or bearer, it is transferable by delivery. If it be payable to the order of a particular person, or to him or his order, &c. it is transferable, in the first instance, only by endorsement. The endorsement of a bill or note may be either in full, that is, in favor of some particular person; or it may be in blank; that is, by the mere signature of the party making it. After an endorsement in blank, the bill or note is transferable by mere delivery: and so long as the endorsement continues in blank, it makes the bill or note payable to bearer. An endorsement in blank, even if made for a particular purpose only, or without intention to transfer it at all, puts it into the power of any person into whose hands it may come, either by special trust, by finding, by fraud or by theft, to transfer the bill or note, in the same manner, and as effectually, as if it had been, originally, made payable to bearer. And it would not be competent, in any such case, to any party to the bill, or note, to object to its payment. The holder of the bill or note, is the owner, as to every person to whom he may pass it for value. I do not understand this to be controverted, except as to those cases where the seller is, in truth, the agent of the endorser of the bill or note, or the agent of that party to an accommodation bill or note, for whose accommodation it was made; and where, in either case, the payment is resisted on the ground of usury.

Bills of exchange and negotiable notes are property; and they are as much the subject of sale as any other property. And the mere circumstances of their being sold at a discount greater than legal interest, does not subject the sale to the imputation of usury, unless it be made in such a way as to make the seller responsible for their nominal amount, in case of their being dishonored. If, therefore, the holder of a bill originally payable to bearer, or of a note or bill endorsed in blank, (which makes it payable to bearer,) sells it, at ever so great discount, "out and out," *(that is, solely on the credit of the other names upon it, which implies that he neither endorses it himself, nor makes any other engagement to be responsible for it, in case of its dishonor,) such sale cannot be impeached on the ground of usury, any more than if it had been the sale of a horse at a price less than his value. And I do not understand that this is denied, as to any case, where the bill or note was originally for value, and where the sale is not made by one who was, in fact, agent for him who endorsed it. But, it is contended that if the bill or note was originally for the accommodation of one of the parties to it, and was sold at a discount greater than legal interest, by a person who was agent for the party for whose accommodation the bill or note was made, it is void for usury; whether the purchaser knew, or did not know, the character of the note, or that it was sold for the benefit of him for whose accommo-

I have already stated that, if the purchaser knew the character of the note, and that the person selling it was the agent of the party for whose accommodation it had been made, and purchased it, with such knowledge, at a discount greater than legal interest, it would be void for usury. And this was admitted by both of the Judges who decided the case of Taylor v. Bruce. It would be usury, because, the purchaser, knowing the facts above mentioned, could stand in no better situation than if he had purchased the note directly from the principal. Dealing with a known agent, is dealing with the principal. And if the purchase had been made directly from the principal, it would be clear usury; because, the note being merely for accommodation, was not, as between the parties to it, the evidence of any subsisting debt. It was, consequently, as to them, not an available note, nor could any action, as between them, be maintained upon it. It has no legal existence until it is negotiated for value. And if it be negotiated directly by the party for whose accommodation it was 412 *made, to a person acquainted with the facts of the case, on a contract to receive for it less than its nominal amount, discounting the legal interest, it would not differ in any substantial respect from the present advance, of money, on a contract, that in consideration of the advance, the person receiving it, should give his obligation to the party making the advance, to pay him at a future day, a sum greater than the sum received and legal interest. This last transaction would be a direct loan at illegal interest; and as the negotiation of the note, under the circumstances supposed, does not substantially differ from it, the law infers that the party really intended a usurious loan, and resorted to the sale of the note, as a shift or device to conceal it.

But how stands the law, if, as we are forced to say was the fact in the present case, the purchaser of the note did not get it, from the party to the note, but from a broker in the market, without knowledge of the character of the note, and without knowledge of the person for whom it was sold?

By the law merchant, which has, by adoption, become a part of the common law of the land, every bill of exchange imports, as before said, a fair and full consideration; and if it was originally made payable to bearer, or has become so payable, by having been endorsed in blank, every bearer or holder, be he agent, trustee, finder or thief, has a right to sell it, and to transfer it, by delivery. In no case whatever, is the person disposed to purchase it, bound by the law to make any enquiries as to the right by which the bearer or holder sells it; nor, after he has purchased it, can his right to demand and receive its amount from all the parties to it, be objected to on the ground that the person who sold it, exceeded his authority, violated his trust, or that having only found or stolen the bill, he had no title to

it. To compel the purchaser to go into enquiries as to the consideration, or to permit the parties to the bill to object to its payment, on any of the grounds stated, would greatly impair the negotiability of bills and notes; their most distinguishing, *most useful, and most valued feature. Surely, therefore, a person purchasing such a bill from the holder or bearer, must regard him as the owner, and deal with him as the owner, even if he be a broker; unless, indeed, he had actual notice of the real owner. And if the purchase of an accommodation bill or note, be made in ignorance of the character of the note, and of the person who is the real owner, and be made at a discount greater than legal interest; on what principle can it be said to be a loan, express or implied; without which, we have already seen, there can be no usury? If to be a loan, there must be a borrower as well as a lender. To whom was the loan made; who was the borrower in this case? Every loan implies, necessarily, an obligation on the borrower to return the money received. But, it must be confessed that, in this case, the transaction imposed no obligation on Belches, the broker, to return the money he received, nor to be liable for it, in any event, or in any manner whatever. Nor did any of the parties intend that he should be so liable. The parties could not, therefore, have intended a loan and borrowing, so far as respects the broker.

But, it is contended, that it was a loan as to Wilson & Orr. In the case of Floyer v. Edwards, Douglass, 114, Lord Mansfield said "that the view of the parties must be ascertained, in order to satisfy the Court that there was a loan and borrowing." But, how is "the view of the parties to be ascertained?" From the facts of the transaction, as they were exhibited, and appeared to the parties, at the time. It is on this principle, that the purchaser of an accommodation bill or note, at a discount greater than legal interest, from the known agent of the party for whose accommodation it was made, is held to be usurious. In such a case, the facts of the transaction, as they appear to the purchaser, make known to him that he is advancing his money to the very man whose bill or note he gets, and that the bill or note had no legal obligation whatever, until he received it. The substance and nature of 414 such a transaction, *is nothing more than a loan, at more than legal interest, and the bill or note a security for it; and that was the real intention of the parties. If the facts of the transaction, as they appeared to the parties at the time, are to be examined, for ascertaining "the view of the parties," in order to satisfy the Court that the transaction was, in its "nature and substance," different from the form which they have given to it, surely the same examination should be made for ascertaining "the view of the parties," in order to satisfy the Court that the transaction was, in its "nature and substance," that which its form indicates. Applying this test to this transaction, the question as to a loan to Wilson & Orr is at an end. Johnson saw a note importing full consideration, and payable to bearer, in the hands of Belches, a broker. He knew that Belches, as holder or bearer, had the right to sell it, and to transfer it by delivery; and that any person had the right to purchase it from him as holder, at any price that might be agreed upon, provided Belches did not make himself liable to return a greater sum than the sum received, and legal interest. Wilson & Orr appeared not in the transaction. Johnson knew not that they had any interest in it. How, under such circumstances, is it possible that Johnson, in exercising an acknowledged right to purchase the note which Belches had an acknowledged right to sell, intended to lend to Wilson & Orr, the money which he paid to Belches as the price of the note! If the circumstances of a transaction may be resorted to for ascertaining the "view of the parties," (and it is certainly a most legitimate source.) Johnson intended not to lend his money, but to buy a note. And, therefore, the transaction is untainted with usury; for, as has been said before, there can be no usury where there is no loan. I do not mean to say that if Johnson intended to do that, which, in law, amounts to a loan, his belief that it was a purchase and not a loan, would prevent its being considered a loan. Ignorance of law never excuses.

As for example, if A wishing 415 *to raise money, were to make his note payable to B, and then go to B, and offer to sell it to him, and B, supposing that a man might lawfully sell his own note, were to give the money for it, verily believing that he was purchasing a note, and not lending his money on the security of a note; this would unquestionably be a loan, on the ground that he had intentionally done that which the law makes a loan. And this intention, would, if the note were taken at too high discount, be a corrupt intent, sufficient to vacate the contract under the first clause of the law, and to subject him, criminaliter, to the penalty, under the second clause, if the usurious gain were received.

The argument generally relied on, in support of the proposition that the discounting an accommodation note at a greater premium than legal interest, makes the note usurious and void, is usually stated in the following form; "as none of the parties to the note could maintain an action on it, as among themselves, it was not an available security until it was discounted; and if the discount which thus gave it being, was at a premium greater than legal interest, the note is usurious and void."

It is certainly true that accommodation paper is utterly unavailable as a security for money, until, (in the language of Chief Justice Abbot,) "it is issued or negotiated to some real holder for valuable consideration;" or until, (in the language of Justice Bailey,) "it is issued to some person who can make a valid claim upon it." Downes v. Richardson, 5 Barn. & Ald. 674; 7th Com. Law Rep. 227. The term "negotiation," when applied to a bill or note, includes, as I understand it, every mode of transfer, whether of sale or discount, by endorsement or delivery. It is admitted, therefore, that the note in question was never an available security, until it was transferred to William R. Johnson, at a discount of three per cent. per month. But it does not, in my humble judgment, follow, that the note is, therefore, usurious and void. It is rather, (I say it with

416 *of the very point in controversy, and which is required to be proved.

The note was unavailable before it was negotiated for value. But whether the note was void and available afterwards, or void for usury, depended, not upon the rate of discount, but upon the character of the negotiation as a contract of sale, or a contract of loan. If the negotiation was a contract of loan, then, if the rate of discount was higher than the legal rate, the note would be usurious and void. But, if the negotiation was a contract of sale, "out and out," that is, on the sole credit of the names already on the note, the sale was valid, whatever was the rate of discount; and the note is a valid and available security in the hands of the purchaser. For, by the rules of the law merchant, every bill imports a consideration not to be questioned, in the hands of a purchaser for valuable consideration; every endorser in blank, of a bill of exchange, even if the bill was an accommodation bill, makes it, thereby, payable to bearer, and enables a purchaser for valuable consideration, to deal with him as owner; and the holder may, consequently, transfer it, by delivery, to such purchaser, in the same manner, and as effectually, as if he were the owner of the bill, and as if the bill had been originally given for full value. Therefore, the mere circumstance of the bill having been transferred for less than its nominal amount, deducting legal interest, is no objection to the validity of the bill; unless the case can be brought within the statute of usury. But, that statute applies to those cases only where the transfer was made under such circumstances that the law considers the transaction a loan, and the bill a mere security for the loan: and I refer to a former part of this opinion, where I endeavoured to shew, that the purchase of an accommodation note or bill, at a greater rate of discount than legal interest, even from the agent of the person for whose accommodation the note or bill was made, is a real purchase, and not a loan; provided the purchaser did not know the character of the note or bill, nor that the person with 417 whom he dealt, *was the agent of the person for whose benefit the note or bill had been made.

But, it is said, that the case of a security avoided by the statute of usury, is an exception to the rules of the law merchant; and that, therefore, the rules of the law merchant do not apply to a case where the defence is usury.

I readily grant, that the statute of usury does constitute an exception to the rules of the law merchant, and that so far as the exception extends, (but no farther,) the rules of that law do not apply to cases where the defence is usury.

But, how far does the exception extend? To determine this, we must first ascertain the rule, and then the exception.

By the law merchant, it was not allowed to a party to a bill, to object, as against a purchaser for value, the want of a consideration; nor was it allowed to him to object, as against any body, that the bill had been given for a usurious consideration. Thus stood the law merchant until the statute of Elizabeth avoided all contracts founded on a usurious consideration. But, the statute made no other change in the law merchant, and of course, constitutes no farther exception to it, than to allow the party to a bill, to object, as against every body, that the bill had been given for the illegal consideration of usury, and was therefore void. I admit, however, that the statute having allowed him to plead the usury in bar, it allows him also to give evidence of every fact that will conduce to prove the usury. Thus, where the bill was an accommodation bill, and was sold by the agent of the party for whose accommodation it was made, the defendant will be allowed to prove both the want of consideration, and the agency of the broker, in all cases where those facts will conduce to prove the usury; as, for example, where they were known to the person purchasing the bill. In that case, they do conduce to prove the usury; because, they prove that his real intention was to lend his money, and not to buy a bill, in the way of them. But, where those facts do not conduce *to prove the usury, they will be excluded; as, for example, were the agency and the want of consideration were unknown to the purchaser. In such case, they do not conduce to prove the usury; because, the question, whether usury, or no usury, depends upon the intention to lend: and it is impossible that a man's intention can be proved, in the slightest degree, by facts of which he had no knowledge.

I have not been able to find a single case, in any English Court of Justice, where the transfer of an accommodation bill has been decided to be usurious and void, merely on the ground that it was transferred by the agent of the party for whose accommodation it was made, at a discount greater than legal interest. There has not been a dictum to that effect; so far, at least, as I have observed. Knowledge in the purchaser, of the character of the bill, and of the agency of the seller, are considered in England, to be indispensable requisites, to constitute usury in such cases. On this point, the case of The King v. Ridge, 4 Price's Reports, 50, is an express authority, directly in point. The arguments of the bench and bar appear to me, to throw much light on this question, so much controverted in Virginia. Considering the case as very important, and entitled to great respect, and, as the book containing it is very dear, and very rare, (I have not heard of a copy of it in any library or in any book-store in Virginia,) I shall request our reporter to publish the case at large, in a note, or in his Appendix, from a manuscript copy which I obtained from Philadelphia, through the agency of a friend, and which, I believe to be correct. I forbear, therefore, to make any farther remark upon it.*

As to the cases of Dagnal v. Wylie, 2 Campbell, 33; Jones v. Davison, 1 Holt, 256; 3 Com. Law Rep. 92; Young v. Wright, 1 Campbell, 139, and Ackland v. Pearce, 2

Campbell, 599; I have examined them with *great attention; but I can perceive nothing in the grounds on which the Judges themselves put their decisions, calculated in any manner, to shake my confidence in the principles on which the cases of The King v. Ridge, and Taylor v. Bruce, were decided.

It is true, that the great principle, involved in this case, has been settled in New York, differently from The King v. Ridge, and Taylor v. Bruce. I have very great respect for the decisions of the Courts of that State, and generally, I derive profit as well as satisfaction from consulting them. I have considered all their cases upon this point, but have not been convinced by them. And, great as is my respect for them, I cannot sacrifice to them the convictions of my own judgment; backed as they are by the uniform decisions of the English Courts.

My brother Judges have discussed at great length another question, which is this: If the note in this case could be regarded as an available security, as between the parties to it, and had been endorsed, at a discount greater than legal interest, by the payee, to a person who afterwards transferred it to a bona fide holder, could such holder recover in the bill?

This question, although made, does not judicially arise in the case. The note did not pass from the payee to the person who paid the money, nor was there any contract of endorsement between them. But if, as the question supposes, the note had passed from the payee to the person who paid the money, on a contract of endorsement, by which the payee received, for the bill, less than its nominal amount, deducting legal interest, I should be decidedly of opinion that the endorsement was usurious and void, on the ground mentioned by Bailey, Justice, in Lowes v. Mazaredo, Comyn's Usury, 181, that "every endorsement is considered in law as a new drawing." And as every holder subsequent to the payee, must claim through the endorsement of the payee, he could not, if that were void, recover on the bill.

This point was settled in "Lowes v. Mazaredo"; and I entirely approve of that decision. My brothers Carr and Green, have taken extensive views of this point, in which I concur.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

THE PRESIDENT.

It is somewhat to be regretted, that the point decided by this Court, in the case of Taylor v. Bruce, Gilmer, 42, upon two very elaborate and able arguments by the bar, is to be re-viewed in this case, in which there has been no argument, there being no counsel on either side. Under these circumstances, I might content myself by referring to my opinion in that case; an opinion formed on as much light as I have now before me, and upon as laborious and deliberate consideration as I am capable of devoting to any case. I shall, however, without pretending to enter into a very elaborate discussion of all the cases that are supposed to have any application to it, confine myself to a few remarks on the principle, on which the case to be reviewed was decided, and to the few cases really applicable to it.

It must be admitted, I think, that a note, such as those in the case alluded to, and the one in the case before us, in the hands of a party who was the legal owner of it, as regarded the purchaser, might be purchased for less than its face, without the imputation of usury, and that the parties to it would be estopped, by the law merchant, to say, in a suit upon it, that it was without consideration, or tainted with fraud. The negotiable character, imparted to it by the law merchant, it must be admitted, forbids such defence. Upon these premises, the first question in the case of Taylor, &c. v. Bruce, was whether, though in fact the notes in that case were made to raise money on, the defendants could avail themselves of the plea of usury, against a party totally ignorant of the purposes for which the notes were made, and who had paid value for them; whether the policy of the act against usury must not only 421 *prevail over the policy of the law merchant, but was so strong as to subject a party to all the consequences of committing usury, in the absence of all proof, that he was intentionally guilty; a proceeding, directly opposed to the spirit of our laws, and reprobated in all trials for the breach of them.

In considering that question, though it was admitted upon principle and authority, that a contract, usurious in its inception, must be held to be void in the hands of a fair holder, as against the parties to it, yet it was thought by a majority of the Judges, that in a case in which the usury was not consummated before the sale of the note, its negotiable character, in the first instance, ought to protect it from the plea of usury; and the more especially, if the allowance of the plea would subject a party to all the consequences of committing usury, though totally ignorant of it at the time he purchased the note. Many cases were cited by counsel in that case, and some of the New-York cases much relied on. Upon the first argument, there was no division in the Court, on the law of the case. But on the fact, the dissenting Judge believed, on the evidence, that Bruce, the purchaser of the notes from the broker, had notice of the purpose for which they were made, and that he was purchasing from the maker; and on the second argument, which is reported, it is very evident that that impression had great weight in bringing him to the conclusion on the law, to which he finally came.

As regards Johnson, who purchased the note of the broker in this case, if he had knowledge of the purpose for which it was made, it ought to have been found by the jury. On the contrary, I think ignorance of the purpose for which the note was made, sufficiently appears by the verdict. If any thing was to be inferred from the fact, that Belches, who sold the note to him, was a general broker, which is found by the jury, or from any other fact in the verdict, to fix the fact of knowledge of the purpose for which the note was made, 422 upon him, it ought to have been *found by the jury. On the contrary, the express finding that no questions were asked, and no information given, negatives, if it were necessary, any knowledge in Johnson, of the purpose for which the note was made.

As regards the purchase by Johnson, then, the question is precisely the one decided in the case alluded to. In a contest between the policy of the law against usury, and the policy of the law merchant, which gives to bills their negotiable character, a defendant ought not to be permitted to avail himself of usury, as a sword by which to injure others, as in the case of Taylor, &c. v. Bruce, (for in that case it was in evidence, that real bona fide notes might have been purchased at a rate not higher than the notes in question,) but as a shield with which to protect himself against the extortion of his adversary. The rule caveat emptor does not apply to bills and notes, because their title is on their face; their negotiable character absolves the purchaser from all enquiries beyond the paper itself. They are not affected by failure of consideration, or by fraud, in the hands of a fair purchaser without notice. A bill or note with a blank endorsement, is a bill or note payable to bearer, and passes by delivery. In the case of Lowe v. Waller, in which there was usury in the concoction of the bill, the Court, to preserve the principle of negotiability, struggled hard, but was compelled to yield to the force of the statute against usury. In the case of Parr v. Eliason, Lord Kenyon held, that intermediate usury, between an endorser and endorsee, did not taint the contract with usury in the hands of a bona fide holder. In the case of Lowes v. Mazaredo, Lord Ellenborough overruled that case, and in consequence of it, such was the shock given the negotiability of bills, that the act of 58 George 3, was passed, to re-establish public confidence in bills, &c. That act declares, that no bill of exchange or promissory note, though for usurious consideration, shall be void in the hands of an endorsee for value, unless at the time of his discounting it, or paying the consideration, he had actual notice of 423 *the usury. This act reverses the decision of Lowe v. Waller, and excludes negotiable paper, almost entirely, from the operation of the statute against usury. This act, it is true, is not in force in this country, and is only cited to shew the state of the contest in England, to sustain the negotiability of bills, against the policy of the law against usury.

The only case I have met with, which is directly in point to the case before us, is the case of The King v. Ridge, 4 Price's Rep. 50. The facts were, that Lord Moira drew four bills of exchange, payable to his own order, which were accepted by Ridge, his Lordship's regimental agent. They were endorsed generally by Lord Moira, and by his agent, Major James, handed to the house of Austin & Maund, who discounted them at usurious interest. The real question in that case was, whether it was a sale of the bills, or a loan; and it was decided to be the latter, on the express ground that Austin & Maund, who discounted them, must have known that they were dealing with Lord Moira himself for the bills, and not with another, who might be the owner of them. Among others, Garrow, Baron, said, the confusion which has got into this case, proceeds from its having been at one time considered, that these bills were sent about the town, to be sold for what could be got for them; but the fact is, that this paper was sent by the maker to those, who well knew its precise value, to get that value for it, which was done. Nothing had been given by Major James for it; and whether the transaction was originally good, it is not necessary to enquire. But that this transaction, as between Major James, the acknowledged agent of Lord Moira, and Austin & Maund, was usurious and void, there can be no doubt. That it was nothing but a loan by Austin & Maund to Lord Moira, seems, from the facts, very clear. But, if they had not known, that the bills were the bills of Lord Moira, and sent by Major James, his agent, to borrow money on them, it is equally clear the decision would 424 *have been a different one. If, as in the case of Taylor, &c. v. Bruce, they had been sent about the town, to be sold, (as for all that appeared in that case they were,) and Austin & Maund had been totally ignorant to whom they belonged, as Bruce was, it is impossible to perceive that the transaction would have been condemned as usurious; unless, indeed, in no case can a bill or note be sold for less than its face, without subjecting the purchaser to the consequences of committing usury.

As to the cases in which a party purchasing a contract, usurious in its inception or concoction, though ignorant of the usury at the time, is to lose his money, they are not controverted. They have no application to the case before the Court. In such cases, he is not condemned as an usurer, though he loses his money. The usury exists anterior to his purchase, and is not consummated by his purchase. But even in these cases, it will be found, that before the passage of the act of 58 Geo. 3d, there was great repugnance in the English Judges, to subject an innocent purchaser of such a bill, to the loss of his money. In the case of Jones v. Davidson, Chief Justice Gibbs said, "I can never understand the equity of the rule, which has so long obtained under the statute, that an innocent endorsee shall be prevented from recovering on a bill of exchange, which has been contaminated in its creation with usury, by means to which he is not privy, and of which, when he receives the bill, he can know nothing. I own I have serious doubts on this construction; and if the case renders it necessary, I will reserve the point, except for usury committed by the parties who originally create the instrument. If the parties who create the instrument, and agree to put their names upon it, commit usury, it is reasonable that they should answer for the consequences; but, I do not understand, why the security should be avoided in the hands of one who takes it for a valid consideration in the common course of business." In that case, A agreed to give B, a sum beyond legal interest, to get a bill 425 discounted. *C, discounted it at legal interest, and B, endorsed it. Held, that A, could not defend himself against the endorsee of C, on the ground of usury between him and B.

These cases, as before remarked, have no application to the one before us. There is an important difference between convicting a party of usury, and subjecting him to the loss of his money, by the conviction of others. In order to convict a party of usury, the intention to commit it must be wilful. There must be a corrupt agreement, and not a true and just intent. In a contract, fair upon the face of it as to himself, he cannot unknowingly, be made the instrument of others to commit it; unknowingly, not as to the law, but the facts, on which he proceeds to advance his money. The technical distinction between what is called a perfect bill and a blank, ought not to affect him; but in truth, there is nothing in it. A note made by A, and endorsed by B, for accommodation, though of no binding force between the parties until discounted, is not a blank piece of paper. As regards everybody else, it is a binding security, and when sold to a party without notice, neither want of consideration, nor fraud, can be alleged against the holder. To allege usury in the purchaser who discounts at more than legal interest, though real business notes might be purchased at the same or less discount, according to circumstances, and to subject him to the penalty, of usury would be to interdict the sale of bills and notes altogether, or to put him on enquiry, which would change the character of such paper. Nor can this consequence be avoided by any construction of the act against usury.

It cannot be said, that the contract may be avoided under the first section, and the party remain unaffected by the second section, if he receives its amount. The two sections must be taken together, to give any validity to the second. It must be considered as applying to the party embraced by the first. That section avoids the contract if usurious; and the second 426 *inflicts the penalty, if the usury is received. The first subjects him to the charge of having made a corrupt contract; and the second inflicts the penalty. Corrupt intention is required in both parties. Price v. Campbell, 2 Call, 11. That it is a legal inference from the facts, and need not be found by the jury, is admitted.

Upon the whole, I think the case of Taylor, &c. v. Bruce, was decided on correct principles, and that the case before us must follow its fate, and the judgment be affirmed.

Heron v. Bank of the United States.*

June, 1837.

Deeds—Recordation—Statute.—By the act of 1814, a deed cannot be proved and recorded after eight months from its delivery, in the Clerk's Office: but such deed must be proved in open Court. By two Judges, of a Court consisting of three.

This was an appeal from the Williamsburg Chancery Court, where the bank of the United States filed a bill against Heron, Plume and others, to set aside a deed of trust, made by Heron to Plume & Co. which, the plaintiffs alleged, obstructed their execution. This deed was impeached, first, on the ground of fraud, and secondly, because it was not proved and recorded within eight months from its delivery; and then, it was recorded in the Clerk's office, which was not authorised by law. The grounds of this objection will fully appear by the following opinions.

427 *The Chancellor decreed, that the deed should be set aside, as void against the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed.

Wickham, for the appellant.

Stanard, for the appellees.

June 15. JUDGE CARR.

In the Court below, the appellees, being judgment creditors of Heron, filed a bill against him and Plume & Co., charging that a deed of trust, made by Heron to Plume & Co. and which obstructed the execution of the plaintiffs, was, 1st, fraudulent; 2d, if not fraudulent, that it was void as to the plaintiffs, because not legally recorded. The Court of Chancery decided against the deed on both grounds. I will consider the last point, first.

By the early laws on the subject, deeds are directed to be recorded, in the General or County Courts (not restricting it to the county in which the land lay,) within six months. In 1705, they were required to be recorded in the General Court, or Court of the county where the lands lay, within eight months. In 1785, they are directed to be recorded before the General Court, or Court of the county, city or corporation, where the lands lay, within eight months.

When District Courts were created, the power was given to those Courts, for lands within the district; and when the Superior Court system succeeded, the power was given to those Courts also, for lands within the county. But in all these cases, the power was vested in the Court, and not in any officer; and the probate and order for recording, were always made in open Court. Nor was there any statutory power of recording, given to Courts, after the lapse of eight months from the delivery of the deed. Courts of record might, and did, exercise the common law power, of spreading conveyances and other instruments 428 *upon their records, for safekeeping; and the inexpressum would be evidence of the execution of the deed, against the grantor and those claiming under him, if the deed were recorded on his acknowledgment; but, such a deed could claim none of the privileges of a deed recorded under the statute.

In the session of 1813, a law passed, by the first section of which it is enacted, "that the clerks of the several County and Corporation Courts, &c. are authorised and required to admit to record, at any time within the period, and in the form, now required by law, any conveyance, either on the acknowledgment of the party, or the proof on oath of such acknowledgment, by the legal number of witnesses thereto, made in the office of the respective clerks; and that any conveyance so recorded, shall have the same legal validity, in all respects, as if it were proved in open Court." It is under this law, that the question arises.

The deed from Heron to Plume & Co., bears date on the 1st of September, 1817, and was admitted to record in the clerk's office, on the 15th of February, 1819; nearly 18 months after its date. Was this deed legally recorded? Had the clerk power, after the lapse of eight months from its date, to take probate of the deed, in his office? This is purely a question of construction; and before entering upon it, I will avail myself of the remarks of C. J. Willes, in Coleman v. Cook, 1 Willes' Rep. 397, which seem to me very sound. "When the words of an act are doubtful and uncertain, it is proper to enquire what was the intent of the Legislature; but, it is very dangerous for Judges to launch out too far, in searching into the intent of the Legislature, when they have expressed themselves in plain and clear words."

The law I have quoted, vests a new power in clerks; a power to admit deeds to record in their offices. But, this power is limited both as to time and manner. They may record deeds in their offices, "at any time, within the period, and in the form, now required by law." These are

429 *important limitations. It is impossible to suppose, that they crept into the law by accident; and if the Legislature intended to use them, it could be but in one sense. Strike out all these words of restriction, and the clerks are unlimited. Retain them, and they can record deeds in their office, only within eight months from the delivery; and in the form now required by law. The form required, is, the acknowledgment of the party, or proof by three witnesses. If the clerk can dispense with one of these limitations, why not with the other? If he is not confined to the time prescribed, why is he to the form? If he may record deeds after the expiration of eight months, why not without proof by witnesses, or acknowledgment by the party. The time and the form are equally clear and definite. It is just as palpable, that by the words of the act, the deed must be presented within eight months, as that it must be proved or acknowledged; and the power, which can dispense with one of these provisions, may, without difficulty, disregard the other. That the restriction as to time, was not introduced without design, the second section of the law is strong to show. By that, a deed may be recorded on the certificate of two magistrates, endorsed that it has been duly acknowledged before them by the party, and that he desires it may be recorded; "provided, that such a deed, with such certificate, be delivered to the clerk, within the period now allowed by law." Here is a proviso, the express and sole purpose of which is, to limit the power of recording those deeds within the clause, to eight months; shewing the settled purpose of the Legislature to tie up these new powers given to clerks and magistrates; and this knot can only be untied, eo ligamine quo ligatur, however judicial usurpation may attempt to cut it.

The 7th section of this law enacts, "that any conveyance, which shall hereafter be recorded, after the expiration of the time now allowed by law for recording the same, shall take effect, and be valid in law, 430 as to creditors *and subsequent purchasers, from the time of such recording, and from that time only." It was strongly contended in the argument, that this section gave to clerks, by implication, the power of recording deeds in their office, after the lapse of eight months. The special and sole object of the first section was, to vest this new power in the clerks. In doing this, the legislative mind was, of necessity, directly turned to the nature and extent of the power to be given. Accordingly, the first section describes that power exactly, and limits it to eight months. Would it not seem very extraordinary, that a subsequent section of the same law should take away this limit: that of the same statute, one section should enact, that the clerks shall not record deeds after eight months; and another, that the clerks shall record deeds after eight months? If the legislative intent had changed in the course of discussion, before passing the act, would they not have evinced that change by striking out the words of limitation in the first section, rather than by letting them stand, and inserting a subsequent section to repeal them; thus exhibiting the unseemly spectacle of two sections in the same act, in direct conflict with each other? Ought not the words to be most clear, and the contradiction most positive and direct, which would justify us in attributing such a course to the Legislature? And would it not violate every rule of sound construction, to repeal the first section, expressly limiting the power of the clerks to eight months, by a subsequent section, which does not mention them at all, and can only apply to them by implication; an implication, not necessary to the operation of the 7th section, nor, in my opinion, even plausible in itself? Not necessary, because, though we should decide that the clerks could not record deeds after eight months, the power of the Courts to record them would still remain, and would be fully sufficient to meet the mischief, for which the 7th section meant to provide: Not plausible, because, in the construction of a statute, we must take 431 into view all its different parts; and when, in one section *it is said, that clerks shall not record deeds after eight months, and in another, that deeds, recorded after eight months, shall be valid, we must suppose that the Legislature meant, in the last case, those deeds, which Courts were always in the habit of admitting to record, under their common law power.

In the revision of 1819, there is a clear legislative exposition of the act of 1813. The first section is re-enacted verbatim, except with the omission of the words, "within the period," &c.; making the section read thus; "The clerks are authorised, at any time, to admit to record deeds," &c.; thus shewing the idea of the Legislature, that a law was necessary to expunge those words, with this Court is asked to expunge by construction; and which must be expunged, in some way, before that power can be considered unlimited as to time, which they expressly limit to eight months.

The 5th section of the law of 1813 directs, that after the 1st of November, 1814, deeds shall be recorded in the County and Corporation Courts only. This arrested the progress of many deeds, which had been lodged and partly proved, in the General Court, District Courts, and Superior Courts. To remedy this evil, the act of 1814, (Sessions Acts, p. 75,) enacts, that it shall be lawful for the General Court and the several Superior Courts of law, to receive further proof of such deeds, and to admit the same to record. It was insisted by the counsel for the appellants, that this law strengthened the construction he contended for; and he asked, might not these deeds, though over eight months old, be proved and recorded under the 7th section of the law of 1813? It would seem that the Legislature thought not; else, why pass another law, providing for their probate and admission to record? And it is very clear to me, that under this last law, the clerks of the General and Superior Courts cannot receive proof of these deeds in their offices, because the law expressly confines the probate to those Courts themselves. Why the 432 law, *either in this case, or that of deeds over eight months old, should confine the probate to the Courts, in exclusion of the clerks, it might be difficult to say; nor can the reason be sought after, where the law is clear. In such cases, it is enough for the Judge to say ita lex. We decided, very lately, a case under this same law of 1813, which exemplifies this doctrine. The 5th section directs, that deeds respecting the title of personal property, shall be recorded in the Court of that county, in which the property shall remain. No doubt, the word corporation was omitted by accident; and the revision of 1819 supplied it. Yet, as it was not in the law, we decided without hesitation, that a deed for slaves, recorded in the Corporation Court of Richmond, where all the parties lived, and where a recording was best for every purpose of notice, was void as to creditors; and this upon the ground, that the law being clear, we had nothing to do with the reason or propriety of it.

Upon this view of the case, I am of opinion, that the deed, as to the plaintiffs who are judgment creditors, is to be taken as an unrecorded deed, and void. Being against the appellants on this ground, it is unnecessary to consider the question of fraud.

I think the decree of the Court below, should be affirmed.

JUDGE COALTER.

The act of 1813, ch. 10, provides by the first section, that the clerks of the several county and corporation Courts, and their deputies, be authorised and required to admit to record, at any time within the period, and in the form now required by law, any conveyance, either on the acknowledgment of the party, or the proof on oath by the legal number of witnesses thereto, &c.; and that any conveyance, so recorded, shall have the same legal validity, &c. as if proved in open Court.

The 3d section requires the clerks on the first day of every term, to return to the Court a correct list of all conveyances 433 *by them admitted to record, in manner aforesaid, since the term last preceding; specifying therein, the proof or acknowledgment of such conveyances, &c. and a description of the conveyance, by the names of the parties thereto, &c.; and when the list has been inspected by the Court, it is to be inserted in the minutes, &c.

The 7th section provides, that any conveyance which shall hereafter be recorded, after the expiration of the time now allowed by law for recording the same, shall take effect and be valid in law, as to creditors and subsequent purchasers, from the time of such recording, and from that time only.

In this case, the deed, under which the appellant claims, was executed on the 1st of September, 1817, and was proved and recorded in the clerk's office, on the oath of three witnesses, on the 15th of February, 1819, (a few days before the passage of the act of 1819, on this subject;) and the question is, whether it is a deed duly recorded?

This act is amendatory of the act of 1792, regulating conveyances; and the first two sections of those acts, read together, would be this; that no estate of inheritance, &c. shall be conveyed, unless by deed, &c.; nor shall such conveyance be good against a purchaser, &c. unless it be acknowledged by the party, or proved by three witnesses, before the Court, or in the clerk's office, before the clerk or his deputy, of that county, city, or corporation, where the land lies, and within eight months after the time of sealing or delivery.

Had the act of 1813, contained no other provision, than is found in the 1st and 3d sections, it would have been so read and construed; and then this deed, whether proved after the eight months, either before the Court or in the clerk's office, would not have been good against the creditors. The clerk was simply invested with the same power, that the Court before had, of taking the acknowledgment on proof, and admitting the deed to record. The power in neither could be called judicial, in 434 the strict sense; for, *there was no day given to any party interested in contesting the regularity of the proceedings; nor would they be precluded from doing so thereafter. The object was, to relieve the Court during term time, of the pressure at the clerk's table in taking proof and acknowledgment of deeds, which was always done by the clerk as a matter of course, without any application to the Court. It was, in short, to enable him to do in the office, what he was in the constant habit of doing at the clerk's table, without the interference or even knowledge of the Court, until it was announced in reading the minutes. The publicity given to the business by its being done in Court, and read in the minutes, was supplied by the list directed in the 3d section. So far as this goes, then, the plain object and effect of the law was to give the clerk in the office, the same power as the clerk in the Court.

Suppose the law had stopped here, and that at a succeeding session, the 7th section had been enacted, as a distinct law. What would have been its construction? It seems to me, we would have said this: The Legislature, in the laws previous to that of 1785, (from which the act of 1792 was taken,) had prohibited the Courts from admitting to record deeds not acknowledged or proved within the time limited; notwithstanding which, it had frequently happened that deeds were so recorded, and the Legislature had, from time to time, been called on to legalize these transactions, as will be seen in the laws of 1705, 1710, and 1748, on this subject, and I believe, others; and therefore, to prevent future applications and difficulties on this subject, and the injustice of legalizing deeds not recorded in time, whereby a retrospective operation would be given to them, the law wisely intended to provide a general and equitable rule on the subject; to wit, that as the parties, where the eight months had expired before it was convenient to have the deed recorded, might execute and receive a new deed, and as the old deed is still good between them, it may be admitted to record, so as to be preserved 435 as to *them, and to have the same effect as to purchasers and creditors, as if a new deed had then been executed.

But it is asked, how, or when it is to be recorded, how proved, &c.? No jurisdiction is given by the act to any one, to take the acknowledgment and proof, or to record it. The acts, both as to the power of the Court and clerk, restrict the recording and taking proof, &c. to deeds executed and delivered within eight months.

The reasonable, and indeed the only fair construction that could be given to it, it seems to me, would be this; that any conveyance which shall hereafter be recorded (not in any Court whatever, but) in the Court of the county where the land lies, after the expiration of the time now allowed by law, &c., by the authority having power to take the acknowledgment and proof of deeds, and to record the same, shall take effect, and be valid in law, &c. And that this would have been the sound construction, had the matter of this 7th section been the subject of a distinct act, seems to me not only manifest from the reason and nature of the thing, but from the legislative construction put on the act when brought into one by the revision of 1819. Why should the clerk have authority to take proof of, and record a deed, which was to have a retrospective effect, and not one which was merely to operate from the day on which it was recorded? The eight months might run out, if it could not be done in the clerk's office, in the one case, so as to injure the party; and so, in the other, as he could not get his witnesses until the day after the eight months if he must wait for a Court, some one may purchase, &c., and he may thus be injured. They both seem to stand on the same ground of expedience, and as the act does not speak of a recording by order of Court, any more than in the clerk's office, it must have reference to both modes, and impliedly to extend the power of those having a right to take proof, &c. and to record within the time, &c. to the case of deeds out of date.

436 *But if this would be the construction, had this provision in the law been enacted at a subsequent session, I cannot see why it shall not be so construed in the present case.

The 7th section seems to speak this language; that though deeds, if they are to operate retrospectively, can only now be acknowledged or proved and recorded within eight months, by the County Courts, or by the clerks in their offices, as provided by this act; yet they may hereafter be recorded, after the expiration of the time, &c. in the same manner as deeds are to be recorded within the time, &c.; but such deeds shall only take effect and be valid as to creditors, &c. from the time of such recording.

The practice, so far as we may judge from this case, may have been, and probably has been, to record deeds, whether out of date or not, by proof, &c. in the clerk's office; and as that is clearly now the law, and was so a few days after this deed was recorded, it is expedient to adopt this construction if it can be done, as I think it may.

I think, therefore, that the deed is to be taken as duly recorded.

It is not necessary to give an opinion on the other point, as by the opinion of the majority, this seems to settle the question.

JUDGE CABELL concurred with JUDGE CARR, and the decree was affirmed.*

Recordation Not Necessary at Common Law.—The common law does not require any deed or writing in order to pass the title to land, and, of course, therefore, knows nothing of the doctrine of registration. The only notoriety which it demands in such transactions, is livery of seisin for estates of freehold, and entry for estates for years. 2 Min. Insts. (4th Ed.) 987; Braxton v. Bell, 92 Va. 229, 23 S. E. Rep. 289.

Recordation Required by Statute.—In Virginia and West Virginia, the legislature has been alive to the advantages of a general registration of all conveyances of, lienon, and transactions affecting lands, and the system has been gradually perfected, until it is believed there is nothing touching the title to lands which it concerns a purchaser or creditor to know, which is not required to be set down in the registry of the county or corporation where the land is, and that registry is made so convenient of access that for one to be deceived argues, in general, a negligence so gross as to exclude sympathy for the sufferer. 3 Min. Insts. (4th Ed.) 989.

II. INSTRUMENTS ENTITLED TO RECORD.

1. INSTRUMENTS RELATING TO REAL PROPERTY.

a. In General.—The practice of recording instruments being purely of statutory origin, it follows that no instrument need be recorded in the absence of a statute requiring it, and, as will be seen hereafter, the recording of an instrument not required or entitled to be recorded has no effect whatever. In Virginia and West Virginia almost every kind of instrument which could affect real property in any way is required to be recorded. Thus deeds of conveyance, deeds of trust, mortgages, contracts to convey, the report of commissioners in condemnation proceedings, and many other instruments which affect real property, are expressly required to be recorded, and their recordation is consequently notice to creditors and purchasers. Heermans v. Montague, 2 Va. Dec. 6; Chesapeake, etc., Ry. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 40 S. E. Rep. 633; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407; Dobyns v. Waring, 82 Va. 159; Guerrant v. Anderson, 4 Rand. 208; Pace v. Moorman, 99 Va. 246, 37 S. E. Rep. 911.

An undelivered deed filed as an escrow in the proceedings of a court of equity, administering a trust fund belonging to a married woman and her infant children, is not within the terms or intentment of the registry act. Trout v. Warwick, 77 Va. 731.

b. Conveyances of Equitable Title.—It has been held in Virginia that recording acts are applicable to conveyances of the legal title only, and are not applicable to a conveyance of the equitable title. Doswell v. Buchanan, 8 Leigh 365, 23 Am. Dec. 280; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78; Briscoe v. Ashby, 24 Gratt. 454. It is otherwise in West

c. Mortgages and Deeds of Trust.

In General.—Mortgages and deeds of trust conveying real estate are required to be recorded in order to be good against creditors and purchasers of the grantor. Va. Code, § 2468; W. Va. Code, § 5, ch. 74; Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. Rep. 813; Dever v. Jordon, 1 Va. Dec. 124; Solenburger v. Duval, 1 Va. Dec. 100; Weinberg v. Rempe, 15 W. Va. 380; Heermans v. Montague, 3 Va. Dec. 6.

Under statutes avoiding unrecorded deeds of trust as to subsequent judgment creditors, a trust deed will be void as to such creditors, notwithstanding the trust had been executed by a sale and conveyance of the property; for in this respect the statutes of registration make no distinction between executed and unexecuted trusts, but are designed to give notice of the state of the title as affected by successive alienations, as well as by incumbrances. Campbell v. Nonpareil Fire-Brick, etc., Co., 75 Va. 291.

Equitable Mortgage.—A paper intended for a deed of trust, conveying land to secure a debt, signed by the grantor, but without a seal, though not effectual as a deed of trust at law, is an equitable mortgage, enforceable in equity, and may be recorded under Code W. Va. 1868, ch. 74, § 4, and when recorded, is a lien valid against subsequent purchasers and creditors. Atkinson v. Miller, 84 W. Va. 115, 11 S. E. Rep. 1007.

d. Contracts for Sale of Land.—It was formerly held that the recording acts requiring deeds to be recorded did not apply to parol or written contracts for the sale of land, and that one in possession of land under such a contract was protected against creditors and purchasers from his grantor, though the contract was not recorded. Floyd v. Harding, 28 Gratt. 401; Burkholder v. Ludlam, 30 Gratt. 255, and note; March, Price & Co. v. Chambers, 30 Gratt. 290, and note; Long v. Mfg. Co., 30 Gratt. 635; Trout v. Warwick, 77 Va. 731; Halsey v. Peters, 79 Va. 60; Bowman v. Hicks, 80 Va. 806; Powell v. Bell, 81 Va. 222; Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 631, 13 S. E. Rep. 71; Reynolds v. Necessary, 88 Va. 156, 13 S. E. Rep. 348; Frame v. Frame, 32 W. Va. 478, 9 S. E. Rep. 901. See 2 Minors Insts. (4th Ed.) 851 et seq.; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407; Eldson v. Huff, 29 Gratt. 341; Anderson v. Nagle, 13 W. Va. 105, 107; Delaplain v. Wilkinson, 17 W. Va. 263, 264, 267; Snyder v. Martin, 17 W. Va. 289, 290, 300; Pack v. Hanebarger, 17 W. Va. 324, 338; Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 158, 14 S. E. Rep. 463.

But this rule is changed by § 2463 of the Va. Code, which provides that "every contract not in writing, made in respect to real estate, or goods and chattels, in consideration of marriage, or made for the conveyance or sale of real estate on a term therein of more than five years, shall be void, both at law or in equity, as to purchasers for valuable consideration without notice and creditors," and by § 2464 which provides that if the contract is in writing it must be recorded in order to be good against creditors and purchasers. Thorn v. Phares, 35 W. Va. 771, 14 S. E. Rep. 399; Holt v. Haynes, 1 Va. Dec. 201; Young v. Devries, 31 Gratt. 304.

e. Powers of Attorney.—It seems that a power of attorney for conveyance of lands falls within the letter and spirit of recording acts. Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110, 50 Am. Dec. 108. See W. Va. Code, § 1, ch. 73, which provides that "a power of attorney may be admitted to record in any court."

2. INSTRUMENTS RELATING TO PERSONAL PROPERTY.

a. In General.—The provisions for recording conveyances of land will not be construed as applicable to personally or choses in action, and in the absence of an express statutory requirement, transfers of personally need not be recorded. While in Virginia and West Virginia the recording acts have not been extended to embrace absolute sale of personal property, they do embrace reservations of title to and chattel mortgages thereof. Curtin v. Isaacs, 36 W. Va. 301, 15 S. E. Rep. 171; Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. Rep. 685; Kirkland v. Brune, 31 Gratt. 123; Gregg v. Sloan, 76 Va. 500; Bank v. Gettinger, 3 W. Va. 317; Hundley v. Colloway, 45 W. Va. 516, 31 S. E. Rep. 937; Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 135; Callahan v. Young, 90 Va. 574, 19 S. E. Rep. 163.

b. Bills of Sale.—Contracts for the sale of personally or absolute bills of sale thereof, unless made in consideration of marriage, are not required to be recorded either in Virginia or West Virginia, and if recorded, such recordation is, of course, not notice to creditors and purchasers. W. Va. Code, § 4, ch. 74; Va. Code §§ 2463, 2464, 2465; Braxton v. Bell, 92 Va. 220, 23 S. E. Rep. 239.

c. Mortgages and Deeds of Trust.—Deeds of trust or mortgages upon goods and chattels are required to be recorded by the recording acts of both Virginia and West Virginia. Va. Code § 2465; W. Va. Code, § 5, ch. 74; Kirkland v. Brune, 31 Gratt. 123; Gregg v. Sloan, 76 Va. 500; Bank v. Gettinger, 3 W. Va. 317; Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 135; Curtin v. Isaacson, 36 W. Va. 301, 15 S. E. Rep. 171; Hardaway v. Jones, 100 Va. 481, 41 S. E. Rep. 957; McCormick v. Atkinson, 78 Va. 8; Hundley v. Calloway, 45 W. Va. 516, 31 S. E. Rep. 937; Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. Rep. 685; Guerrant v. Anderson, 4 Rand. 208. It has been held in several cases, however, that the recording acts requiring deeds of trust and mortgages of goods and chattels to be recorded, only to refer to and include personal property which is visible, tangible or movable. They do not include a chose in action, such as a debt, or claim on another for money due, and the assignment of such a debt or claim for value, though not recorded, is good against creditors and purchasers. Kirkland v. Brune, 31 Gratt. 123; Gregg v. Sloan, 76 Va. 500; Bank v. Gettinger, 3 W. Va. 317.

Deed Intended as a Mortgage is a Mortgage.—A writing importing an absolute sale of chattels, but in fact intended only to secure a debt is a mortgage, and must be recorded as a mortgage of chattels in order to be good against creditors and purchasers without notice. Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. Rep. 685. See monographic note on "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197.

d. Reservations of Title.—Before the passage of the act now embodied in § 2462 of the Virginia Code, reservations of title to personal property were not required to be recorded in order to be good against the creditors of the vendee. Old Dominion Steamship Co. v. Burckhardt, 31 Gratt. 664; McComb v. Donald, 82 Va. 903, 5 S. E. Rep. 558. But under that section recording is necessary in order for the reservation of title to have effect as against creditors of and purchasers from the vendee. Callahan v. Young, 90 Va. 574, 19 S. E. Rep. 163; Arbuckle Bros. v. Gates, 95 Va. 303, 30 S. E. Rep. 496; Hash v. Lore, 88 Va. 716, 14 S. E. Rep. 365. The provision of § 3, ch. 74 of the Code of West Virginia is to the same effect. But it has been held that the reservation of title need not be acknowledged in order to be entitled to record under this statute. Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 135.

e. Assignments of Chose in Action.—Assignments of choses in action are not required to be recorded, and such recordation will not charge third persons with constructive notice. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va.

604; Kirkland v. Brune, 81 Gratt. 126; Gregg v. Sloan, 76 Va. 500; Bank v. Gettinger, 8 W. Va. 817.

3. LIS PENDENS.—See monographic note on "Lis Pendens" appended to Stoutt v. Vause, 1 Rob. 169. The common-law rule of lis pendens, is that a pendente lite purchaser from a party to the suit, of the subject matter thereof, takes it subject to any decree rendered against his vendor in that suit. Because of the harsh operation of this rule upon bona fide purchasers, statutes have been enacted in most of the states with a view to protect purchasers who purchase in good faith. These statutes, which have been enacted in Virginia and West Virginia, provide, in substance, that the lien of the lis pendens shall not bind or affect a purchaser of real estate without notice, unless a memorandum setting forth the title of the cause, the court in which it is pending, the general object of the suit, the location and quantity of the land, and the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected, is filed with the clerk of the county court of the county in which the land is situated. Where the lis pendens is not docketed as provided by these statutes, it is well settled that a purchaser without notice of the pendency of the suit takes a good title. § 18, ch. 139, W. Va. Code; § 3566, Va. Code; Hurn v. Keller, 79 Va. 415; Easley v. Barksdale, 75 Va. 280; Osborn v. Glasscock, 39 W. Va. 749, 20 S. E. Rep. 702; Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103; Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 292; DeCamp v. Carnahan, 26 W. Va. 839.

4. JUDGMENTS.—See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 426.

A judgment is not a lien on real estate as against subsequent purchasers for value and without notice, unless it is docketed in the mode and within the time prescribed by the statute. Va. Code 1873, ch. 183, § 8; W. Va. Code, ch. 139, § 7; Gurnee v. Johnson, 77 Va. 713; Duncan v. Custard, 24 W. Va. 787; Renick v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 367; Hill v. Rixey, 26 Gratt. 77; Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 604. See also, Bankers' Loan, etc., Co. v. Blair, 99 Va. 606, 39 S. E. Rep. 331.

III. PLACE OF RECORDATION.

1. INSTRUMENTS RELATING TO REAL PROPERTY.

County Where Land Lies.—The recording acts provide that the deed must be admitted to record in the clerk's office of the county in which the land lies. It is held that this statute is mandatory and that the clerk has no authority to admit a deed to record which conveys land outside of his county. Pollard v. Lively, 2 Gratt. 216; Horsley v. Garth, 2 Gratt. 471.

Land Lying in Different Counties.—An instrument conveying or affecting separate and distinct tracts of land lying in different counties must be recorded in each of such counties; recording in but one of them will be constructive notice only as to the tract lying in that county. Where distinct but adjacent tracts of land lying in different counties are conveyed by one deed, the recording of the deed in only one of the counties is not effectual in regard to the land lying in the other county. Thus where a navigable stream which forms the dividing line between two counties separated the land of a proprietor so as to throw part thereof in one county and part in another, it was held that such parts must be treated as separate tracts and a transfer thereof must be recorded in both counties. Horsley v. Garth, 2 Gratt. 471, 44 Am. Dec. 493.

Deed to Land near City of Richmond.—It was held that the clerk's office of the chancery court of the city of Richmond was the proper office for the recording of deeds conveying land lying within one mile of the city of Richmond on the north side of James river, though outside of the city limits. Burgess v. Belvin, 33 Gratt. 683.

2. INSTRUMENTS RELATING TO PERSONAL PROPERTY.

The Removal of Property to Another County.—Recordation in County to Which Removal is Made.—When the subject of a chattel mortgage is removed from the county in which the mortgage is recorded to another county, the mortgage must be recorded in the latter county within three months after the removal in West Virginia (W. Va. Code, ch. 75, § 7) and within one year from the date of removal in Virginia (Code 1867, § 2468). In construing the West Virginia statute in Hundley v. Calloway, 45 W. Va. 416, 31 S. E. Rep. 937, the court held, that where a deed of trust on personal property was recorded in two counties, and the property was then moved to a third county, and the deed of trust was recorded there, it was incumbent upon a purchaser of the property to show that he purchased it in the third county more than three months prior to the recordation of the deed in that county, and that he purchased without notice of the deed of trust.

IV. TIME OF RECORDATION.

An instrument not recorded within the time prescribed by statute is void as against creditors; and for the purpose of determining whether it has been duly recorded, it will be presumed to have been delivered at its date, unless the contrary appears by the record. Harvey v. Alexander, 1 Rand. 219, 10 Am. Dec. 519.

It was held in Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call 123, that a deed reacknowledged within eight months, from its date, and recorded within four months from the reacknowledgment, was good from the date of the reacknowledgment, although where more than eight months elapsed after the deed was first executed before it was recorded.

V. PREREQUISITES TO RECORDATION.

1. SIGNING, SEALING AND DELIVERY.—Of course the instrument is not notice to third persons unless it be sufficiently executed by signing, sealing and delivery, where these are essential to its validity. No attempt will be here made however, to classify the cases wherein instruments have been held sufficient or insufficient as notice for lack of these essentials. For cases on this point reference is made to the monographic notes treating of the particular instruments whose validity was questioned on this ground. See monographic note on "Deeds of Trust" appended to Cadwallader v. Mason, Wythe 188; "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197; "Deeds" appended to Flott v. Com., 12 Gratt. 564; "Assignments for the Benefit of Creditors" appended to French v. Townes, 10 Gratt. 513.

2. DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY CONVEYED OR AFFECTED.—As to description necessary in particular instruments, see monographic notes on "Deeds of Trust" appended to Cadwallader v. Mason, Wythe 188; "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197; "Deeds" appended to Flott v. Com., 12 Gratt. 564; "Assignments for Benefit of Creditors" appended to French v. Townes, 10 Gratt. 513.

Must Put Third Persons on Enquiry.—In order for the recordation of an instrument to amount to constructive notice to creditors, and purchasers, the description of the property conveyed must be such as to enable them, aided by the inquiries, which the instrument suggests, to identify the property. The recorded instrument is sufficient to operate as constructive notice under the registry laws if the property be so described or identified that a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer would have the means of ascertaining with accuracy what and where it was, and the language used be such that, if he should examine the instrument itself, he would obtain thereby actual notice of all rights which were intended to be created or conferred by it. Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 36, 34 S. E. Rep. 890.

Where Enquiry Reveals Nothing.—If a purchaser has knowledge of any fact or circumstance sufficient to put him upon enquiry as to the existence of some right or title in conflict with that which he is about to purchase, and makes the enquiry suggested by such circumstances, and anything detrimental to the right he is about to acquire, is concealed or withheld from him, he cannot be affected by an undisclosed encumbrance or latent equity. Kelly v. Land Co., 97 Va. 227, 33 S. E. Rep. 598.

Examples.—A deed of trust on "four mules," which does not give their color, sex, size, age, from whom purchased, nor state where or in whose possession they are, nor mention the residence of the grantor, the trustee, or the beneficiary therein, does not give constructive notice under § 2468 of the Code to innocent third persons. "In no case that we have seen has the recordation of a deed of trust been held to be constructive notice which contained no description of the animals conveyed except their number, which did not state in whose possession the property was or where it was located or might be found, or where any party to the deed resided." Hardaway v. Jones, 100 Va. 481, 41 S. E. Rep. 957.

The registry of a deed purporting to convey "all the estate, both real and personal," to which the grantor is entitled at the time of the conveyance is not notice to a subsequent purchaser of the existence of the deed; nor would notice in point of fact of the existence and contents of such deed affect a purchaser, unless he had further notice that the property purchased by him was embraced by the provision of the deed. Mundy v. Vawter, 8 Gratt. 518; Warren v. Syme, 7 W. Va. 474.

A deed conveying "all the right, title and interest of R. V. M. and wife, in and to the real estate lying in the county of Henrico, of which R. M. died seised and possessed," and duly recorded, contains a sufficient description of the property to put subsequent purchasers on notice, under the registry laws. Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 36, 34 S. E. Rep. 890.

It has been held that the grantee in a quitclaim deed, with covenant of special warranty, which purports to convey "such interest only as they (the grantors) now have, whatever that may be" takes in subordination to a prior unrecorded deed, and such quitclaim deed cannot be introduced in evidence to defeat the title deduced under such prior unrecorded deed. Va. & Tenn. Coal & Iron Co. v. Fields, 94 Va. 102, 26 S. E. Rep. 426.

In Banker's Loan, etc., Co. v. Blair, 99 Va. 606, 39 S. E. Rep. 231, it was held that the docketing and indexing of a judgment in the name of "Mrs. John Smith," was no notice of a judgment against Mary Smith, who was in fact the wife of John Smith.

8. ACKNOWLEDGMENT OR PROOF OF EXECUTION.—See monographic note on "Acknowledgments" appended to Tallaferrero v. Pryor, 12 Gratt. 277.

Under the statutes, a valid acknowledgment or proof of execution is a prerequisite to the registration of an instrument, and the recording of an unacknowledged or defectively acknowledged instrument has no effect whatever. Moore v. Auditor, 3 Hen. & M. 332; Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 92; Nichol- son v. Gloucester Charity School, 98 Va. 101, 24 S. E. Rep. 899; Iron Belt Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Groves, 96 Va. 138, 31 S. E. Rep. 23; Fleming v. Ervin, 6 W. Va. 215; Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 656; Parkersburg Nat. Bk. v. Neal, 28 W. Va. 744; Abney v. Ohio Lumber, etc., Co., 46 W. Va. 446, 33 S. E. Rep. 256; Cox v. Wayt, 36 W. Va. 807; Carper v. McDowell, 5 Gratt. 333; Davis v. Beazley, 76 Va. 491; Robinson v. Pitzer, 3 W. Va. 335.

It has been held that it is not necessary that a contract reserving to the seller of chattels, title until payment shall be acknowledged, to be recorded under § 3, ch. 74 of the Code of 1899. Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 135.

4. PREPAYMENT OF TAX.—The Virginia statute providing that no deed shall be admitted to record until the tax thereon is paid is directory merely; the clerk may refuse to admit the deed to record until the tax is paid, but if he chooses to admit it without prepayment he assumes the tax and the admission to record is valid. Lucas v. Claffin, 76 Va. 269.

But a clerk is not bound to admit to record a deed which is not stamped as is required by law. Hill v. Rixey, 26 Gratt. 80.

VI. MAKING THE RECORD.

Instrument Must Be Kept for Recordation during Office Hours.—In order that an instrument may be filed for record it must be carried to the recording clerk's office and left with the clerk for the purpose of having it recorded. Going to the clerk's office just before midnight, and he not being there, taking it to his house just before sunrise the next morning and personally delivering it to him, stating the other attempt, does not make it good as a recorded deed from such previous day but only from the time of its actual delivery to the clerk. Horsley v. Garth, 2 Gratt. 471, 44 Am. Dec. 398.

Admission of Deed to Record Has Same Effect as Recordation.—The admission of a deed to record has the same effect as if the deed were actually spread on the deed book, and a clerk who has once duly admitted a deed to record has no more power to recall his act than he would have to strike from the deed book a deed duly engrossed thereon. Mercantile Co-Operative Bank v. Brown, 96 Va. 614, 33 S. E. Rep. 64.

Leaving Instrument with Clerk Sufficient.—When a contract selling chattels, and reserving title until payment is left with the clerk of the county court to be recorded, it is deemed that its record is complete, and the fact that it is recorded in the "miscellaneous record book" will not invalidate its recordation. Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 135.

By Clerk Who is an Interested Party.—The clerk acts to a certain extent judicially in taking and certifying acknowledgments of deeds and other writings in his office and admitting them to record, and therefore in accordance with the maxim that no man can be a judge in his own cause, the clerk is not allowed to perform any of those acts where his private interest might conflict with his duty to third parties and the public. Davis v. Sims, 1 Va. Dec. 390.

But a clerk who counseled a grantor in preparing an assignment, and who is trustee therein, may validly admit it to record, such act being merely ministerial. Paul v. Baugh, 86 Va. 955, 9 S. E. Rep. 329.

Recordation by Clerk after Ordinance of Secession.—The recordation of a deed by a clerk of a county court, who continued to exercise his office after the state had passed the ordinance of secession, but while the country was under the military power of the confederates, was a valid recordation, and will be so recognized in all judicial proceedings. Henning v. Fisher, 6 W. Va. 228.

Deed Need Not Be Indexed.—The recordation of a deed, though not indexed is notice to subsequent purchasers; for while the index is the key to the deed books, it is not essential to registry. Va. Bldg. etc., Co. v. Glenn, 99 Va. 480, 39 S. E. Rep. 136; Old Dom. Gran. Co. v. Clarke, 28 Gratt. 617.

Judgments Must Be Indexed.—Before the passage of § 3561, Va. Code, it had been held, in Old Dominion Granite Co. v. Clarke, 28 Gratt. 617, that the indexing was no part of the docketing of the judgment. It is now expressly provided by § 3561 that no judgment shall be regarded as docketed as to any defendant in whose name it is not so indexed. Fulkerson v. Taylor, 100 Va. 426, 41 S. E. Rep. 863; Callahan v. Young, 90 Va. 574, 19 S. E. Rep. 163.

An allegation in a bill that a judgment sought to be enforced was duly docketed is a sufficient allegation of the indexing of the judgment as required by § 3561 of the Code, but if the fact of indexing be put in issue it must be proved, and it would seem that this is not sufficiently done by the mere production of an abstract of the judgment which does not certify that it was duly docketed, and makes no reference to the indexing. Fulkerson v. Taylor, 100 Va. 426, 41 S. E. Rep. 863.

Mandamus Lies to Compel Clerk to Admit Instrument to Record.—Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the clerk to admit to record an instrument entitled to record. Delaney v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 266; Randolph Justices v. Stalnaker, 13 Gratt. 523; Manns v. Glvens, 7 Leigh 689; Dawson v. Thruston, 2 Hen. & M. 132; Callahan v. Young, 90 Va. 574, 19 S. E. Rep. 163.

Statutes Curing Defective Recordation.—A statute which undertakes to give a retrospective effect to an invalid recordation, and thus divert or interfere with the rights of creditors and purchasers, is, to say the least, of doubtful policy; and although the words of a statute are broad enough in their literal extent to comprehend existing cases, they may be construed as applicable only to cases that may thereafter arise, unless a contrary intention is unequivocally expressed therein. Campbell v. Nonpareil F. B. & K. Co., 75 Va. 291.

VII. FAILURE TO RECORD AS AFFECTING VALIDITY OF INSTRUMENT.

1. IN GENERAL.—The object of the recording acts being to protect certain specified classes of persons against fraud, failure to record will not, in the absence of an express provision to that effect, render the instrument void and inoperative to convey the legal title; the unrecorded instrument is valid against every one except the classes included within the terms of the statute. Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 89 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874. Of course it is competent for the legislature to provide that the recording of an instrument shall be part of its execution, and where there is a statute so providing, the title does not pass until the instrument is recorded. In Virginia there is a statute which provides that recordation is necessary to the validity of a conveyance by a married woman, consequently the deed of a married woman conveys no estate until it is duly admitted to record. Rorer v. Roanoke National Bank, 83 Va. 589, 4 S. E. Rep. 820; Bldg., etc., Co. v. Fray, 96 Va. 559, 32 S. E. Rep. 58.

Unavoidable Circumstances No Excuse.—As to those classes of persons embraced within the terms of the recording acts, a prior unrecorded conveyance is void, and this legal consequence of a failure to record will not be affected by the fact that such failure was due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the grantee's control. Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call 125; Harvey v. Alexander, 1 Rand. 219; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407.

2. AS AGAINST GRANTOR AND HIS REPRESENTATIVES.—Of course the instrument is good against the grantor, his heirs and personal representatives without recordation. Recordation is only necessary as against creditors and purchasers. Wade v. Greenwood, 2 Rob. 474; Guerrant v. Anderson, 4 Rand. 208; Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 93; Thomas v. Stuart, 91 Va. 604, 23 S. E. Rep. 511. See Building, etc., Co. v. Fray, 96 Va. 559, 32 S. E. Rep. 58; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78; Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 89 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874; Morgan v. Snodgrass, 49 W. Va. 387, 38 S. E. Rep. 695.

3. AS AGAINST PURCHASERS AND CREDITORS.

a. Purchasers.—The Virginia and West Virginia registry laws declare that a failure to record the instrument avoids it as to purchasers and creditors. In construing these acts it has been held that a purchaser is one who takes the estate for a valuable consideration, but it need not be money, paid at the time; it is well settled that a pre-existing debt is a sufficient consideration to protect a purchaser. Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153, and foot-note; Exchange Bank v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 739, and foot-note; Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 292; Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 400, 31 S. E. Rep. 818; Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Gratt. 427; Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 404; Witz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 230, 2 S. E. Rep. 33; Davis v. Miller, 14 Gratt. 16.

Grantee in Quitclaim Deed.—It is a general rule that one claiming under a quitclaim deed is not a purchaser for value, within the meaning of the recording acts, and that he takes subject to a prior deed though it be unrecorded. Va., etc., Coal, etc., Co. v. Fields, 94 Va. 102, 26 S. E. Rep. 426.

Subsequent Mortgagees.—Subsequent mortgagees of an estate are purchasers within the meaning of the recording acts. Weinberg v. Rempe, 15 W. Va. 339.

Trustee in Deed of Trust.—It is well settled that a trustee in a deed of trust to secure debts is a purchaser for value within the meaning of the recording acts; but whether or not he is a purchaser without notice depends on the circumstances of the case. See monographic note on "Deeds of Trust" appended to Cadwalader v. Mason, Wythe 188.

One Put on Inquiry.—One is considered a purchaser with notice of another's equity, whenever he has such notice of such facts as would put him on inquiry; for the law imputes to a person knowledge of facts, of which the exercise of common prudence and ordinary diligence must have apprised him. Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594.

Purchasers of Different Tracts from Same Vendor.—The provision of § 5, ch. 114 of the Code of 1873, that every deed, etc., "shall be void as to creditors, and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, until and except from the time it is duly admitted to record," etc., does not apply to purchasers of different tracts of land from the same vendor but refers only to "subsequent purchasers" of the same subject, as that embraced in the instrument declared to be void. Harman v. Oberdorfer, 33 Gratt. 497.

b. Creditors.—An unrecorded deed is void as to all creditors who, but for the deed, would have had a right to subject the property conveyed to their debts, whether such debts were contracted before or after such deed. The word "subsequent" in § 2465 of the Code applies to purchasers only. Price v. Wall, 97 Va. 334, 33 S. E. Rep. 599.

The recording acts only protect creditors who have affected a lien on the conveying debtor's property by attachment, judgment or otherwise, before the recordation of the prior conveyance. Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 153; McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615; Dulaney v. Willis, 95 Va. 606, 39 S. E. Rep. 334.

4. AS AGAINST THIRD PERSONS WITH NOTICE.—Purchasers who take with notice of a prior unrecorded conveyance, will not be entitled to the protection of the recording acts. The purpose of such act is to prevent fraud upon persons subsequently contemplating the acquisition of an interest in the property conveyed or affected by placing the means of obtaining information of prior alienations within their reach. And if a prospective purchaser has actual notice of a prior conveyance of the property, the necessity for recording is, as to him, removed, for it cannot be said that a prior conveyance of which he has knowledge can be employed in fraud of him. Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 385; McClure v. Thistle, 2 Gratt. 182; Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518; Long v. Weller, 29 Gratt. 347; Wood v. Krebbs, 30 Gratt. 708; Vest v. Michie, 31 Gratt. 149; Newman v. Chapman, 3 Rand. 98; Smith v. Proffitt, 23 Va. 338; National, etc., Assoc. v. Blair, 98 Va. 496, 36 S. E. Rep. 513; Mercantile Bk. v. Brown, 96 Va. 614, 32 S. E. Rep. 64; Cosgray v. Core, 2 W. Va. 353; Cox v. Cox, 5 W. Va. 335; Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594.

A bona fide purchaser from a purchaser with notice is protected by the recording acts, as is also a purchaser with notice from a bona fide purchaser. Lacy v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 313; Claiborne v. Holland, 88 Va. 1046, 14 S. E. Rep. 915.

In Virginia conveyances of land are void as creditors notwithstanding that they have actual notice of a prior unrecorded deed. Guerrant v. Anderson, 4 Rand. 208; Price v. Wall, 97 Va. 334, 33 S. E. Rep. 599; Heermans v. Montague, 2 Va. Dec. 6.

VIII. EFFECT OF RECORDATION AS NOTICE.

1. INSTRUMENTS NOT ENTITLED TO RECORD.—Constructive notice from the record being dependent upon purely statutory provisions, it naturally follows that such effect will not be given to any and every recorded instrument, but only to such as fall within the statute. Therefore, if an instrument be not of a kind authorized by law to be recorded, or if though within the contemplation of the statute, it be not entitled to record because of its defective execution or a failure to comply with some of the prerequisites to recordation, the record thereof will be a mere nullity and will not operate to give constructive notice. Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276; Trout v. Warwick, 77 Va. 781; Braxton v. Bell, 92 Va. 229, 23 S. E. Rep. 289. See monographic note on "Acknowledgments" appended to Tallaferro v. Pryor, 12 Gratt. 277.

2. INSTRUMENTS ENTITLED TO RECORD.

a. Notice to Whom.—The record imparts constructive notice to such persons only as would have been entitled to protection against the conveyance in case it had not been recorded, or, in other words, to such persons as are under a legal obligation to search for it. Lynchburg, etc., B. & L. Co. v. Fellers, 96 Va. 337, 31 S. E. Rep. 505.

The operation of the record as notice is prospective and not retrospective. It is only a subsequent conveyance which defeats a prior unrecorded conveyance, and therefore only persons who acquired their rights subsequently to the registration can be said to be charged with notice of a recorded conveyance. Lynchburg, etc., B. & L. Ass'n v. Fellers, 96 Va. 337, 31 S. E. Rep. 505; Bridgewater Roller Mills Co. v. Strough, 98 Va. 721, 37 S. E. Rep. 290.

It seems that a prior mortgagee is not affected with constructive notice from the record of a subsequent deed or mortgage of the same land; to charge him he must be given actual notice. Bridgewater Roller Mills Co. v. Strough, 98 Va. 721, 37 S. E. Rep. 290.

A record gives constructive notice only to persons in the same line of title, or, in other words, only to persons who must trace their title through the same grantor. Claiborne v. Holland, 88 Va. 1046, 14 S. E. Rep. 915. Thus, where a conveyance of land is not recorded and the grantee therein subsequently conveys to a third person, the record of the latter conveyance is not constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser from the grantor in the prior unrecorded conveyance, since such purchaser does not trace title through such record. Jones v. Byrne, 94 Va. 751, 27 S. E. Rep. 591; Hulvey v. Hulvey, 92 Va. 183, 23 S. E. Rep. 233.

b. Notice of What.—The record of an instrument entitled to registration imparts to such persons as are bound thereby constructive notice of all facts which they could have ascertained by an actual examination of the record, not only of those recited in the record but also of those as to which it reasonably suggests an inquiry and which would be disclosed by such inquiry. A subsequent purchaser is entitled to rely upon the record, and cannot be charged with constructive notice of latent equities of facts not disclosed or suggested by the record itself. Davison v. Waite, 2 Munf. 527; Colquhoun v. Atkinsons, 6 Munf. 550; Bell v. Hammond, 2 Leigh 416; Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518; Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 150; McClanahan v. Siter, 2 Gratt. 280.

Where the property conveyed is not described sufficiently to identify it with reasonable certainty, and there is nothing to put the searcher on inquiry, the record will not give constructive notice of the conveyance. Hardaway v. Jones, 100 Va. 481, 41 S. E. Rep. 967. But the record, although defective as regards the description of the property, will nevertheless operate as notice if sufficient to put a reasonable man on inquiry as to what property was actually intended to be conveyed by it. Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 26, 34 S. E. Rep. 890.

IX. DESTRUCTION OF RECORD.

A grantee in an instrument evidencing a conveyance to him, who has complied with the requirement of the law in effecting the record of the instrument, cannot lose the effect given to such recordation by a subsequent destruction of the record, as by fire or other cause; and in such case, it seems that he is not obliged to record the instrument a second time, or do any other act to notify purchasers, in order to protect his rights acquired thereunder. Armentrout v. Gibbons, 30 Gratt. 683.

Administrators*—Suits against—Misjoinder of Counts.†

—A declaration against an administrator, containing counts charging him in his representative character, combined with other counts charging him in his individual character, is bad on general demurrer.

Same—Same—Counts—Sufficiency.‡—But, where all the counts are laid against the defendant as ad-

Administrators.—See generally, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

†Same—Suits against—Misjoinder of Counts.—It is well settled that promises which charge a man as executor cannot be joined with those which charge him personally; because the judgment in the one case would be de bonis propriis, and in the other de bonis testatoris. Fitzhugh v. Fitzhugh, 11 Gratt. 302, 307, citing the principal case as authority.

‡Same—Same—Joinder of Counts.—In Braxton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt. 55, it is said, "An executor or administrator, may be sued as such, on promises to pay a debt of the estate. A count, on an account stated by a defendant as executor respecting moneys due from the testator, or from the defendant as executor, may be supported, and joined with counts on promises by the testator. Chitty on ministrator, they will be considered as applying to him in his representative character and therefore good; although the declaration, in some of the counts, omits to state that the claim was for money due from the intestate of the defendant.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Prince George county.

Joseph Dudley, administrator of his late wife, Eliza, suing for the benefit of John R. Walke, brought an action of trespass on the case, against Benjamin Cocke, administrator of Archibald Epes, deceased. The declaration contained five counts. 1. General indebitatus assumpsit, for wheat sold by the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, to the defendant's intestate. 2. For money laid out, paid and expended by the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, to the defendant's intestate, and for money had and received. 3. A quantum valebat for the same parcel of wheat, sold and delivered by the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, to the defendant's intestate. 4. This count states, that the defendant's intestate being indebted to the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, for wheat sold, money had and received, and money lent and advanced, died so indebted, and in consideration thereof, the defendant as administrator, assumed to pay, &c. to the plaintiff's intestate, while sole. The fourth count states, that the defendant's intestate, being indebted to the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, for wheat sold, money had and received, and money lent, &c., died so indebted; and in consideration thereof, the defendant, as administrator, assumed to pay the same to the plaintiff's intestate while sole. The last count is an insimul computassent between the plaintiff as administrator aforesaid, and the defendant as administrator of A. Epes, of and concerning divers sums, by the defendant as administrator as aforesaid to the plaintiff as administrator 438 *as aforesaid, due and unpaid, upon which account stated, it was found, &c.

The defendant filed three pleas and a general demurrer.

At the trial, the defendant demurred to the evidence.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Spooner, for the appellee.

August 21. JUDGE CARR.

On the merits, there is no question about this case. The whole estate, both real and personal, being devised to the widow for life, and the crop being made on her land with her slaves, the year after the testator's death, is, without doubt, of right hers, and may be properly recovered by her husband, as her administrator. The evidence stated and demurred to, is abundant to make out the case of the plaintiff. The only doubt in the case is, on the demurrer to the declaration.

It is objected, that there is a misjoinder of counts; the two last being incompatible with the three first, because the three first charge the defendant as administrator of A. Epes, upon promises of the intestate; and the two last charge him upon his own promises; so that upon the first three, the proper judgment would be de bonis testatoris, and on the last two, de bonis propriis. If this be true, if the counts be so framed, that the proper judgment on the first set, would be against the goods of the intestate, and on the second, against the proper goods of the administrator, it must be acknowledged that the declaration is bad on general demurrer.

The first count is a general indebitatus assumpsit for $784 for wheat sold by the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, to the defendant's intestate. The second count 439 is for the "same sum as money laid out, paid and expended, by the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, to the defendant's intestate, and for money had and received. The third count was a quantum valebat for the same parcel of wheat mentioned in the first count, sold and delivered by the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, to the defendant's intestate. The fourth count states, that the defendant's intestate, being indebted to the plaintiff's intestate, while sole, for wheat sold, money had and received, and money lent and advanced, died so indebted, and in consideration thereof, the defendant, as administrator, assumed to pay the same to the plaintiff's intestate; while sole. The last count is an insimul computassent, between the plaintiff as administrator aforesaid, and the defendant as administrator of A. Epes, of and concerning divers sums, by the defendant as administrator as aforesaid, to the plaintiff as administrator as aforesaid, due and unpaid; upon which account stated, it was found that the defendant, as administrator as aforesaid, was indebted to the plaintiff, as administrator as aforesaid, the sum of $784; in consideration thereof, &c.

Now, these counts seem to me all consistent, all seeking the same sum of the defendant, in the same character of administrator, and not at all in his own character. Nor can I see how a judgment in this case, and on this declaration, could be given against him de bonis propriis. This is very different from the case in Hobart, 88, of Harrenden v. Palmer, where the widow was sued as administratrix of her husband, and the declaration charged, that the intestate had bought of the plaintiff gold and silver and pearl, to the amount of 200l., and that after his death, the defendant had bought of him pearl to the amount of 27l., and that upon account, she was found indebted both these sums, and promised to pay. Judgment for the plaintiff, and reversed on error, because the defendant was charged in two manners; one, in her own right, and the other, as administratrix. But here, the whole charge

440 against the defendant is as administrator; and the last two counts "charging a promise of the administrator, and an accounting with him, are frequently thrown in to avoid the statute of limitations; 2 Saund. 117, c., and does not change

Contr. 275; 1 Chitty's Plead. 206; Secar v. Atkinson, 1 H. Bl. 102; 2 Saund. 117, note 2; Whitaker v. Whitaker, 6 John. R. 112; Carter v. Phelps' adm'r, 8 Id. 343. This doctrine has been fully recognized in Virginia, Epes v. Dudley, 5 Rand. 437; Bishop v. Harrison, 2 Leigh 582.
To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Bishop v. Harrison, 2 Leigh 583. See principal case also cited in Kayser v. Disher, 9 Leigh 359.

the character in which the defendant is charged, nor authorise a different judgment. It might have been better, (because more clear and explicit,) to have added in the last count, that they accounted together concerning money due from the intestate of the defendant to the intestate of the plaintiff; but, I cannot think the omission renders the declaration bad.

The judgment ought to be affirmed.

JUDGE GREEN.

William Epes, who died in March or April, 1818, by his will, lent to his wife Eliza, his whole estate, real and personal, during her life. Archibald Epes, the executor of William, managed the estate, which was kept together, and in 1819, received the proceeds of the crop of wheat made that year, and passed it to the credit of his testator's estate. He died, and Benjamin Cocke administered on his estate. Joseph Dudley intermarried with the widow of William Epes; and she dying, J. Dudley administered on her estate, and brought this suit in that character, against Cocke as administrator of Epes, for the purpose of recovering the money which Epes had received for the crop of wheat of 1819.

There are several counts upon the assumpsits of Epes to the intestate of the plaintiff, while sole, and a count upon the assumpsit of Epes's administrator, to the intestate of the plaintiff while sole, to pay the debt of his intestate. The terms of the declaration in this count, are after stating the debt to be due from Epes to the intestate of the plaintiff, "The said defendant, as administrator as aforesaid, in consideration thereof, undertook, &c." There is also a count upon an account stated between the plaintiff as administrator, and the defendant as administrator, concerning divers "sums of money due by the defendant as administrator, to the plaintiff as administrator, upon which the defendant, as administrator, was found indebted to the plaintiff as administrator; in consideration whereof, the defendant, as administrator, promised to pay whenever he, as administrator as aforesaid, should be thereto required."

To this declaration, the defendant demurred generally; and pleaded, first, that his intestate did not assume as alleged. Secondly, that no assets came to his hands. Thirdly, that he had fully administered. To these pleas, there were replications, and issues were joined. The demurrer was overruled; and upon the trial of the issues, the defendant demurred to the evidence, which consisted of an account rendered by the defendant to the plaintiff, in these words:

"Dr. Joseph Dudley in account with Archibald Epes, executor of William Epes."

"1819. By amount of crop of wheat grown on the Bermuda Hundred plantation this year, $784 44. This amount appears to have been placed to the credit of Mr. William Epes's estate by Mr. Archibald Epes; but, it is the wish of the parties, that it should be subject to the order of the Court of Chesterfield.

"B. Cocke, jr. adm'r of Archibald Epes, deceased." And proof was adduced that this crop of wheat was made in 1819, by the hands belonging to the estate of William Epes, and that assets of Archibald Epes came to the hands of the defendant, to the amount of $24,000 or $25,000. The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

There is no doubt upon the merits of the case. The proof is full, that Epes sold wheat to the amount of the plaintiff's demand, which was raised on the plantation, and by the labour of the slaves, and use of the team and tools, devised to Mrs. Epes for her life; the testator dying in the spring of 1818, and the wheat being of the crop of 1819. The whole estate was kept together under the management of the executor, and the profits belonged to the devisee; whilst the executor held the 442 personal property, "with a power to sell so much of it as might be necessary to pay debts, which ought to have been paid out of the capital of the estate, and not out of the profits, which belonged to the widow. The executor did not hold the land adversely to the widow; as is virtually admitted by the account and memorandum attached to it, rendered by the defendant to the plaintiff.

The only question is, whether the declaration was good, in joining counts upon the assumpsit of the defendant's intestate, to the plaintiff's intestate, with a count upon the defendant's assumpsit as administrator, to the plaintiff as administrator.

The cases referred to in 1 Chitt. on Pleading, 202, 204 and 213; Brassington v. Ault, 2 Bing. 177, and Catherwood v. Chaband, 1 B. & C. 150, leave no doubt that these counts were properly joined, if the last count is to be understood as in effect averring that the accounting between the plaintiff and defendant, was in respect to money due from the intestate of the defendant to the intestate of the plaintiff. I think this is the effect of the count; although it is contended, that under this count evidence would be admissible to prove, that the defendant, as administrator, had himself received money belonging to the plaintiff's intestate, in which case, he would be liable personally, and therefore, this count, upon which the judgment should be de bonis propriis, could not be joined with the others, upon which the judgment is de bonis testatoris. I do not think that such evidence could be given under this count. If the intestate of the defendant had held a bond payable to himself, but in trust for the intestate of the plaintiff, and the defendant had sued for and recovered the money in his character of administrator of the trustee, he would have been debtor for the money, not as administrator, but individually; and it could not have been given in evidence upon a count, charging that he had accounted as administrator, concerning money due from him as administrator. A careful pleader would have stated the accounting to have been, concerning 443 money due from the "intestate of the defendant to the intestate of the plaintiff, explicitly, and not left that to be ascertained by construction; and would probably thereby have avoided the delay of this appeal.

The judgment should be affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL.

This is an action of assumpsit by Joseph Dudley, administrator of his deceased wife Eliza, against Benjamin Cocke, administrator of Archibald Epes deceased. The declaration contains five counts; three of which are on promises made by the intestate of the defendant to the intestate of the plaintiff, while she was sole. The fourth count is on a promise made by the defendant as administrator of Archibald Epes, to the plaintiff as administrator as aforesaid, in consideration of a debt due from his intestate to the intestate of the plaintiff, to pay the same to the plaintiff. The fifth is, upon an account stated between the plaintiff as administrator as aforesaid, and the defendant as administrator as aforesaid, of and concerning divers sums of money due by the defendant as administrator, &c. to the plaintiff as administrator, &c. upon which the defendant as administrator, was found indebted to the plaintiff as administrator; in consideration whereof, the defendant as administrator, promised the plaintiff as administrator, to pay him the same when thereto required.

To this declaration there was a general demurrer. The defendant also filed three pleas. 1. Non assumpsit by his intestate; 2. No assets; and 3. Fully administered. Issues were joined on the demurrer and on the pleas. The demurrer to the declaration was overruled; and on the trial of the issues of fact, there was a demurrer to the evidence. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on the demurrer to the evidence.

The first question is on the demurrer to the declaration, and the only objection which it presents, is, as to the propriety *of joining the several counts found in the declaration.

The objection has a two-fold aspect.

1. As regards the person to whom the promises were made.

2. As regards the person by whom they were made.

As to the first. It is certainly true, that a plaintiff cannot join in the same action, a demand as executor or administrator, with a demand in his own right. 1 Term Rep. 480; 3 Term Rep. 659; 2 Saund. 117, d. But it is equally clear, that promises made to a plaintiff, as executor or administrator, may be joined with counts on promises made to the testator or intestate; on the principle, that in all such cases the damages and costs will be assets. Cowell & Wife adm'x v. Watts, 6 East's Rep. 405; 1 Chitt. Pl. 202-3-4-5. The declaration in this case, therefore, is free from objection, so far as relates to the person to whom the promises were made.

Secondly, as to the person by whom the promises were made. It is clear, that a promise which charges a man as executor or administrator, cannot be joined with one which charges him personally; because the judgment, in the one case, would be de bonis propriis, and in the other, de bonis testatoris. 2 Saund. 117, d. note; Herrenden v. Palmer, Hob. 88; Hall v. Huffam, 2 Lev. 228; 2 Vin. Abr. 45, pl. 52, 47, pl. 5; Chitt. Pl. 205. But a promise by a defendant, as executor or administrator, in consideration of a debt due from the testator or intestate, may be joined with a promise by the testator or intestate. 2 Saund. 117, a. note; Secar v. Atkinson; 1 Hen. Black. 102. The four first counts in this declaration (the three first being on promises by the intestate of the defendant, and the fourth being on a promise by the defendant as administrator, to pay a debt of his intestate,) might, therefore, be well joined; and it is equally clear, that the fifth count might be joined with the other four, provided it had been expressly stated, that the accounting set forth between the plaintiff as administrator, and the defendant as administrator, had been also stated to have been of and concerning 445 monies, owing from the intestate of the defendant. Secar v. Atkinson, 1 Hen. Black. 102. Now, although it would have been more formal, and less liable to cavil, and therefore more prudent, to have stated expressly, not only that the accounting was between the plaintiff as administrator and the defendant as administrator, but also that it was of and concerning monies due from the intestate of the defendant, yet I do not consider the last allegation as indispensably requisite; for, when the accounting is stated to have been between the plaintiff as administrator, and the defendant as administrator, it will be taken (unless the contrary expressly appear, as it did in the case in Hobart, p. 88,) to be of and concerning monies due from the intestate of the defendant.

There is, therefore, nothing in the objection as to the misjoining of the counts in the declaration; and, of course, the demurrer to the declaration was properly overruled.

The demurrer to the evidence presents still less difficulty. It shews that William Epes died in the year 1818, after having made his will, by which he devised to his wife for life, (the intestate of the plaintiff) his whole estate, both real and personal, and appointed Archibald Epes (the intestate of the defendant) his executor. Archibald Epes kept the estate together; and in the year 1819, made thereon the crop of wheat, the proceeds of which are the only subject in controversy in this suit. These proceeds were not necessary for the payment of the debts of William Epes. They were, however, received by Archibald Epes, and were applied by him to the credit of the estate of William Epes. But, they were unquestionably the property of Mrs. Epes, the intestate of the plaintiff; since the wheat was made on her land, and by her slaves; and they were recoverable by her administrator, in this form of action, since the possession of Archibald Epes was not adverse to her.

The judgment must be affirmed.*

August, 1827.

Appellate Practice—Road—Approval of Judgment Below—On an application to turn a road, where the witnesses on each side are nearly equal in number and credibility, the concurrent judgments of the County and Superior Courts ought to be approved by the Court of Appeals. By two Judges.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Hanover county.

An application was made by Harrison Ball, to the County Court of Hanover, for leave to turn a road. The usual steps were taken by the Court; and a report was made by the viewers in favor of the application. The motion was opposed by James Atkinson, and evidence introduced on both sides; and the County Court granted leave to turn the road. Atkinson appealed to the Superior Court.

At the trial in the Superior Court, the appellant moved the Court to reverse the judgment of the County Court, and to quash the report of the viewers, because the new road was to run across the lands of the heirs of Edmund Hooper deceased, without any previous summons having been served upon any of the tenants or proprietors of the said land, or their having been made in any manner parties to the controversy. But, the Court sustained the report in this respect, because the new road, as established by the order of the County Court, did not interfere with the said lands. Atkinson excepted.

Atkinson also moved the Superior Court to reverse the judgment of the County Court, and quash the report, because the order of the County Court appointing the viewers, did not designate any points or places within the said county of Hanover, at which the proposed alteration of the road should commence and terminate, but left the applicant in the County Court and the viewers at liberty to alter the said road for any length of distance, from its beginning to the city of Richmond, in the county of Henrico. But the Court were of opinion, that the distance for *which it was proposed to alter the said road, was a matter in pais, and to be determined by the viewers, and that the points of commencement and termination need not be further designated than they have been designated by the order of the County Court, and therefore rejected the said motion. The appellant, Atkinson, excepted.

The Superior Court affirmed the judgment of the County Court, and Atkinson appealed.

Daniel, for the appellant.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

August 21. JUDGE CARR.

Ball applied to the County Court of Hanover for leave to alter a road. The road to be altered is designated in the motion as "the road leading from the Old Church, by Cold Harbour, to Richmond." That it is a road leading to Richmond, is mentioned in the petition (I presume) to bring it within the law, which gives a citizen a right to make application for the opening a road, or altering a road, leading to the Seat of Government. The Court appointed viewers, who, being first sworn, were "to view the road and ground, along which it was proposed to be conducted, and to report to the Court truly and impartially, the comparative conveniences and inconveniences, which would result, as well to individuals as to the public, if such road should be turned." The viewers make a report, with a diagram shewing very clearly the course and distance of the contemplated change, giving their reasons why they think the new road will be better for the public, of great convenience to Ball, and of no inconvenience to any individual. On the return of this report, Atkinson was permitted to enter himself a defendant. The cause was continued for about twelve months; and then, on a hearing, the report of the commissioners was approved, 448 and leave *given to Ball to turn the road accordingly. From this decision, Atkinson appealed. It was tried in the Superior Court. Many witnesses were examined; and the judgment of the County Court affirmed. Atkinson appealed to this Court, having filed two bills of exception to the opinions of the Judge. The evidence also, given in the Superior Court, is spread upon the record, in obedience to the law.

If I felt doubtful as to the weight of this evidence, the opinion of the Courts, who heard the witnesses, would turn the scale. But, I am not doubtful. The number of witnesses, and the weight of evidence, are with the decision, in favor of the new road. This point, indeed, if not given up, was not relied on, in the argument.

The whole rests upon the two points made in the Superior Court. The second seems to come first in the natural order, as it strikes at the foundation of the proceeding. The appellant moved the Court to reverse the judgment, and quash the order of the County Court appointing viewers, because that order does not designate any points or places within the county, at which the proposed alteration in the road should commence and terminate. The Court overruled the motion, and very properly, I think. The law requires no such particularity as this. It says, where a party shall make application to have "a new road opened, or a former one altered, the Court shall appoint viewers," &c. The reason of the thing requires no such strictness. The view is a mere incipient step, to bring the matter before the Court. If, in the motion made for a view, it is shewn, that the road leads to one of the places, (the courthouse, warehouse, landing, &c.,) mentioned in the act, that is enough. The Court, then, names viewers, who act upon oath, and their report shews the particulars. It is upon this that the Court acts, and also upon any other evidence, which the parties may bring before them. If, upon the return of this report, it appears, that the proposed change will carry the road through the lands of 449 others, not parties *to the motion, a summons issues, &c. I do not think that this exception has any thing in it.

The next is, "the appellant moved the Court to reverse the judgment, &c. because the County Court established the road, running across the lands of the heirs of

*The principal case cited with approval in Leighton v. Maury, 76 Va. 874. See also, Downman v. Downman, 2 Call. 507, and foot-notes.

Hooper, without any previous summons having been served on the tenants or proprietors of the land, or their having been, in any way, made parties to the controversy." If this objection had been founded in fact, it would have been a sound one. But I think, with the Judge, that it is not so founded. This matter will be clearly understood, by looking on the diagram, and comparing it with the report. The viewers say, the new road strikes off from the old at N. Johnson's residence on Ball's land (letter A.) and is 1,320 yards, to where it intersects the established road. From Rawleigh to Cold Harbour tavern, is 96 yards. Now the old road runs by Cold Harbour; so that, here would naturally end the alteration: and they report, that from the commencement of the new road to its intersection with the Rawleigh road, it is solely on Ball's land, and that the old road, from where the new one leaves it to Cold Harbour, is on Ball's land. But, to shew more clearly the advantages of this new road, and to give a view of the whole ground, the viewers add, that just at the spot where the new road intersects the Rawleigh road, there strikes off from that road, one, which has been used for more than twenty years, as a near cut from the Richmond road, into the Rawleigh road. By taking this near cut, the acute angle made by the Rawleigh and Richmond roads, at their point of junction at the Cold Harbour tavern, is avoided; and a traveller would gain by it 146 yards. It is this near cut, which, the viewers tell us, borders on Hooper's estate; and it is on this, that the objection hangs. But, so far from considering this near cut as a part of the new road, they expressly state it in their report, to have been in use upwards of twenty years; and in their diagram, they also distinguish it from the new road, laying down the latter 450 *by black lines, and merely dotting the near cut, to shew its direction.

Some of the advantages to Ball by the change, are, that it will save him 2,000 yards of fencing, and enable him to have water in a pasture field, now without. The sole disadvantage to the appellant, is, that he is the keeper of the Cold Harbour tavern, and that this new road, instead of forcing travellers by his door, will bring them within 96 yards; leaving them the choice of taking the near cut, and avoiding the angle; or following the old road, and passing his door.

The case seems to me a very clear one for affirmance.

JUDGE CABELL.

This is an application to turn a road. All the preparatory proceedings appear to have been sufficiently regular; and the only question before us, is, whether the proposed change shall be established or not.

In such a question, the public convenience should be the ruling consideration; and on this point, the testimony (all of which is in the record) is contradictory. The witnesses are nearly equally divided. Those, however, in favor of the new route, appear to have examined both routes most carefully, for the purpose of ascertaining their comparative merit in relation to the public convenience; and I acknowledge, that I should, therefore, be disposed to respect their testimony, more than that on the opposite side.

But, suppose the witnesses were precisely equal in number, and that their testimony, judging by the record only, appeared to us to hang precisely in equipoise.

Witnesses should be weighed, not numbered; and in estimating the weight of testimony, the Judges of the Superior Court of Law, who see and hear the witnesses examined, possess advantages which we have not. The justices of the County Court have the same advantages as the Judges of the Superior Courts of 451 Law; to which may be *superadded an intimate personal knowledge of the character of each witness. In a doubtful case, therefore, upon a subject of this nature, I should always lean in favor of the concurrent judgments of these two tribunals.

Both judgments should be affirmed.

JUDGE GREEN.

This is an application to turn an old road, which runs from the Old Church to Richmond, and crosses the Bottom's Bridge road nearly at right angles. The proposed substitute for the old road and which was sanctioned by the judgments of the County and Superior Courts, terminates at the Bottom's Bridge road, ninety-six yards from the crossing of the old road and the Bottom's Bridge road. From this termination of the new road in the Bottom's Bridge road, the traveller must go to the old crossing of the roads, to travel towards Richmond. From the point where the new road leaves the old road, to the old crossings by the new road and Bottom's Bridge road, is 1,416 yards; and by the old road, is 1,180 yards; so, that the old road is 236 yards shorter than the proposed road, between the two points in which they coincide. In respect to the qualities of these roads respectively, I consider them as proved to be equal; and so far as the public are concerned, the old road is preferable in respect to distance, by 236 yards in less than a mile.

There is an old established tavern at the old crossings of the road, and as the road is established by the judgments in this case, those travelling by the Old Church road to Richmond, would still be obliged to pass by this tavern. But, if the new road be established, it will be a matter of course to open a new road, pointed out by the commissioners as the near cut, which would be a continuation of the road now proposed, and would fall into the Richmond road a considerable distance from the tavern, so as to carry travellers to Richmond, without passing the tavern;

452 and *when this is done, the new road would be, from the departure from the old road to its junction again with it, 1,470 yards long, and the old road, 1,380 yards; leaving the old road still preferable, in respect to distance, by 90 yards. If it is not, therefore, against the public interest to change the old road, it certainly does not appear to be necessary for the public convenience, to do so.

plicant, from this change, are, that he will save 2,000 yards of fencing, and have a pasture with water, which it is now destitute of: that some facilities will be afforded him in hauling wood; and that he will be enabled to make his house, which is 81 yards from the new road, a public house; whilst the injury that may result to the appellant, the occupier of the old tavern, consists in the diversion of the travelling custom from his house to Ball's. Both the old and the new road are entirely on Ball's land.

The legal presumption is, that when this old road was established, a fair and full compensation was made to the owner of the land, for any damages which he thereby suffered, and we may confidently believe, that the convenience of the cross-roads as a place for a house of public entertainment, and the well-founded confidence that these roads would not be changed, but for the public convenience, or for the advantage of one individual when it would not injure another, was the inducement to the owner of the tavern, to lay out his money to provide a house of public entertainment. This gave him rights, which, although not amounting to absolute property, were in the nature of property, (as the good will of a trade,) the loss of which would inflict upon him an injury, equal to the loss of specific property of the same value. A sacred regard to the rights of property, is the foundation of all law and civilization; and the smallest scintilla of right ought not to be invaded. The maxim, "sic utere tuo ut alienum non loedas," applies to this case. The interests of the appellant, so acquired, should yield to the public, but to no private interest. When he acquired that interest, he knew that according to existing laws, he must yield it to the public convenience, when required. The judgment should be reversed.

M'Clung v. Hughes.

June, 1837.

Equitable Relief—Failure to Prosecute Caveat.—The doctrine of the case of Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 156, examined in this and the next case.

Same—Grant—Fraud.—After a grant issued, any one claiming a prior equity against the grantee, can, in no case, have relief in equity, unless upon the ground of actual fraud in the acquisition of the legal title; or, unless the party was prevented from prosecuting a caveat, by fraud, accident or mistake.

Same—Same—Definition of Fraud.—By actual fraud, in such case, is meant the proceeding to procure a patent, after actual notice of a prior equity.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Greenbrier, where Edward and Thomas Hughes, filed their bill against Andrew Moore and William M'Clung, praying for an injunction to a judgment at law. The Chancellor awarded the injunction, and finally decreed that it should be made perpetual. The defendant, M'Clung, appealed. The following opinions give so complete a history of the case, that no other report is necessary.

Wickham, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

454 *June 13. The Judges delivered their opinion.†

JUDGE CARR.

In 1794, when the rage for speculation in wild lands was at the height, Moore and M'Clung entered into a contract for taking up in partnership 60,000 acres of land, in the county of Greenbrier, on Gauley river, and its waters, along the south side of the river, below Hominy creek. Having made many entries, they had an inclusive survey, made in September, 1794, comprehending 44,317 acres, for which a patent issued to Moore in June, 1795. The general position of the survey was this. Gauley running nearly a west course; the beginning call was near the river on the south side; thence the line ran off in a southerly course for some distance; turning then westerly, it ran off for a great distance with the river, and down it; then turning northerly, it ran to the river, and called (not for the meanders of the river,) but for a straight line, to the beginning. The length of this closing line was 5,060 poles, rather upwards of 15 miles. It was not actually run out at the time of the survey, but left open; a practice said to be common in that quarter. Hughes, the plaintiff, in 1795, entered for 400 acres of land on the north side of Gauley river, opposite to a part of Moore's survey. In 1798, he surveyed, and in 1800, obtained a patent. In 1807, Moore and M'Clung, for the first time, ran the closing line of their patent. This being a straight line, and the rivers in that mountainous country generally crooked, it was to be expected that it would, in the distance of 15 miles, cross the river several times. Accordingly, we find that it crossed four times; took in a considerable quantity of land on the north side, and among other tracts the 400 acres of the plaintiff. He being in possession, and refusing to yield the land, M'Clung, (who had bought of Moore) brought 455 *ejectment against him, and recovered judgment. This bill was filed to enjoin that judgment, and to obtain a decree for the legal title. The Chancellor decreed in favor of Hughes, and M'Clung appealed:

This statement shews that the ejectment must have presented a question of title and boundary purely; a question peculiarly proper for a Court of law, and a jury. They have pronounced that the patent of M'Clung covered the land; and being the eldest, carried the legal title. Can this question be re-examined in equity? We will consider this, first, on general principles; secondly, on the doctrine of caveats.

†Equitable Relief—Failure to Prosecute Caveat.—See foot-note to Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 156, where it is shown that the construction of Noland v. Cromwell given in the principal case has been adhered to in subsequent cases.

The case is cited on this point in Jackson v. McGavock, 5 Rand. 514, 539; Lewis v. Billips, 1 Leigh 364, 366; French v. The Successors of the Loyal Co., 5 Leigh 640, 648, 652, 668, 673, 675, 680; Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 124.

He is guilty of actual fraud who, knowing another's prior equity, proceeds to get a grant for the land. Cline v. Catron, 22 Gratt. 391, quoting from the principal case.

kind in the transaction, it is clear that equity might interpose, and say to Moore or M'Clung, "though you have gotten the legal title, you shall not enjoy the fruits of your iniquity. Taking hold of your evil conscience, we will postpone you to Hughes, and compel you to release to him your legal title." Does the bill contain any charges sustained by evidence, which would authorise this procedure?

The first ground of equity is, that Moore and M'Clung sold the land to Morris and Nicholson, who, in 1794, sent Robert James as their agent, to view it and ascertain the boundaries: that he, with Welch the surveyor, went round the survey, and ran the closing line on the south side of Gauley, declaring he had no claim to land on the north side. Supposing this literally true, it is difficult to perceive how it would attach an equity upon the conscience of Moore or M'Clung in favor of Hughes, who had not then even made his entry. But when we find that this James was a mere agent for Morris and Nicholson, whose only business was to view and report the quality of the land; that the contract with Morris and Nicholson was either never executed or afterwards rescinded; and that (as the witness Patterson says) the reason why they did not cross the river in running the lines of the land, was, that it was so high they could not cross, and 456 therefore, they had to go *up the south side; surely we must conclude, that there is nothing in this allegation or proof, to authorise equity to compel a release of the legal title.

The next ground of equity is, that Welch the surveyor was a partner with Moore and M'Clung: that he told the plaintiff's neighbours that they meant to take no land on the north side of the river, and encouraged them to locate those lands: that after Hughes had made his entry, it being suggested to him that the last line of Moore and M'Clung might take in the land, he sent to Welch for the lines, by Campbell, and to ask whether they would include the 400 acres; when Welch said he might send the lines, and take their money; but it was unnecessary to tell them and others to proceed and make their surveys, for that they closed their survey by the river.

Supposing Welch a partner in this land, and that this charge were made out by satisfactory evidence, its weight would depend very much on the good faith of Welch's declaration. There is a good deal of evidence, tending to shew that none of the parties expected the line to take so much land on the north side of the river; nor is it strange that they should err in their conjectures on the subject. The line was a straight course of 15 miles and better, through an unsettled mountainous country, and the windings of the river would be the main circumstance to determine, what land on either side, it would take in or leave out. The same means of information were open to all. Any person who chose to run a straight line from the given corners above and below, might ascertain how much land it would include on the north side, just as well as Welch. It would be difficult, therefore, to conceive, that Welch, in his messages, intended to deceive or defraud Hughes. Nor is it pretended that by those messages, he meant (if he had the power) to enter into a contract, changing the last line of the survey, and making the river the boundary. Hughes well knew that his line would stand in the patent, precisely as it 457 stood in the survey, a *straight line.

He had in his own power all the means of arriving at perfect certainty; and the survey gave him full notice. He ought then, in common prudence, to have run the closing line, and not to have rested on the opinion of any body as to its crossing the river.

But, it is useless to consider how far the declarations or admissions of Welch, taking him as a partner, would affect the rights of M'Clung and Moore, until it be first proved that he was a partner. The bill specially charges, that he was a partner in the 43,417 acre survey, and that this was proved by a written contract, and also by the deed from Moore to M'Clung, which contains an exception of Welch's claim; and particular interrogatories are put to the defendants, to answer whether there was not a written contract, with a prayer, that they be compelled to produce it. In answer, the defendants explicitly declare, that there was no contract, by which Welch was a partner in the 43,417 acre survey. They set forth a contract bearing date the 28th of August, 1793; by which they and Welch were to be equally interested in taking up lands on Gauley river. This contract appears to have been reduced to writing, after the entries made under it were located; as it specifies the seven entries to which it applies, and states that the lands which they embrace, (amounting by my calculation to 50,783 acres,) were held in equal shares by the partners. They set forth another agreement, dated the 20th of September, 1794, by which Moore was to furnish warrants for 60,000 acres of land, and M'Clung to locate them on Gauley river and its waters; Moore to pay all expenses, and M'Clung to have one fourth of the proceeds, when the land should be sold. This contract is signed by M'Clung, but not by Moore; and Welch, who is the subscribing witness, annexes to his attestation this remark, that it was acknowledged by M'Clung, and the next day, Col. Moore, after reading the article, agreed to the contents, but did not sign it, because the meeting between them being on the great road, there was no pen and ink.
458 This is the agreement, *(as seems acknowledged on all hands,) under which the entries were made, (except one,) which compose the 43,417 acre survey; and to this agreement, it is most clear that Welch was no party.

To prove that he declined a partnership in this adventure, M'Clung files and refers to an agreement between Welch and himself, dated in May, 1807. This agreement, referring back to the original contract between Moore, M'Clung and Welch, states, (by way of recital,) that 54,000 acres were taken up under it: that then, Welch declined a further partnership: that Moore and M'Clung agreed to go on: that Welch, at the instance of M'Clung, agreed to assist him in locating and surveying; for which service, M'Clung was to make over to him all right, title and claim to 4,500 acres out of his share of the partnership concern of 54,000 acres, to be adjoining Welch's division, in case M'Clung's share should join Welch's. After the recital, the agreement states that Welch had performed his undertaking to the satisfaction of M'Clung; for which, M'Clung binds himself, &c., in the penalty of $20,000, to perform his part; that is, to convey the 4,500 acres. Thus, the written contract called for and produced, as well as the subsequent contract between M'Clung and Welch, shew that Welch was not a partner in the 43,417 survey. As to that part of the deed from Moore to M'Clung, which excepts the claim of Welch, the answer of Moore explains it thus. Previous to the sale to M'Clung, it had been discovered that the inclusive survey of 43,417 acres had taken in a part of the joint property, the 54,000 acres; and the exception meant to exclude Welch's proportion of this part from the conveyance. What this part was, is seen at once by recurring to the first contract, and the surveyor's statement of the entries, on which the 43,417 acre survey was made. The contract shews that one of the entries, in which the three partners had a joint interest, was "an entry dated the 7th of June, 1792, of 14,562 acres, part of a location of 17,562 acres;" and the surveyor's

459 *statement shews, that this same entry was one of those, on which the 43,417 acre survey was made. To the amount of his proportion of this entry, Welch had an equitable interest; but, if he had owned the whole entry, (thus accidentally included,) it would hardly be contended, that this would constitute him so far a general partner in the various other entries comprised in the whole survey, as that (under the rule of law making the admissions or acts of one partner binding on the firm) his declarations and admissions would control and alter the written calls of the survey, or raise such an equity against Moore and M'Clung, as would postpone their legal rights to those acquired under a younger patent. A partnership is a voluntary contract between two or more persons, for joining together their money, goods, labor, and skill, or either or all of them, upon an agreement that the gain or loss shall be divided proportionably between them; and it is upon this community of profit and loss, this mutual confidence, and the character held out to the world, that the rule rests, making the acts and declarations of one partner binding on the rest. The very foundation of the rule is wanting here. This limited and accidental interest in a single entry, could not make Welch the partner or agent of Moore or M'Clung, so as to bind them by his declarations; and as to any joint general interest, I can find nothing that weighs as a feather, against the strong evidence I have stated, proving that he was not a partner. A paper is found in the record, purporting to be an agreement, by which Moore, M'Clung and Welch sell to Susanna Wilson 195 acres of land, and bind themselves to convey it to her, &c. How this paper came into the record, I cannot perceive. It is not an exhibit either in the bill or answers; nor is there a title of evidence going to authenticate it in any way. I should not, therefore, notice it, but that it seems to have had weight with the worthy Judge who decided the cause below. Although the name of Welch is in the body of the agreement as a 460 vendor, it is *executed only by Moore and M'Clung; nor is there any evidence where the land lay, unless we consider this as proved by the deposition of D. Stuart, who says, Welch refused to sign the agreement, saying he would take his land on the other side of the river. This would be slight proof, even if the witness were unimpeached; but, it is more especially so, as his situation (contesting the same point with the same party, against whom his evidence is given) goes strongly to his credit. But, take his evidence as true, and it amounts to this. Welch refused to bind himself to convey on the N. West side of the river, because he would not take his land there; and this was yielded to by all parties. Now, if Welch had been a general and joint partner in the whole survey, he could not have disclaimed an interest in any part of it, before a division. His execution of the contract, jointly with his partners, both they and the vendee would have had a right to insist on; but they had no such right, as he was interested only in a single entry, which, he might well contend, lay entirely, or principally on the other side of the river. This, therefore, certainly does not prove a partnership. There are several depositions as to declarations of Welch, M'Clung and Moore, that Welch had an interest in the 43,417 acre survey; but these may either be explained by the limited interest I have mentioned, or are fully rebutted by counter evidence; and if not, would deserve little weight; because the conversations they relate, were loose and vague, and the witnesses under a bias, which goes strongly to their credit. This is especially the case, with those who testify as to the declarations of Welch, that the closing line would not cross the river. Campbell acknowledged himself interested; and Fitzwater and Stuart had land within that same closing line, if it was permitted to cross the river. Without deciding on the competency of these witnesses, I must say, that I could never feel safe in receiving their evidence as proof of the parol declarations of their adversaries; going to establish the very fact, on which 461 their own *titles depended. Upon general principles, therefore, I think there is nothing in the case to justify a re-examination of the law-judgment by a Court of Equity.

2. But if this question were more doubtful than it is, I think the second point to be considered, to wit, the doctrine of caveats, as settled by this Court, would be entirely conclusive of the case; and on this ground, in my judgment, the decision ought to be exclusively placed.

In the discussion of this point, I shall consider the case of Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155, as binding authority. I shall do so, first, because Noland v. Cromwell, was decided by a full Court, on great consideration, with the express view of settling finally the jurisdiction of equity in such cases, and has, ever since its decision (now upwards of twelve years) been taken as giving the law to the subject. Such cases ought not to be disturbed; for (as has been well said) it is of more importance to the community that the law be settled, than how it is settled. When it is clearly understood, that the solemn decisions of this Court are to stand, counsel will know how to advise their clients, and litigation will be discouraged. Who can tell how many titles we might shake, how much litigation we might set afloat, by overruling now, the case of Noland v. Cromwell? Perhaps these remarks might have been spared, when it is recollected, that in the case of Jackson v. M'Gavock, (argued since the present case, and before three of the same Judges) we, after hearing a long argument assailing the authority of Noland v. Cromwell, stopped the reply, declaring that we considered Noland v. Cromwell as settling the law at the date of the decision; though the effect of subsequent statutes on that case, was open to argument. That their effect is nothing, will be shewn in Jackson v. M'Gavock.

Taking now, the case of Noland v. Cromwell as settled law, I will enquire whether it does not govern and decide the case at bar.

462 *In Noland v. Cromwell, the bill charged fraud and combination between the defendant and the surveyor. In this Court, the case was decided on the preliminary question, whether in any case equity would relieve on a bill suggesting no excuse for failing to caveat. In the argument of this question, the bill was to be taken for true, and the strongest case which could arise out of it, as established; and this course was no doubt taken, because (in the words of the Court) "it has been thought best to meet the question in full, and endeavour to put it at rest in future." The opinion of the majority of the Court was delivered by Judge Fleming. The following extracts will shew the nature and extent of the decision. It begins thus: "After the solemn resolution of this Court upon the question of jurisdiction, rendered in the case of Johnson v. Brown, which was founded upon former decisions, and particularly upon that in the case of Jones v. Williams; after the accession to this decision by Judge Tucker in the case of Depew v. Howard, on the ground of its being the established law of the land; after this rule of property, sanctioned by the opinions of all the successive Judges of this Court, to the number of perhaps seven or eight, prior to the present organization thereof, had been promulgated as the law of the land, and hundreds of our citizens may have regulated their transactions thereby, it might have been reasonably supposed, that the point, at this day, had been at rest. If there were even error in the opinion of all these Judges; if the solemn decisions of this Court, upon the point, were even replete with error; that error, upon general principles, had better be acquiesced in, than corrected at this late day. But no such error has been committed; and we owe that deference to the decisions of former times, that we ought not to suppose that those decisions were rendered without due consideration. We ought rather to admit the possibility of being ourselves mistaken. On authority, therefore, the question is irrevocably settled; and on principle also, we think it rightly settled.

463 The *point seems to be, as thus established, that although a party may be let into a Court of Equity, on grounds which he could not have used on the trial of a caveat, and which, in fact, make another case, or upon a case suggesting and proving that he was prevented by fraud or accident, from prosecuting his caveat; he is not to be sustained in a Court of Equity on such grounds as were or might have been brought forward on the trial of the caveat." The opinion then proceeds to detail the reasons of the decision: That the State having much vacant land for sale, it was important to have it settled, and the titles thereto quieted, as soon as possible; that for this purpose, the Legislature constituted a peculiar tribunal, and made provision for the speedy decision of the whole law and equity of the case, on the trial of the caveat, prior to the emanation of the patent; that it was important, in relation to this extensive territory, to act by general rules, and establish a general criterion as to notice; that the act meant to cut up the numberless doubts and disputes as to notice or no notice, and to establish a general criterion analogous to the provisions of the registration acts, which do not permit any person to aver the want of notice of a deed duly recorded; that the notice principally established by the act, is the entry in the surveyor's book, open to all; which, when followed up by a survey, directed by law to be made shortly thereafter, affords complete notice of the claim; that of this survey, it is not competent to adjacent adventurers to aver an ignorance; and that if a particular case of hardship should be found to exist, it must yield to the general policy of the statute, which acts by general rules, and adopts, of necessity, a general criterion; it being better that hardship should be endured by an individual, than that the general policy of the Legislature should be defeated. According to this case, then, a party may be let into equity upon grounds which he could not have used on the trial of the caveat; or upon a case suggesting and proving that he was prevented by fraud or 464 accident from prosecuting *his caveat; but not on such grounds as were, or might have been used on the trial of the caveat. How then can the bill before us be sustained, which, so far from making out a new case of which the plaintiff could not have availed himself on the trial of a caveat, shews a case, every fact and circumstance of which was available on such trial, and might have been submitted to that tribunal, and does not suggest even, that the plaintiff was prevented by accident or fraud from prosecuting his caveat?

The Chancellor seems to think it sumcient to give equity jurisdiction, that the case, as appearing from the evidence, should shew a good excuse for the plaintiff's not having prosecuted a caveat. I question this exceedingly. The general rule is, that equity has no jurisdiction in such cases; but, if fraud or accident has prevented a resort to the caveat, equity will relieve. Ought not the bill, then, to state expressly, that fraud or accident has intervened? Where are you to look for the plaintiff's case, but to his bill? If that does not give jurisdiction, it would be demurrable; thus cutting off the evidence entirely. Again. No evidence can be taken which is not relative to the matters in issue. Now, if the bill alleges neither fraud nor accident in excuse for not filing a caveat, how can the plaintiff take evidence to prove such facts? They make no part of his case. The defendant has had no notice by the bill, that they would be relied on. He has not had the benefit of his answer to the allegation. He has no warrant for taking countervailing evidence. I do not agree with the Chancellor, therefore, that the case made out by the evidence will give equity jurisdiction, where the case stated in the bill gives none. Such a position is as directly opposed to the general rules and principles of equity, as it is to the particular case of Noland v. Cromwell, which expressly says, that to give equity jurisdiction, the plaintiff must suggest and prove that he was prevented from prosecuting a caveat by fraud or accident.

465 *But, if the Chancellor's idea were correct, I do not think the case made by the evidence furnishes a good excuse for failing to caveat. The survey of Moore and M'Clung was prior to the plaintiff's entry; and of this survey, he had not only legal, but actual, notice. He knew that this was an inclusive survey, setting out from Gauley river above, running round a large body of land to the river 15 miles below; and then, to close the survey, calling for a straight line, not for the river according to its meanders. The Chancellor seems to think, that it could never have been supposed by the plaintiff, that this closing line would cross the river, 1st, because there was no call to cross; 2d, because such crossing would have gone into the county of Kanawha, for which the surveyor had no authority.

This last objection is founded on a mistake of the fact. By adverting to the law establishing Kanawha, (12 Hen. Stat. 670,) it will be seen that the N. E. line, cutting off part of Greenbrier, runs from Cumberland mountain to the Great Kanawha river, crossing the same at the end of Gauley mountain; thence along said mountain to the Harrison line. Now, the maps shew us, that the part of Gauley river embraced by this survey, is some distance south of Gauley mountain. Both sides of the river, therefore, were in Greenbrier; and the line, in crossing the river, did not run into Kanawha. In December, 1795, (after the date of Moore's patent,) the county line was changed by the Legislature, from Gauley mountain, to Gauley river.

As to the first objection, that the line could not cross the river, without calling to cross, I understand the surveyor Shanklin to say, that he had known other such cases; and the case of Hughes itself is such an one. There is no call in his survey to cross the river, and yet it does cross, and take in three or four acres on the south side. But, the conclusive answer to both these objections is, that the question whether the closing line could cross the river, is purely a legal question; a question of boundary arising on the calls of the patent, decided in the action of ejectment, 466 and (as we *must take it, while that judgment stands,) correctly decided; the Law Court having decided that the closing line could in law, and did in fact, cross the river. The plaintiff is charged with knowledge of that fact, by his notice of the survey; and justly so charged, as he had it fully in his power to ascertain the actual course of the line, and it was gross negligence in him, not to have done so.

Upon every view of the case, therefore, I think that the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

JUDGE GREEN.

The judgment at law must be considered as conclusively settling the fact, that Moore's patent includes the land in controversy; there being no impediment to a full and fair investigation of that question in the action of ejectment. If the Court of Law erred in any way on that point, it is not competent to a Court of Equity, again to investigate the question of boundary, and to correct the error, if any existed.

Whether the plaintiff in the Court below, was entitled to any relief in equity against the legal title of the defendant, depends on two questions: First, whether he had better equitable title to the land in question than Moore had, which would have been preferred in the Court of caveat, if he had prosecuted a caveat before Moore's patent was issued? And if so, secondly, whether, having failed to prosecute a caveat, he was entitled to relief in a Court of Equity, after the patent issued? The facts, upon which these questions turn, are as follows:

Prior to the 28th of August, 1793, Andrew Moore, William M'Clung, and Alexander Welch, the surveyor of Greenbrier county, located upward of 50,000 acres of land in the names of Moore, and of Moore and M'Clung, on the waters of Gauley and Meadow rivers, in which the partners were equally interested. The original agreement of these parties was, to locate 467 100,000 acres; but on the *28th of August, 1793, Alexander Welch retired from the partnership, and Moore and M'Clung entered into a new contract, which the parties proceeded to execute forthwith. This contract was verbal, and not reduced to writing until the 20th of September, 1794, after the location under the contract, and the survey of the lands located, were actually made. The terms of this last contract were, that Moore should furnish to M'Clung land-warrants to the amount of 60,000 acres, pay all the expenses of locating, surveying, &c., and give M'Clung one fourth of the land which might be located under these warrants; and M'Clung was to locate, direct and have surveyed, the above quantity of land, "if so much was to be found unappropriated, lying, adjoining, and on the south side of Gauley river, between the said river and surveys made for said Moore (and others, naming them) along the south side of Gauley river, below Homminy creek, and joining the above claims, and other prior claims, so far as the Kanawha road and bounds of the county line of Greenbrier."

The first entry made under this last contract, was dated September 6, 1793, for 11,907 acres, of which only 6,040 acres were included in the survey upon which Moore's patent issued. It began in one of the lines of a survey made in the name of Moore, for 20,000 acres under the former contract, which lay on the south side of Gauley river; the lines of which nearest the river, ran nearly parallel to the river, and the nearest of which were about three miles from the river. The entry beginning at one of the corners of this survey, calls to run with three lines of the survey of 20,000 acres nearest to the river, and to extend for quantity parallel to the lines of the old survey, so called; this location was the uppermost of all those included in Moore's patent, and lay almost entirely about Homminy creek.

The next entry made February 11th, 1794, for 8,300 acres, lay next below the former, and called to join the north east of the said survey of 20,000 acres, and to run north west with the lines of said survey, 468 down different *branches of Gauley river, and to continue nearly north west, leaving said survey to Gauley river; and thence, to extend up the Gauley river, and thence around northeastwardly to the beginning, for quantity.

Next below the entry of 8,300 acres, lay an entry of 17,562 acres, made June 12, 1792, not under the contract between Moore and M'Clung, but under the previous contract between Moore, M'Clung and Welch; of which 3,000 acres being withdrawn, the balance 14,562 acres was included in the survey upon which Moore's patent in question issued. This entry calls to begin in a line of said survey of 20,000 acres, and to run with two long lines of that survey; and thence extending S. W. and N. and N. W. down branches of the Meadow river and Gauley river, to include the land in the forks of said rivers, and up said Gauley river waters around for quantity.

The last two entries were made September 19th, 1794, after the survey was made, and the day before the contract was reduced to writing. The first for 4,515 acres calls to join the southeast and southwest of the entry of 17,562 acres, to include part of the waters of Meadow river for quantity. The other for 10,000 acres joining the southwest of the entry for 4,515 acres, and to include waters of Meadow and Gauley rivers for quantity.

The survey was made by Welch on the 9th, 10th, 11th and 13th days of September, 1794; and the patent issued June 22d, 1795; so that the survey must have been returned to the Register's office before the 22d of December, 1794. This survey began at a large poplar between the Gauley river and the line of the 20,000 acre survey, 870 poles from the latter, and several hundred poles from the former, and the corner of a survey of 5,867 acres made for Moore on the 8th and 9th of September, 1794, and running with the line of that survey 870 poles, to the 20,000 acre survey; then with the lines of that survey, and leaving it to a corner on the top of Gauley river ridge (on the south side,) and thence N. 67, E. 5,060

469 poles to *the beginning. It appears that all the land on the south side of Gauley river, between this last line and the river, not included in this survey, had been surveyed for Moore before this survey was made. This appears from the inclusive survey afterwards made for Moore, which includes all this land. The patent describes the land as lying on the south side of Gauley river, and on Homminy creek, and on both sides of Meadow river, a south fork of Gauley river, and including several other branches of said river. This patent excepts many prior titles included in the survey on the south side of Gauley, but none on the north side; although it is said, though not proved, that there were many such on the north side included in the boundary of the survey as now claimed by M'Clung. This closing line was not actually run at the time of the original survey; nor until 1807, when it was found to include several thousand acres on the north side of the river, and amongst the rest the land claimed by the plaintiff. Shortly after this survey, Moore sold this land to Morris and Nicholson of Philadelphia; and in the fall of 1794, James, an agent for Morris and Nicholson, came to Virginia to see the land; and William Renwick, John Patterson and the said James, examined the land in company with Welch and M'Clung, to see whether it answered the description given by Moore to Morris and Nicholson; and the land was surveyed in the fall of 1794, under the superintendence of these persons. It does not distinctly appear, whether this survey alone, or other surveys above and below it on the river and surrounding it, were sold to Morris and Nicholson; though the latter, I think, may be safely taken to be the fact; for, in January, 1795, Moore procured an order for an inclusive survey, which was returned and recorded as surveyed in May, 1795; this survey including the land on the river above and below the survey of 43,417 acres, and other lands surrounding it, to the amount in all of 100,230 acres. There is no evidence of any actual

470 survey of any of these lands, between the time of the original survey *and the year 1807, except as to the survey made in the fall of 1794, when James was present; and I think that very survey was returned and recorded as the survey made under the order of January, 1795, for an inclusive survey. The beginning corner of the survey of the 43,417 acres, made in September, 1795, was a considerable distance from Gauley river on the south side; and the lines run eastwardly, southwardly and westwardly, to the last corner, near, though not on the river, and on the south side. The closing line, about 15 miles long, was not then run; and it was then thought it would not cross the river, although it was afterwards ascertained that it did cross it four times, owing to several deep southern bends of the river, and embraced many thousand acres on the north side. Accordingly, the report of the surveyor, and the patent afterwards issuing upon it, described the land as lying on the south side of Gauley river; and the contract made with Morris and Nicholson, was for the sale of lands on the south side of Gauley river. The fact, that the closing line crossed the river, was ascertained, when the land was conveyed to Morris and Nicholson, in a very short time after the survey of September, 1794; though to what extent, was not then ascertained, as the line was not run. But, the survey was closed by the meanders of the river, according to the contract with Morris and Nicholson, and the meanders laid down as the boundary of the inclusive survey before mentioned. That the parties knew that the closing line would cross the river, and did not intend, by closing the inclusive survey by the meanders of the river, to limit their claim to the land on the south side, and abandon their right to that included in the original survey of 43,417 acres on the north side of the river, and that the inclusive survey was made with a view to procure a patent separately for the land sold to Morris and Nicholson, is demonstrated by the fact, that the report accompanying the inclusive survey (in describing what former surveys were included in that) states, that a part 471 *only of the survey of 43,417 acres was included; and the part not included, could only have been that lying on the north side of the river. Welch, the surveyor, had an interest in a part of the entry of 14,562 acres, included in the survey of 43,417 acres. How he disposed of it, does not appear; but, he probably sold it to M'Clung, who also purchased the interest of Moore after the survey of 1807, which ascertained, for the first time, what land the closing line would include on the north side of the river.

Four months after, Moore's survey of September, 1794, was made; but, whether before or after the survey upon the sale to Morris and Nicholson was made, and the closing line ascertained to cross the river, (although that survey was bounded by the river,) cannot be clearly ascertained. Hughes, under the impression which seems to have been common in the neighbourhood, that the closing line would not cross the river, (or more probably, that it would not cover the land he located,) entered 400 acres on the north side of the river, the land in controversy. But, before he made his survey, having a doubt, as he says, "whether Moore's closing line, when it came to be run, might not include his entry," he applied to Welch through a messenger, to know whether it was intended that Moore's survey should cross the river, and to send the lines of Moore's survey, as he wished to know whether his entry would be embraced by Moore's survey; "and if it was, that he would lift his entry, and be at no further expense about it;" when Welch answered, "Tell Mr. Hughes, I could take his money and send him the lines of the survey; but, tell him to proceed in his survey, and secure his land, for, we do not intend taking one foot of land on that side of Gauley river." Accordingly, Hughes proceeded, though not till more than three years after, to make his survey, and took out his patent. Several years after this patent was taken out, and before the survey of 1807 ascertained that Moore's survey included the land taken up by Hughes, M'Clung sent a message to Hughes, 472 advising him to erect "a ferry on his land for the advantage of the lands in the neighbourhood. I think it probable, that Welch's message to Hughes was sent before the survey, in pursuance of the contract with Morris and Nicholson; for, then his answer would be true. If after, it would be false without a motive.

Hughes's claim to relief seems to have been founded chiefly on the ground, that Moore's patent did not in fact cover the ground in controversy, and upon this ground principally, the decree of the Court of Chancery proceeded. The bill charges, that the complainant was not permitted at law to avail himself of the matters stated in his bill, by giving them in evidence to the jury. All evidence touching the question of boundary was admissible upon precisely the same principles, and to the same extent, both in a Court of Law and a Court of Equity. If the Court of Law erred in excluding proper evidence of the boundary, it was an error which a Court of Equity could not correct in any form. Fraud, accident, or surprise, which prevented the party from bringing his case fully before the jury, or after-discovered matter, which he could not bring before the jury, are the only grounds upon which a Court of Equity can re-examine, in any form, any fact put in issue between the parties, and decided at law. None of these grounds are alleged in the bill; and the true boundary of the land, according to the patent, must be taken to be as settled by the judgment at law.

A party acquiring an interest for valuable consideration in, or expending his money upon, the property of another, and induced or encouraged to do so by the fraudulent suppression of the truth or suggestion of falsehood, on the part of the owner, is entitled in equity to be indemnified, either by retaining the property, or otherwise recovering satisfaction from the owner. But, to give such an equity, a fraudulent intent must be brought home to the owner; or at least, a negligence so gross as to amount to evidence of fraud. A clear mistake or ignorance of his rights, 473 on the part of the owner, repels the imputation of fraud, and gives to the other party no equity; as was held in Stewart v. Luddington, 1 Rand. 403.

In this case, the bill charges no such fraudulent misrepresentation or suppression of the truth. The declarations of Welch, and the message of M'Clung, are stated for the purpose of shewing that they believed that the closing line would not cross the river, and to operate as evidence of the real boundary of Moore's survey; and it is clear upon the evidence, that all parties laboured under a mistake in that respect, in which all were equally innocent; or, if guilty of culpable negligence, that charge attached as strongly on Hughes as on the other parties, the means of correcting the mistake being equally accessible to all. If, therefore, M'Clung, in other respects, has the better right, Hughes has no equity against him founded on this mistake as to boundary, either in respect to the property, or otherwise, except so far as to set-off the value of the permanent improvements, made by him, against M'Clung's claim for rents and profits.

The only remaining ground upon which the plaintiff can claim relief, is, that Moore's entries did not cover the land in question, and that his survey did not conform to his entries: that, therefore, his original equitable right, before either party obtained a patent, was superior to Moore's: that he could have prevented Moore from getting a patent for the land in question, by filing a caveat; and that his mistake in respect to the boundaries of Moore's survey, encouraged by the mistaken declaration of Welch, was a sufficient excuse for his failure to file a caveat, and affords just ground for the interposition of a Court of Equity.

The bill does not suggest, or charge, that Moore's survey included any greater quantity of land than his warrants and entries entitled him to. Nor does it charge directly, that his survey did not conform to his entries, so as to put that question directly in issue. Yet it calls for the exhibition of the entries, and suggests 474 that all of them were *made on the south side of the river. Five entries are exhibited, as those upon which the survey was founded; one of which could not cross the river, beginning a great distance from it, and running in directions parallel to, and from it: one other is bounded by the river, and runs North-easterly from it, so as not possibly to cross it. The calls of the other three are such, that it may, or may not have been necessary to cross the river, in order to embrace the quantity of land called for; and if it were necessary to cross the river for that purpose, it is impossible to determine with any certainty, from any thing in the record, whether these entries, duly surveyed, would include the land in controversy. If this question be proper to be enquired into, it will be necessary to have a survey in the cause, and perhaps an issue to be tried by a jury.

If Moore's survey included lands not covered by the terms of the entries, Hughes locating, even after the survey, the land not covered by the entries, might have prevented the patent from issuing to Moore for the land in controversy, by a caveat; as was determined by the Supreme Court of the U. S. in the case of Wilson v. Mason.

The question, therefore, is, whether in that case, Hughes, having failed to prosecute a caveat, can, under the circumstances of this case, successfully assert his originally prior equitable right, in a Court of Equity.

In examining this question, we are at the outset struck with the observation, that the Court of Appeals in Virginia, and the Supreme Court of the United States, (the latter, in administering the law of Kentucky,) seem to have come to opposite conclusions, in respect to the question, to what extent and upon what principles, Courts of Equity can entertain a jurisdiction in cases of conflicting claims to land, under the Land Laws of Virginia. In Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155, the former held, that a Special Court having been appointed for the determination without appeal of all questions arising before the issuing of a patent, a Court of Equity

475 had no jurisdiction after the *patent issued, unless the claim of the plaintiff in equity was of such a nature, that it could not have been asserted in a caveat; or, unless the party had been prevented from availing himself of that remedy, either by fraud or accident, upon the ground that such was the policy of the law, in order to avoid multiplied and tedious litigation, and, I presume, also upon the ground, that in general, a Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to give relief, if the party had an adequate and simple remedy elsewhere, or that remedy were lost by his default.

The Supreme Court held, in Bodley v. Taylor, 5 Cranch; that it had been decided in the Court of Appeals of Virginia, whilst Kentucky was a part of that State, and confirmed by an uninterrupted series of decisions in Kentucky, that the true ground of jurisdiction was, that an entry was considered as a record, of which a subsequent locator might, and is presumed to have had notice; that the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity, is not granted by statute, but is assumed by themselves; and that they cannot decide as a Court of Caveat could, but must exercise the jurisdiction upon the general principles of the Court of Chancery. The effect of this description of the foundation of the jurisdiction is, that as it is an invariable maxim of a Court of Equity, that where both parties claim an equity, the prior equity must prevail, when neither party had obtained a patent, unless there were circumstances in the case, which, upon the general principles of a Court of Equity, would postpone him.

But, if the subsequent locator had acquired a legal title by patent, then another inflexible maxim of equity would immediately apply to the case, that when the equity is equal, the law shall prevail. All equities are equal, without regard to priority of time, or this maxim would be unmeaning. The inequality proceeds from fraud or culpable laches; and to deprive a subsequent locator, with the legal title, of the benefit of this rule, it must appear that 476 *he was guilty of some act or laches, which made it unconscionable in him to insist upon his title.

Applying these principles to the case of a prior locator, contended with a subsequent one, having the legal title, if the latter had notice of the prior equity of the former, before he obtained his patent, he would be guilty of a fraud, if he proceeded; as in the case of a purchaser with notice of an unregistered deed. Le Neve v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 646. Upon these principles it was held, that the prior entry being considered as a record, and the subsequent locator having notice of it, or if he had not, his ignorance proceeded from culpable negligence, his equity becomes inferior to that of his competitor; he loses the advantage of his legal title, and the prior equity will prevail.

In the very next case reported, Taylor, &c. v. Brown, 5 Cranch, 234, the Court asserted a still broader principle. Both parties claimed under military warrants issued under the proclamation of 1763. The law in respect to that class of claims, does not appear, at that time, to have required locations previous to survey. The plaintiff's warrant was surveyed July 7, 1774, and his patent issued in 1792. The defendant's survey was made June 24, 1775, and his patent issued in 1780. The Court decided in favor of the plaintiff, declaring that if the plaintiff's survey came within the law, (as it did,) the circumstance that the subsequent survey was made without notice in fact, cannot alter the case. His warrant only authorised him to acquire vacant land, and he took upon himself to find lands of that description. The principle of caveat emptor is strictly applicable. The principle upon which relief is granted, is, that the patent, which is the consummation of the title, relates to the inception of title; and therefore, in a Court of Equity, the person who has first appropriated the land has the best title, unless his equity is impaired by the circumstances of the case. The Court repeats, "In this case, the first patentee is said to be a purchaser without notice. His warrant authorises him to survey waste and unappropriated 477 lands; *and he undertakes to find land of that description. The Government acts entirely on his information; and the terms of his grant were, that the lands were waste and unappropriated. It is not for him to say that he had misinformed the Government, and had surveyed appropriated, instead of vacant land, and thereby entitled himself to be considered as a purchaser without notice."

Two cases are reported in 7th Wheaton, Miller v. Kerr, page 1, and Hoofnagle v. Anderson, page 212, which illustrate these opinions of the Supreme Court. In the first case, the plaintiff claimed under a military warrant, by mistake of the Register, stated to be for services in the Continental line, when in fact, the Executive had directed the warrant to issue for services in the State line. A part of this warrant was located in Ohio, when it was lawful to locate warrants for service in the Continental line, but not in the State line. The entry was on the 16th of June, 1795; the survey, on the 30th of October, 1796; and the patent, in February, 1808. The defendant entered a warrant on the same land in 1806, and got his patent in 1807. The defendant, having the legal title, prevailed, on account of the mistake of the plaintiff's warrant.

In the other case, a part of the same warrant was entered in Ohio on the 16th of October, 1790, surveyed on the 30th of October, 1796, and the patent issued October 9th, 1804. The defendant was entitled under this patent. The plaintiff's entry was made on the 28th of May, 1806. The defendant succeeded.

The reasoning on which the judgment of the Court was founded in this last case, and the principle asserted in Bodley v. Taylor, would, I think, have led them to decide in favor of the losing party in the first case, if he had had the legal title, instead of the other party. They state, that the mistake in the warrant was perfectly innocent; and that when it was issued, the mistake was perfectly immaterial. For, the party had the same rights as to quantity of land, and was entitled to locate it 478 in the same districts *of country, whether it were issued for services in the Continental or State lines. In that case, the party would have had a perfect equity with the legal title, which would have protected him, but was not sufficient to enable him to assail the legal title of another.

I cannot assent to the principles on which Taylor v. Brown was decided. The defendant there had the legal title and equal equity. He had neither actual nor constructive notice of the prior equity, nor was any laches imputed to him; and a Court of Equity, acting upon its ordinary principles, could not take away his legal right. The idea of the patent's having relation to the inception of the right, was entitled to no weight; for, the equitable right of the plaintiff was the same, whether he had obtained the patent or not, since the patent gave him no title. If the doctrine of relation could have any effect whatever, it would have overruled the patent of the defendant, and destroyed its effect. This doctrine of relation, was acted on in several cases by Chancellor Wythe, particularly in Pickett v. Dowdall. In that case, Judge Pendleton, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said, that the defendant had the legal title, and the law was in his favor; that relations were legal fictions to promote justice, not to work an injury to innocent persons; and the defendant had judgment. Nor, do I consider that the argument founded on the supposed obligation on the party to locate vacant land, would affect the party, if he was guilty of no fraud or negligence. Neither the warrant, nor the patent, specify the land as waste and unappropriated. The law directs that the owner of a warrant, wishing to locate any waste and unappropriated land, shall deliver it to the surveyor, &c. These terms meant unpatented land. The words unpatented, waste and unappropriated, and waste and unpatented, are used as synonymous throughout the statutes; particularly all of them are so used in the 1st section of the act of 1779, ch. 12. To the same purpose were used the terms unpossessed land in the act of 479 1705, ch. 22, sec. 6; and "not *before granted by patent," in the act of 1748, ch. 19, sec. 2. To these waste and unappropriated lands, adventurers might have legal rights or claims, which are noticed in many parts of the statutes. Thus, in respect to actual settlers, it is provided, that all persons who, before the 1st of January, 1778, have really and bona fide settled themselves, &c. upon any waste and unappropriated lands, to which no other person hath any legal title or claim, shall be entitled to 400 acres, &c. If the statute had not excepted such waste and unappropriated lands as others had a legal claim to the settlement-right would have superseded a prior right founded on warrants. The case of Jones v. Williams, 1 Wash. 230, cited by the counsel in Taylor v. Brown, was a case between a settler claiming under this clause of the statute upon a settlement before 1775, and another claiming under a military warrant located in 1775. The judgment was for the latter; the statute only giving preference to settlement-rights upon waste and unappropriated lands, when no person had a legal claim to it at the passing of the law in 1779; the Court in effect declaring, that this, although waste and unappropriated land, was not such waste and unappropriated land, as was subject to the claim of a settler, under that act. The direction to locate treasury warrants on waste and unappropriated land, does not except that to which another has a legal claim, if it be not a legal title by patent. The party locates at his peril, so far as that if he innocently interferes with the prior right of another, it is at the peril of being intercepted, in procuring his patent, by a caveat, or, if fraudulently, of being corrected by a Court of Equity, even after he has obtained his patent. But, if he obtains his patent without actual fraud, he will be entitled to all the benefits of having the advantage of the legal title, which are sanctioned by the general principles of a Court of Equity.

Upon examining all the cases decided in the Court of Appeals which are reported, and which touch these questions, 480 *I do not think that the proposition said in Bodley v. Taylor, to have been decided in Virginia, whilst Kentucky was a part of the State, that an entry was a notice to a subsequent locator, which tainted his legal title founded upon a prior patent, with fraud, was ever so decided in this Court. The only case, which seems at first view to have established that proposition, is that of Johnson v. Buffington, 2 Wash. 116, which, as reported, seems to justify the proposition above stated. But, upon an examination of the original record, it will be found, that this report is entirely erroneous; and that the subsequent locator, who procured the first patent, had actual notice, and was guilty of gross fraud. The examination of these reported cases, will, I think, shew, that neither this proposition, nor those laid down in Taylor v. Brown, in respect to the doctrine that the patent relates to the entry as the inception of the title, and that an entry made upon land not patented, is invalid, if it had been previously located by another, are supported by any decision of this Court.

In Wilcox v. Calloway, 1 Wash. 38, Wilcox was entitled to the land by patent in 1764. Cox petitioned for the land as lapsed, in December, 1767. Pending this petition, Wilcox sold to Donaldson in 1768. In June, 1772, the petition was tried, and Donaldson was offered as a witness to prove, that the quit-rents, (the non-payment of which was the cause alleged why the land was forfeited,) had been paid. He was rejected on the score of interest. The fact could have been proved by others; and the defence had been left to Donaldson. Cox had judgment. But, before he took out his patent, he assigned his right to Donaldson, who took out his patent in 1774. But in 1773, Cox not having taken out his patent, Wilcox caveated him for this cause, and recovered a judgment, and took out his patent in 1783. In the meantime, and pending the last caveat, Donaldson sold and conveyed to Calloway, the defendant. The Court declared that Calloway had the legal title: that the Court, if Donaldson alone had been defendant, 481 *would have had jurisdiction to vacate the patent to Donaldson as surreptitiously obtained, and to relieve against the judgment of forfeiture in 1772; Wilcox having a good defence, which was lost by mistake. But, Calloway being a bona fide purchaser without notice, the bill was dismissed. Here fraud and mistake would have given jurisdiction against the party to the fraud, but did not avail against a bona fide purchaser.

In Jones v. Williams & Tomlinson, before mentioned, the plaintiff had filed a caveat, which was dismissed in consequence of an accidental miscarriage of the subpoenas for witnesses. On this ground, the Court examined the merits as the General Court would have done upon a caveat, and dismissed the bill; the defendant having the legal right and prior equity.

In Reid v. Burnside, 2 Wash. 43, the plaintiff prosecuted a caveat, and obtained a judgment. The defendant enjoined the issuing of the patent; and pending this suit, obtained a patent. Both claimed under settlement-rights; and the plaintiff, having the oldest right, succeeded in Chancery. This was the case of an actual fraud.

Johnson v. Buffington, 2 Wash. 116. On the 25th of March, 1753, Peter Peters procured a warrant to survey 300 acres of land described in the warrant. The survey was made on the 28th of April, 1753, in the name of Frederic Vinegard, by order of Peters. On the 1st of September, 1790, Jacob Unrod, the heir of Frederic Unrod, called in the survey Vinegard, sold all his right to this land to Buffington the plaintiff, who obtained a grant the 26th day of April, 1791. Subsequent to 1783, Johnson, the defendant, under a treasury warrant, located 219 acres, and got a patent November 4th, 1789. Buffington, who was in the possession of the land, charged in his bill the facts above stated, and that Johnson had, before he got his patent, full knowledge of the rights of Jacob Unrod, and actually contracted with an agent of Unrod's for the purchase of it; and it is fully proved, that in 1787, he did 482 *make such a contract, and that there was an old settlement on the land in 1790: that Unrod's widow, and her second husband, lived on the land after Unrod's death; and about the year 1780, sold her dower interest in the land to a purchaser, who lived upon it. It was, therefore, a case of full notice and actual fraud, on the part of the defendant; and the plaintiff succeeded. No reason is assigned why a caveat was not filed by the plaintiff.

This statement is taken from the original record. The report of the case omits to state the charges in the bill of actual notice and fraud, supported by full proofs. This case, reported without attention to these facts, has probably aided much in establishing the rules prevailing in Kentucky, and involving their land titles in such ruinous confusion. In this case, the counsel for the plaintiff admitted, that where the equity was equal, and one of the parties had the law also on his side, he shall prevail; but if the legal title has been obtained by fraud, or by taking advantage of one labouring under a disability, he will not have the benefit of the advantage. The ground upon which the defendant's counsel mainly relied, was, that the plaintiff's claim was forfeited by a non-compliance with the rules of Lord Fairfax's office, and that the defendant's entry was therefore valid. The Court decided, that under the acts of Assembly particularly relating to the Northern Neck, the prior survey continued to be good; and that only was intended to be asserted by the expressions, that it could not be re-granted by the Commonwealth; that it could not be considered as unappropriated, and consequently subject to be granted under the act of 1785; and that the land was legally appropriated by Lord Fairfax, and consequently could not, under the act of 1785, be granted to any other person. The patent to Johnson was admitted to pass the legal title, which could not have been its effect, if the land could not be granted by the Commonwealth.

483 *In Pickett v. Dowdall, 22 Wash. 106, the plaintiff claimed under a warrant in 1741, and a grant in 1788; the defendants, under a warrant of 1762, and a grant from Lord Fairfax in 1780, and under a warrant of 1779, and a grant in 1780. The plaintiff's bill was dismissed, on the ground of his laches, and that his rights had been forfeited, and Lord Fairfax had availed himself of the forfeiture, by granting the land to the other parties. The bill charged, that the defendants had notice of his title before they made their surveys, which the answers denied. The Reporter says, there was no proof of the fact. The Chancellor affirms, in his decree, that they had notice before their grants were obtained, and the Court of Appeals say, "It is unnecessary to enquire if the Picketts had notice of Crop's title; since, if they had, it could not have affected them, unless Dowdall (who claimed under Crop) had been prevented by fraud from obtaining a legal title.

In Currie v. Burns, 3 Call, 183, the plaintiff had the eldest survey and youngest patent; the defendant, the youngest survey and eldest patent. The lands were in the Northern Neck; and the plaintiff, having forfeited his right according to the rules of the office, Lord Fairfax had availed himself of the forfeiture, by granting to another; and the Court refused to relieve against the forfeiture, on account of the plaintiff's laches. In this case, no caveat could have been filed. The only remedy, if the plaintiff had right, was in Chancery.

Hunter v. Hall, 1 Call, 206. Hall had the prior survey, and Hunter one subsequent.

Hunter caveated Hall. No judgment was pronounced on the caveat; but Hunter dismissed it, and took out a patent. Hall filed his bill, on the ground of this fraud. The Court held, that the caveat not being dismissed on its merits, did not preclude Hunter's taking out his patent, and that Hall's survey was not warranted by his entry; and dismissed the bill.

White v. Jones, 1 Wash. 116. Plaintiff claimed under entry of 1740, and patent of 1764; defendant, under entry 484 *of 1743, and patent before 1764.

The bill charged, that defendant had obtained his patent by a fraudulent collusion with the officers of the government, in procuring his patent. The Chancellor dismissed the bill, on the ground, that if the patent was surreptitiously obtained, it was void at law, and the interposition of a Court of Equity was unnecessary. The decree was affirmed, upon the ground, that the plaintiff had not proved the fraud alleged. But, the Court declared, "the plaintiff has stated a very fair and proper case for a Court of Equity. He was a purchaser, against whom the defendant unfairly and fraudulently obtained a preference; and in questions like this, when fraud is suggested and proved, Courts of Equity have competent jurisdiction, and can afford the most ample and adequate relief. But, in this case, the plaintiff has failed to support the charge of fraud." The bill assigned no reason why a caveat was not filed. The effect of this case is, that in cases of actual fraud, a Court of Equity has jurisdiction, when there was no reason for failing to file a caveat, and will relieve; but will not relieve against a legal title without actual fraud, (the defendant pleaded that he had no notice,) in favor of a prior equity; and that an entry and survey is not such a notice to a subsequent locator, as of itself to affect his conscience, and deprive him of the advantage of his legal title, in a Court of Equity.

Johnson v. Brown, 3 Call, 259. The plaintiff claimed under a prior entry; the defendant, under a prior grant. The Court said, "We first consider the case on general principles, as a claim to set up an equitable interest, in opposition to a legal title; in which case, the plaintiff, to succeed, must shew a superiority of equity to the defendant; for, if it be equal only, the law must prevail.

"Brown appears to have proceeded regularly, fairly, and legally, to acquire a title to vacant lands; and has, without fraud, obtained a patent. Johnson, on the other hand, appears to be a man searching 485 for defects in his neighbours' "land-titles, hunting up and purchasing a stale and dormant claim, in order to disturb that title, &c.

"But let us suppose that Johnson had such an equity as would, upon a caveat prior to the grant, have entitled him to a preference. It would be no ground for a bill to set aside the patent, unless it had been suggested and proved that he was prevented by fraud or accident from prosecuting a caveat. On these grounds, this Court has sustained bills of this sort, and enquired into the equitable preference, as if on a caveat. But, to admit such bills in all cases, without even suggesting an excuse for not having entered a caveat, would be to transfer the whole caveating business from the Courts of Law, where the Legislature have placed it, into the Chancery, which this Court cannot sanction. It was foreseen by the Legislature, that there would be interfering entries and surveys; and the caveat was the remedy for settling all those disputes, prior to the patent." The Court also declared, that an entry, although declared by statute to stand good until the surveyor gave notice of the survey, was only the first legal step towards acquiring waste lands, and gives the person making it, (not an absolute legal right, but) if properly pursued, a preference to a grant. This was the unanimous judgment of the Court.

Depew v. Howard and Wife, 1 Munf. 293. The plaintiff claimed under a prior entry and later patent. The bill charges that the defendant had notice of his prior entry, and fraudulently procured a survey, which had never been actually made, to be returned, and got a patent. But, before the patent issued, he filed a caveat, which was dismissed, "either because he could not attend to it, the smallpox being then at the Courthouse, or because the Howards resided out of the State, so that no summons could be served upon them." The bill was dismissed; the plaintiff having elected his remedy by caveat, and not having been prevented from pursuing it, by any fraud, accident, or mistake. I presume if he had not filed his caveat, or had 486 *been prevented by his ignorance of the fraud, he might have claimed the aid of the Court of Equity, upon the ground of actual fraud, according to the principles of the former decisions. But he elected a remedy which was adequate, and lost it by his own default.

Then came the case of Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155, before referred to. The literal terms of the opinions of the majority of the Court in that case, seem to preclude a party from resorting to a Court of Equity in a case of actual fraud, unless it was such an one as prevented his resort to, or could not be tried in, a caveat. Most, if not all, possible frauds, might be tried in the Caveat Court, which proceeds upon equitable principles, before a patent issues to either party. If this was the intention of the Court, it contradicted many of the former cases, particularly White v. Jones. I do not think the Court had in their mind a case of actual fraud, in procuring the prior patent. Their expressions are general, and lay down a general rule, which might well be liable to an exception of the case of actual fraud; and in subsequent cases, the same Judges have given relief upon the ground of actual fraud, when the filing or prosecuting of a caveat was not prevented by fraud, accident or mistake. As in the case of Preston v. McKinney (not reported) in which the same Judges, except Fleming and Coalter, gave relief upon the ground of the actual fraud of a surveyor in locating land in the name of his infant son, he having had actual notice that it was previously located by another, and getting a prior patent, without any fraud, accident or mistake, preventing a caveat. The patent unquestionably conveyed the legal title.

Christian v. Christian, 6 Munf. 541. In 1747 and 1753, the father of the plaintiff had entered and surveyed large bodies of land, which were never patented; but he and his devisees were in possession of them. He devised it to his four sons. The heirs of one of those sons, with actual and full knowledge of the facts, entered, 487 surveyed *and procured a patent for a part of the land. Henry and Drury Bell procured a patent for a part, and John Booth and Thomas Staples for a part. The plaintiff filed caveats against the patents to the heirs of the son, and Booth and Staples, which were dismissed for his failure to file a copy in the proper Court, within the time prescribed by law. The patents to the Bells had not been caveated; but one of them had purchased the land patented to him, from one of the devisees of the first locator. The Court held, that as to the heirs of the son and Booth and Staples, the principles of Noland v. Cromwell, did not apply, because the rights of the parties could not have been adjusted in the Court of Caveat, and gave relief as to them; but as to the Bells, as to whom the principles of Noland v. Cromwell applied, the bill was dismissed. All against whom relief was given, had been guilty of actual fraud; and those, against whom no relief was given, were guilty of no fraud. If the right of the parties to a partition, made the case unfit for a Court of Caveat, as to the parties against who relief was given, it had the same effect as to the Bells, one of whom was not a purchaser from any of the devisees. But this was no impediment to a caveat; especially against parties not entitled to come into partition, as were two against whom relief was given. The decree is to be supported upon the ground of actual fraud only.

The last case I shall mention, is that of Lyne v. Jackson, 1 Rand. 114. The plaintiff placed treasury warrants in the hands of the defendants to locate and survey for him; and for this service, he was to convey to him, as soon as the patents issued, a moiety of the land, and each party was to bear one half of the expense. The defendant forged an assignment of the warrants to himself, and located and surveyed them in his own name. Before any patent was issued, the plaintiff filed his bill to enjoin the issuing of them, and the sale of the surveys. He does not state that he could not prove without a discovery, the facts 488 alleged in his bill; but on the contrary, proves them by *witnesses.

Pending the suit, another located and surveyed the land; and he was made a defendant by a supplemental bill. The Chancellor dismissed the bills; no doubt, upon the authority of Noland v. Cromwell, as he understood that case; the plaintiff having an unquestionable remedy by caveat against all the defendants, and to the prosecution of which not the slightest impediment existed. This decree was reversed, and the Register directed to issue patents to the plaintiff to be by him held liable to the claims of the original defendant, to be prosecuted in another suit. The Court was unanimous. There is no other possible ground upon which this decree could be founded, except that in cases of actual fraud, a Court of Equity has, upon its general principles, an original jurisdiction concurrent with that of a Court of Caveat, before a patent is issued, and after it is issued, even in cases where there was no impediment to a caveat.

Upon the best consideration which I can give to the statutes and those authorities, I conclude that all lands which had never been patented, unless particularly excepted by the acts of Assembly, are liable to location by any holder of a treasury warrant; that lands already located by one, may be located by other holders of warrants, and that these entries give to each locator an equitable right (not absolutely, but) upon pursuing his rights as the law prescribes, to claim a patent: that the one who first obtains a patent, has a complete legal title, of which he cannot be deprived, unless he has been guilty of an actual fraud in the acquisition of the legal title; or unless another party, who had made the prior valid entry, can shew that he has been prevented from asserting his prior right in the mode prescribed by law, (a caveat) by fraud, accident or mistake; in which cases, the Court of Equity will proceed upon the principles which would have governed the Court of Caveat, if a caveat had been filed in time, and the legal title would not avail the defendant, to any purpose; and that in the cases of actual 489 fraud, the party having such *prior right may resort to a Court of Equity for relief, upon its original principles, without alleging any excuse for not filing or prosecuting a caveat; a Court of Equity having an original concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Caveat in case of actual fraud, before the patent is issued, and afterwards, an exclusive jurisdiction, founded on the original character of the Court. And that a Court of Equity has no jurisdiction, except in cases of actual fraud, and in which the party has lost the benefit of a caveat, by fraud, accident or mistake. By actual fraud I mean, the proceeding to procure a patent, after actual notice of a prior entry.

To recapitulate the effect of the cases cited; the case of Lyne v. Jackson affirms the concurrent jurisdiction of a Court of Equity, before the issuing of the patent, in a case of actual fraud. The jurisdiction of equity, after the issuing of the patent, in a case of actual fraud, is affirmed in the cases of Wilcox v. Calloway; Reid v. Burnsides, (in which cases the patents were issued pending a caveat by the other party;) in Johnson v. Buffington, and White v. Jones, (in which cases the jurisdiction was affirmed, although no caveat was filed, and no reason assigned for the failure;) and such were the cases of Preston v. M'Kinney, and Christian v. Christian. The cases of White v. Jones, and Johnson v. Brown, assert the doctrine, that equity will not relieve but upon the ground of actual fraud, against the patentee, unless the party has been deprived of the benefit of a caveat, by fraud, accident or mistake. The cases of Johnson v. Brown; Depew v. Howard, and Noland v. Cromwell, whilst they declare in general terms that a party cannot resort to a Court of Equity, upon any ground which would have availed him in a caveat, unless he was prevented from prosecuting a caveat by fraud or accident, (and it might have been said by mistake, for that is a species of accident,) do not advert directly and in terms, to the case of actual fraud in procuring the legal title. This was, I 490 should think, rather an *exception to the general rule, overlooked by the Court in laying down the rule, than a case which they intended to embrace in the general rule, contrary to the prior decisions of the Court; which they would hardly have overruled intentionally, by laying down a general proposition, and not adverting to this particular case of fraud, or to the former decisions upon it; and the subsequent decisions on the same point, fortify this impression. Understanding Noland v. Cromwell thus, with an exception of the case of actual fraud, I think it was perfectly right, and in conformity with the former decisions of the Court, and the spirit of the statutes.

This seems to me to be the effect of the judicial decisions on these questions; and I think the same conclusions are dictated by the spirit of our land laws.

When the Commonwealth opened office for the disposition of all the unpatented land from the Alleghany mountains to the Mississippi, for the avowed purpose of increasing the population of the State, and of raising funds to meet the pressure of the revolutionary war, not only by the sale of, but by the revenue to be raised by taxing the land, the public had a deep interest, not only for the purpose of effecting these objects, but to prevent unbounded and ruinous litigation, in respect to the land titles acquired under that act, that all conflicting claims to unpatented lands should be promptly and finally adjusted. The individual adventurers had even a greater interest in a speedy decision of their claims. In that case, if they failed in their claim to any particular piece of land, their injury would be inconsiderable, as they might still acquire, with very little additional expense, the same quantity of land, equally valuable, or nearly so, in the vast range allowed for selection. But, if the decision of an adventurer's rights was protracted by tedious litigation in the ordinary Courts, and in the ordinary forms, and subject to the delays of appeals and writs of error, that opportunity of indemnifying himself would be

491 lost, in consequence of all the valuable land being in the *mean time occupied by others. To avoid these evils, the Legislature adopted a policy for expediting the decision of these questions, which had prevailed before the revolution, when the same motives for such a course existed, though not in the same degree. They allowed a person claiming a better right to unpatented land, to file a caveat, the effect of which was, to prevent the emanation of a grant, until the right could be determined. To enable him to pursue this remedy, no patent could issue, until the survey had been six months in the Register's office. A copy of the caveat was required to be filed in the General Court, within three days after it was filed in the Register's office, or the caveat to be void. The defendant was to be summoned to the next Court, where the right was to be determined in a summary way, without pleadings; and no appeal or writ of error was allowed to the judgment. If the defendant succeeded, he was bound to take out his patent within three months, and the plaintiff succeeding, within six months; or any other might caveat them for that cause; and if the plaintiff succeeded, the defendant was entitled to a new warrant for the same quantity of land. By the act of October, 1784, ch. 12, the Register was required to pay to the defendant in that case, the fees which the successful plaintiff paid to him, upon taking out his patent; and by the act of May, 1783, ch. 39, the caveat was directed to be dismissed, if the summons was not returned, or was returned not executed, unless the Court was satisfied that the failure to execute the summons was not owing to the default of the caveator. All these provisions shew a strong anxiety on the part of the Legislature, to coerce the parties claiming, to assert their rights in the mode prescribed by law, with promptitude and vigilance, to take out the patent immediately, and to provide for the indemnity of the losing party as far as was possible. All these objects of expedition and indemnity would have been utterly lost, if the plaintiff was authorised to pursue his remedy in the Court of Equity, or in the Caveat Court, at his election, whenever he chose the 492 *former. The delay in that Court, and by appeals, would be necessarily great; and if the plaintiff succeeded, the defendant could not have been indemnified. For, besides that, all the valuable land might be pre-occupied, he would lose his warrant and the fees he had paid to the public, without redress; both of which would have been restored to him, upon a judgment against him by the Caveat Court; and the provision of the statute that the caveat should in certain cases be void, and in others dismissed, would be fruitless and idle.

In addition to these mischievous consequences, contrary to the spirit of the law, (which induce an opinion that the Legislature did not intend to leave a concurrent jurisdiction to a Court of Equity to give a party in all cases the benefit of his prior equitable claim,) the general principles of a Court of Equity forbid its taking jurisdiction, when the party has an adequate and simple remedy in another forum, with the exception of a few cases, in which it has an original and concurrent jurisdiction; of which description, are all cases of actual fraud.

I have considered it my duty to examine these principles, because of the manner in which this case, and that of Jackson v. M'Gavock,* (the latter particularly) was argued; and because it is understood, that the decision of Noland v. Cromwell was greatly disapproved of, and which is apparent from the decisions of the inferior Courts, and the acts of the Legislature of 1814 and 1819. These acts were probably passed under the impression that it had been decided, that even in a case of actual fraud, a Court of Equity could give no relief, unless the party had lost the benefit of a caveat by fraud, accident or mistake. The act of 1819 does not give the same remedy in equity, as the party might have had by a caveat; but only provides that the party might have such relief in equity as he might have had there, if no remedy by caveat had been provided.

493 "If, therefore, a party came into equity before a patent issued, both parties claiming equitable rights only, the prior equity would prevail; but, if he came after the patent issued, the acquisition of the legal title, if bona fide acquired, would give to the equity later in point of time, the advantage of having the law on its side; and the equity being equal, the law would prevail. This statute, therefore, whether prospective or retrospective, or both, seems to me to have no effect upon these questions; for, a party would now come into a Court of Equity, after failing to file his caveat, upon the same terms that he was entitled to, and bound by, before the statute.

Nor does it appear to me, that the act of 1814, re-enacted in 1819, providing for the repeal of letters patent, has any effect upon these questions. That only allows such repeal, at the instance of one having a subsisting equitable right to the land, at the time he sues out the scire facias, and commencing before the date of the patent; and the Court is directed to decide the case, as law and equity may require. The plaintiff would, therefore, be determined to have a subsisting equity or not, precisely upon the same grounds, as if he was prosecuting his right in his own name, under the act of 1819 aforesaid, after the patent had issued. Indeed, the object of both acts, being to vindicate only private rights, it would be absurd that these rights should vary as the party might think proper to pursue the one or the other of these remedies, in the name of the Commonwealth, or in his own name.

In the case at bar, there is no allegation by the plaintiff, that there was any fraud, accident or mistake, which prevented him from filing a caveat. But, on the contrary, he alleges that he intended to withdraw his entry, if he found that Moore's survey included it. He cannot, therefore, claim to set up his right in the Court of Chancery, upon the same principles as he could have done in the Caveat Court, even if he could do that in case he had been so prevented.

494 He can claim no relief against the legal title, unless "it be tainted with fraud. No fraud is charged. The mistake of the parties in respect to the boundary, is only relied upon as a proof of the actual boundary; and in truth, there was no fraud. The fact that the land was included in the survey, whether covered by the entries or not, was no fraud either upon the plaintiff or the Commonwealth. The survey was made before the plaintiff made his entry; and it is not alleged that it included more land than the warrants and entries called for. If the river had run a straight course, or its bends had been westwardly instead of southwardly, the line would not have crossed the river, and there would have been no pretext for saying, that the survey covered land not covered by the entry. The mistake arose from the ignorance of the parties as to the real course of the river. All knew that this last line of the survey was a straight one, and not governed by the meanders of the river. The mistake was perfectly innocent and honest on all sides. If there was any negligence, it was imputable to both parties alike. Each had the same means to correct it, even if the surveyor had improperly refused a copy of the courses. The plat was in the Register's office, and a copy might have been had there. There was no greater moral or legal obligation on the one party than on the other, to ascertain the precise location of the line. If there was no fraud in making the survey as it was made, there was none in taking out the grant; as there was no change of circumstances, or in the state of the information, or rather ignorance, upon which the parties acted, which could have that effect.

Upon the whole, the decree should be reversed, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed, but without costs.

JUDGE COALTER.

On a view of the answers, documents and depositions, it seems to be established that Moore, some time between 495 *1791 and 1794, embarked in the speculations of that day, in surveying and vending large tracts of land, and had made a contract with Morris and Nicholson of Philadelphia, to sell 100,000 acres in the northwestern parts of Greenbrier county, on the Meadow and Gauley rivers, lying on the south side of the latter. Whether he had made any conditional sale or not, before he began the locating, does not appear; but it is pretty clear, that such sale must have been made before the business of locating and surveying was closed; for, some dispute seems to have arisen, as it regarded the quality of the land, which seems to have been submitted to the opinion of certain arbitrators or viewers, who were called on for that purpose, and who examined the land early in the winter of 1794, and shortly after the last survey of 43,417 acres was made, as hereafter mentioned. According to this contract with Morris and Nicholson, the land was to lie on the south side of Gauley.

It also appears, that about the year 1791, the said Moore made a verbal agreement with M'Clung and Welch, the surveyor, to assist in procuring the land; each party to perform certain services, and to be equally interested in the proceeds of sale: that prior to August, 1793, M'Clung and Welch had made entries and surveys, in part compliance with this agreement, and which are enumerated in a written contract bearing date the 8th of August, 1793; the object of which seems merely intended to shew how far they had advanced with the business at that date, in order that Welch, who had determined to do so, might withdraw from the partnership, and leave Moore and M'Clung to procure the residue of the land themselves. It was found, that at this time, entries and surveys had been made to the amount of 53,780 acres, or thereabouts, including 3,000 acres, a part of an entry of 17,562 acres, made 12th of January, 1792. These lands, I take it for granted, were then surveyed; and at all events, a 496 survey of 20,000 acres* of them, lying to the east of the 43,417 acres survey, hereafter mentioned, had been made.

It is admitted on all hands, that after the quantity of about 54,000 acres were located and surveyed, Welch withdrew; but, he was still entitled to one-third of 14,562 acres, the residue of the entry of 17,562 acres above-mentioned, when that should be surveyed.

In this posture of affairs, Moore and M'Clung agree to go on and locate the residue of the land, on certain terms, as will be seen by their agreement, which, I take it, was first verbal, but was reduced to writing on the 20th of September, 1794; in which it is stipulated particularly, that the lands shall lie along the south side of Gauley river, below Homminy creek, and joining the above claims and other prior claims, &c. M'Clung, it seems, applied to Welch to join him in this business, but he refused to be a partner, and M'Clung then agreed to give him, for his assistance, 4,000 acres out of his share of the land first above-mentioned.

But it is to be remembered, that at this time, the 14,562 acres above-mentioned was unsurveyed, and that that location was precisely within the bounds mentioned in this last contract. It joins the 20,000 acre survey, is to run down branches of Meadow river and Gauley river, so as to include the lands in the forks, and up the said Gauley river waters for quantity. It cannot be said, I think, that this entry was intended to cross the river; and if it did, it would be far below the land in dispute. Thus the contract to locate, and the contract of sale, both call for lands on the south side of the Gauley river; and it would have been in violation of each, to cross it.

The next entry is of the 6th of September, 1793, being the first one made under the new agreement between Moore and M'Clung, and is for 11,907 acres. This entry lies above Homminy creek, if it can be said to be any where; for, I have great doubts whether it can be considered sufficiently special. It calls to begin at a 497 corner of the *20,000 acre survey, and to pursue three lines to the third corner. These lines lie in the form of a half-moon, from A, in the plat, and do not cover half an inch of the plat. Lines are to be run parallel to these, so as to include the quantity; and so far from calling to go across the river, it is not even named; and if it did go across, I think, could not interfere with the land in dispute.

The next is the entry of 8,300 acres, made the 11th of February, 1794, and which lies along the river opposite the land in dispute, and is expressly bounded by the river. It is to run to it, then up it, and round for quantity. On this subject of entries on, or joining, large rivers, (as this is charged in the bill to be,) without calling to cross them, I will refer to the case of Hunter v. Hall, 1 Call, 210, in order to shew the necessity of saying so in the entry, if it was intended to cross the river. The calls of the entries themselves, I think then, will not justify crossing the river; whilst the contracts for locating, and for sales of the land, and all the contemporaneous declarations and early acts of the parties, shew that it never was intended to cross the river. Of this there is abundant and most conclusive proof; and I consider it a clear case on this point, independent of other considerations hereafter to be mentioned. So that, had the surveyor closed the open line by running on the north side of the river, they could have been met there, with success, by a caveat, and defeated on a younger entry.

But, let us pursue the history of this business further. On the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th days of September, 1794, Welch proceeds to make a survey of 43,417 acres, beginning some distance from the river and running round, and again approaching the river; and from the last station, he calls to run to the beginning, supposing he had begun so far from the river, that the closing line would not cross it; and after this, to wit, on the 19th of September, 1794, Moore made two other entries within the bounds of this survey, one for 4,515 acres, and another for 10,000 acres;

498 *so that as to this quantity, the survey preceded the entries. Neither of these entries cross the river; and if one of them would, it would be still further down the river from the land in dispute, than either of the others. Welch is admitted to have been interested in this survey as far as one third of 14,562 acres aforesaid. This is admitted in Moore's answer, and in his deed to M'Clung the interest of Welch is reserved; and as late as the year 1807, in the agreement for the sale of some land on the north side of the river to Mrs. Wilson, the sale is stated to have been made by Moore, M'Clung and Welch, and that the bonds for the purchase money were taken to them; and although he disclaimed any right to go on that side of the river, he was nevertheless interested in the survey.

Soon after this survey was made, to wit: late in the fall, or in the early part of the winter 1794-5, one James came on from Philadelphia, as an agent or referee on behalf of Morris and Nicholson, and insisted with Patterson and Renwick to explore the land, and see if it was equal to the description given of it. M'Clung attended them part of the time, and Welch, the surveyor and partner, made the survey. They ran round the land as Patterson says, I presume, by running the exterior boundaries; and when they came to the lowest corner of the 43,417 acre survey, and proceeded on the course of the closing line, they struck the river. It was high, and they could not cross; and they then closed the survey, by meandering the south margin of the river. This is clearly proved by several witnesses; and it is also proved, that though M'Clung had left them, he was informed that it was so closed; but that the closing line, had it been run straight, would have crossed the river. Where or how it would run on the other side, was not then known; nor was it known, until it was closed in 1807, when the surveyor and all the parties were much surprised to see how it ran, and how much land it took in on that side. An inclusive survey having thus in fact been made, it very naturally occurred to the 499 *parties, that it would save trouble, and perhaps be more in the spirit of their contract with Morris and Nicholson, to get an order of Court for an inclusive survey, which was procured on the 28th of April, 1795, and without further survey, I presume; for, we hear of no other being made. An inclusive survey is recorded in the surveyor's office on the — day of May, 1795; a copy of which is in the record. This survey is bounded by the Gauley river. It is admitted by Moore, that he made a deed to Morris and Nicholson; but when, or whether according to this survey, we are not informed; and when the contract was cancelled with them, we know not. It seems to have been put an end to, however, some how or other. I suppose Morris was unable to pay, and this land was taken back.

In this posture of affairs, or rather on the 20th of January, 1795, the appellees, supposing the Gauley river was the line between Greenbrier and Kanawha, make their entry with the surveyor of Kanawha, on the north side of the river, for the lands in dispute. This opinion, which must have been a general one in the country, that the river was the line, is another fact to shew that Moore, who entered in Greenbrier, could not have intended to take land in Kanawha. This is nearly about the time when the land was explored and surveyed as aforesaid; and consequently we find, that soon after they made their entry, it was rumoured that possibly M'Clung and Moore's survey would cross the river by the closing line; and they sent to Welch the surveyor, to enquire if it did cross the river, and to get the courses of the survey. He sent them word that the survey did not cross the river, and they might go on and survey the lands, &c. How were the appellees to know, had they got the courses, that they would cross the river, when the surveyor himself did not know it, until he came to try the closing line, and struck the river; and years after, when he ran it out, was utterly astonished to find how it ran? M'Clung also, after this, and before 1807,

(but at what precise time does not 500 appear; *though it is charged in the bill to have been in 1803, or 1804,) sent the appellees word to make a ferry-boat, stables, cabins, &c. for the accommodation of travellers, so as to draw custom, and induce settlers in the wilderness on his lands, &c.; thus clearly recognizing their rights, and inducing them to lay out their money. All this is charged in the bill; which M'Clung admits, but says he sent them word, that if the land turned out to be his, he would pay them for the improvements. But this, so far from being proved, is disproved. In short, no claim is ever pretended to this land, until 1807, twelve or thirteen years after the transactions aforesaid; when, on going to close the line on the north side, it is found that it embraces a larger tract of country, now become valuable. Welch, however, well knowing there was no justice in the claim, positively refused to have anything to do with it, or to join in the sales to the innocent holders of these lands, saying he would take his share elsewhere.

But again. On examining the entries on which this survey of 43,417 acres is said to have been made, I was struck with some marginal notes, and have been led to examine the patent for that tract, and compare the warrants returned with it, with those mentioned in the entries, and find that several warrants in the entries are not mentioned in the survey, and that others are mentioned in the survey, which are not in the entries; which shews a shifting of warrants not sanctioned by law. Thus in the 17,562 acre entry, 500 acres are said to be by warrant No. 25; 500 by warrant No. 2, and 6,759 by warrant No. 12,227; in all, 7,759 acres. None of these are mentioned in the patent. But, 3,000 acres of this entry had before been surveyed, which, deducted from the 7,759 acres above, would leave 4,759 acres of this entry, without warrants. And so of the entry of 8,300 acres; 2,000 acres are by warrant No. 9,880, and 500 acres, by warrant No. 6,515. These are not named in the patent; which, added to the above, make 7,259 acres. But, the patent mentions warrants not in any *of the entries; as for instance, No. 7,720; 65,513; 9,889. These may be enough to cover the 7,259 acres above, and it may be that no actual fraud has ultimately been practiced on the public. But, surely such shifting ought not to be countenanced; especially, when the parties had interested the surveyor with them in the surveys. These warrants may have been withdrawn, and probably were, and applied elsewhere; whilst the ostensible entry kept these lands covered, until other warrants could be procured. Such matter, coming out on a caveat, would have its due influence; and why some regard ought not to be paid to it here, I cannot at present see.

But again. Memoranda are made in the margins of the entry-book opposite the entries. Thus, opposite that of 17,562 acres, it is stated "14,562 surveyed and included in a survey of 43,417." Opposite the 8,300 acre entry, is this note. "Surveyed in survey of 43,417. This entry removed on account of an inclusive survey." This must be the inclusive survey noticed above; in which it is stated, that it is made by such and such surveys, and by part of a survey of 43,417 acres, and the last part of this marginal note was made after that inclusive survey. It will be found too, that the other surveys amounted nominally to 47,557 acres. Deducting the 8,300 acre entry from the survey of 43,417 acres, leaves say 35,117; making in all 82,674. But when the inclusive survey as actually made, it turns out to contain 100,230 acres, or 17,556 acres of surplus land beyond warrants.

This entry of 8,300 acres was withdrawn then, in consequence of that inclusive survey, and some of the warrants at least, otherwise appropriated. How came it to be re-instated? It was withdrawn, I presume, as a counterpoise to what was thrown off on the north side, by confining the survey to the river. It was, however, withdrawn, as appears by the surveyor's books, on account of an inclusive survey.

How comes it, that the party now
502 *claims this very land in dispute, by it; for, it is the very entry that lies nearest the land?

In fact, this is the only entry that can touch the land in controversy. The surveyor, being interested, had it in his power to smooth over all these matters. But, they appear on the face of the appellant's title papers; and though they are not charged in the bill, but have thus come out by his own exhibits, they are well calculated, I think, to induce a Court to look with no favouring eye on large speculating grants of this kind; especially, where so unjustifiable an attempt is made to use them, against the innocent and fair purchasers and improvers of the soil; and who have made their purchase and improvements with the knowledge and approbation of those now seeking to disturb them. It seems to me, that these acts of encouragement to the appellees to acquire the land, and spend their time and labour in improving it, are enough, of themselves, on the general principles of a Court of Equity, to protect them.

But, if there is any doubt as to this, surely all the circumstances combined are enough to take this case out of that of Noland v. Cromwell. The security into which they were lulled, is surely excuse enough for not filing a caveat. I must content myself, however, with referring to my opinion in the case of Jackson v. M'Gavock (now also under consideration) for a further illustration of this point; believing that on every ground there taken in relation to the caveat question, this is stronger than that case.

But, how it can be taken out of the general doctrine of one standing by, and even encouraging another to lay out his labour, time and money, in acquiring and improving land, and then claiming it, I cannot see.

On the whole, I think the decree ought to be affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL.

This was a case in which Hughes, a subsequent patentee, went into a Court of Equity, seeking to be relieved,

503 *on the ground of superior equity, against a prior patent to Moore, under whom M'Clung claimed. The Chancellor granted the relief prayed; and an appeal was taken from his decision.

It is contended, for the appellant, that the decree is erroneous, because the relief which it grants, is founded solely on grounds, of which the plaintiff in the Court below, might have availed himself on the trial of a Caveat; and that, according to the principles settled by this Court, in the case of Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155, it is not competent to a Court of Chancery to grant relief on such grounds, unless the party had shewn that he was prevented from filing a caveat, by fraud or accident; which, it is said, was not the case in this instance.

A majority of this Court are not disposed to question the propriety of the decision in Noland v. Cromwell; but doubts having been entertained as to the extent of that decision, it becomes necessary to ascertain the principles which it really settles. This is to be done by an examination of the opinions of the Judges, which were delivered seriatim. And in making this examination, it will be useful to determine, in the first place, what is universally admitted to have been settled by Noland v. Cromwell, and then, what it is that is doubtful, or, as to which, a difference of opinion still exists.

The great contest, in the case of Noland v. Cromwell, was whether, in all cases where the question between the parties was as to the equitable right to the patent, it was not as competent to go into a Court of Equity to settle that question, after the patent had issued, as it would have been to go into a Court of Caveat for a settlement of it, before the patent had issued; and that, without assigning any reason for not having filed a caveat. Or, in other words, whether on all questions of this sort, a Court of Chancery had not, after a patent, on current jurisdiction with the Court of Caveat, before the patent. Judge Coalter supported the affirmative of the proposition. But, on *this point, all the other Judges were of a different opinion. All the other Judges were of opinion, that the general rule was that, after a patent had issued, it was not competent to go into a Court of Equity to set it aside, unless the party assigned a good reason for not having filed a caveat. This general rule, may, therefore, be considered as indisputably established.

But, all the Judges who were of opinion that this was the general rule, admitted that there were exceptions to it; that there were some cases in which a Court of Equity would have jurisdiction, after the patent had issued, although no excuse should be suggested or proved for the failure to file a caveat.

The only question, therefore, as to the extent of the decision in Noland v. Cromwell, is as to the exceptions to the general rule established by that case.

A reference to my opinion will show that I thought the case of fraud was an exception; because, fraud constitutes one of the ancient, established and most essential grounds of equitable jurisdiction; and consequently, that in all cases where the acquisition of the patent was tainted with fraud, the Court of Chancery might set it aside, although no reason should be assigned for not having filed a caveat.

To guard against any doubt or misapprehension as to the kind of fraud, which, in my opinion, constitutes an exception to the general rule, so as to authorise a Court of Equity to interfere where no reason is assigned for the failure to file a caveat, I think it proper to state, that I do not mean mere constructive fraud from the implied notice of the entry or location being a matter of record. That would be to destroy the general rule entirely, by giving to the Court of Equity concurrent jurisdiction in all cases whatever, since all our titles to land are founded on entries or locations. I mean actual fraud; such as proceeding to procure a patent after actual notice of another's prior entry, or equitable right.

505 "The other three Judges delivered a joint opinion: and the doubts on the subject arise from the broad expressions used by them, without any express qualification or exception. They say, "the point seems to be, as thus established, that although a party may be let into a Court of Equity, on grounds which he could not have used on the trial of a caveat; and which, in fact, make another case; (in reference to that which he might have availed himself of no such trial;) or, upon a case suggesting and proving that he was prevented by fraud or accident, from prosecuting a caveat; he is not to be sustained in the Court of Equity, on such grounds as were or might have been brought forward on the trial of the caveat." These expressions are so general that, construed literally, they would exclude from the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity, even actual fraud, unless a proper reason were assigned for not filing a caveat. Could the Judges have so intended? I presume not; because it would be to take from the Court of Equity one of its ancient and established grounds of jurisdiction; because, it would be in opposition to former express decisions of the Court upon the very point; White v. Jones, 1 Wash. 116; and because the same Judges, or at least two of them, in the subsequent cases of Preston v. M'Kinney, and Christian v. Christian, granted relief in cases of actual fraud, although no reason was assigned for not having filed a caveat.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that all the Judges who laid down the general rule in the case of Noland v. Cromwell, intended that actual fraud should constitute an exception to it; and, consequently, that according to the true construction of that case, a party wishing to set aside a patent, may go into a Court of Chancery for that purpose, without assigning any reason for not having filed a caveat, in all cases where the acquisition of the patent is tainted with actual fraud.

It remains to apply this principle to this case.

506 "The entries under which M'Clung claims, are prior to that by which Hughes claims the land in controversy. Those entries shew by their terms that they were made on the south of Gauley river. The surveyor's certificate of survey recorded in his office, and transmitted to the Register's office, states, that the land embraced by it lies on the south side of Gauley river. The survey began at a point on the south side of the river, and a considerable distance, several hundred poles from it. From that point it ran southerly, a great distance; then westerly, nearly parallel to the general course of the river, and then northerly to the top of Gauley river ridge, without stating how far from the river, but certainly on the south side of the river. From this point the survey calls for a straight course to the beginning. Gauley river is a large river, certainly one of the largest in that part of the State. There is no mention made of the river in the survey, except that it describes the land as lying on the south side; and except that the last corner, is stated, as aforesaid, to be on the top of Gauley river ridge. The closing line, from this last corner to the beginning, was not actually run and marked, as the law requires, but was laid down by protraction. It was, however, a straight line; and although it was fifteen miles long, yet as the point from which it was to begin, was on the south side, and as the point at which it was to end, was several hundred poles from the river, on the same side, no idea was entertained, by any body, not even by the surveyor, that it would ever touch, much less, that it would cross the river. This is abundantly proved in the cause; for, it appears that even the surveyor, when he discovered, some time after, that it crossed the river, was greatly "astonished." It is evident from all these circumstances, that neither Moore nor M'Clung intended, by their entries, to cover land on the north side of the river; nor did they intend that their survey should cross the river and take lands on the north side. And although the closing line of the survey does in fact, according to its 507 *course, cross the river and embrace the land in controversy, yet the failure actually to run and to mark that line, (as it was their duty, according to law, to do) prevented a discovery of the fact, that the course of the line would lead them across the river, and thus left all others in the just and reasonable belief that the lands, on the north side of the river, were open to any adventurer. It was after the survey of Moore and M'Clung, was thus made, and under these circumstances, that Hughes made his location on the land in controversy; and some time after he had made the location, he was encouraged by a message from M'Clung, not only to go on and perfect his title, but to lay out his money in improving the land, establishing a ferry, building houses, &c. which, as M'Clung said, would accommodate travellers, and promote emigration; and thus encouraged the settlement, and increase the value of the neighbouring lands; much, if not most of which belonged to M'Clung. Under such circumstances, I think it was actual fraud in M'Clung, to attempt to avail himself of his legal title for defeating the rights of Hughes; especially if Hughes has lost the opportunity of vesting his money advantageously in other vacant lands, which is probably the fact. And this fraud requires that his patent should be vacated.

This view of the subject renders it unnecessary to enquire whether Hughes has shewn an excuse for not having filed a caveat. But, if it were necessary that he should do so, I am clearly of opinion that he has shewn a sufficient one.

In speaking of the excuse for not filing a caveat, the Judges, in the case of Noland v. Cromwell, say that the party must shew that he was prevented by fraud or accident. The real question in Noland v. Cromwell, was, whether the party should be allowed to go into a Court of Equity, without an excuse; not what was a sufficient excuse. The words fraud and accident, were, therefore, used only as examples, and not as being the only grounds *of excuse. I am clearly of opinion, that mistake would be as just a ground of excuse, as the two circumstances that were mentioned as examples.

In this case, the mistake under which Hughes laboured, that the lands in controversy were not embraced by the survey of Moore and M'Clung, a mistake produced by the acts and improper omissions of M'Clung, (viz: the calls of the entries and of the survey for the south side of the river only, the omission to run and to mark the closing line, and above all, the message of M'Clung to Hughes,) sufficiently accounts for his failure to file a caveat. How should it be required of him to file a caveat to prevent Moore and M'Clung from getting a patent for his land, when Moore and M'Clung, themselves, neither knew, expected, nor intended, that their patent would or should touch his land? To this might be added the information received by Hughes from Welch, the surveyor who made the survey. I put out of view the fact of Welch being interested in the survey, and regard him only as surveyor. He was applied to by Hughes for a copy of the courses of the survey, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the survey embraced his entry, in order that if it did, he might withdraw his entry, lift his warrant and locate it elsewhere; which he might, very probably, have done advantageously, at that time. Welch sent him word that he would not take his money by unnecessarily copying the courses; for, that the survey did not cross the river. Now, although I do not rely on this declaration of Welch as fixing fraud on Moore and M'Clung, yet I do rely on it as shewing that Hughes laboured under such a mistake as ought to excuse him for not having filed a caveat. When neither the calls of the entries, nor of the survey, were calculated to excite the least suspicion that the survey had crossed the river, the direct and positive information of the surveyor, that the survey did not cross the river to that side on which the lands in controversy lie, affords a sufficient excuse, on the ground of mistake, for failing to file a caveat. I will *go farther and say, that if there had been no message from M'Clung or Welch, to Hughes; if there had been nothing but the entries and the survey, even they are so expressed as to be calculated to produce a belief that they would not touch any land on the north side of the river; and this would have been a sufficient excuse for not filing a caveat. When the description which the party himself makes in the entry, and the description which a sworn officer makes in the survey, leads necessarily to the belief that the land lies on the south side of a river, there is no obligation on a party wishing to locate lands on the north side, to trace the lines actually run, for the purpose of satisfying himself that they do not take in lands on the north side; and much less would there be an obligation on him to be at the expense of employing a surveyor to run lines mentioned in a survey, but neither actually run nor marked.

I am for affirming the decree.

Jackson v. M'Gavock.

June, 1827.

Equitable Relief—Failure to Prosecute Caveat. *—In this case, and the preceding, the doctrine in the case of Noland v. Cromwell, was re-viewed. See the result in the note to the preceding case.

This was an appeal from the Wythe Chancery Court, where David M'Gavock filed a bill against Thomas Jackson. The whole subject is so fully unfolded in the following opinions, that it is only necessary to refer to them.

Wickham, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

JUDGE CARR.

In 1806, the appellee filed his bill against the appellant, stating that the plaintiff was the assignee of a tract of land derived from one Razor: that the defendant was owner of a tract derived from Madison & Co., being part of the pre-emption right attached to a settlement called "The Pasture:" that Razor's was the eldest entry and survey; but that the defendant has the eldest patent. The bill then goes on to detail the facts and circumstances which give him, in equity, the better title; and prays that the defendant may be decreed to convey to him the legal title.

This brief statement shews, that in its origin, this case presented the naked point so often decided in this Court, and at length so solemnly in Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155; whether equity could interpose to set up the younger against the elder patent, where no caveat had been taken out, and no reason for the omission was stated in the bill. Noland v. Cromwell, was decided in 1814.

In 1819, the plaintiff had leave to amend his bill. The object of this amendment was to furnish ground of excuse to the plaintiff for having failed to resort to the caveat. The ground is this: that on the 10th of February, 1789, Newell, a deputy surveyor, surveyed the land claimed by the plaintiff: that on the 6th of June of the same year, the same surveyor made, for those under who the defendant claims, the surveys which conflict with the plaintiff's; and he expressly charges that the lines of these last surveys, so far as they interfere with the plaintiff's, were never actually run, but protracted from the survey made for Razor; and he refers to the connected survey, to illustrate the fact. This, he believes, was done with fraudulent intent, in order to keep the said Razor in utter 511 ignorance that there *was any interference; and the fraud, he avers, succeeded, as the said Razor, an ignorant man, residing upwards of fifty miles from the surveyor's office, never discovered any such interference; nor had the plaintiff the least knowledge of it, until the patent had issued. Hence it was impossible that a caveat could have been entered: This is the ground of excuse.

Before I test its sufficiency by the standard of Noland v. Cromwell, it will be proper to ascertain what is the authority, at this day, of Noland v. Cromwell itself. The Court have said, that this case shall be taken as a correct exposition of the law, at the date of the decision; but, that the effect of subsequent statutes on it, is open to argument. Accordingly, it has been contended, that the act of 1814, giving the scire facias to repeal patents, and the declaration in the revision of 1819, that the failure to caveat shall not affect the legal or equitable rights of the party, have prostrated Noland v. Cromwell, proclaiming in language not to be mistaken, the legislative will and understanding on the subject.

Noland v. Cromwell, pronounced the law to be, "that though a party may be let into equity, on grounds which he could not have used on the trial of the caveat, or upon a case suggesting and proving that he was prevented by fraud or accident from prosecuting his caveat; he is not to be sustained in the Court of Equity, on such grounds as were or might have been brought forward on the trial of the caveat." The Legislature certainly have not undertaken to declare, that this is a misconstruction of the law. They have understood better the line which separates their powers from those of the Judiciary. But what have they done? In 1814, they passed a law "declaring and regulating the practice of suing out and prosecuting writs of scire facias to repeal letters patent." Any person wishing to prosecute a scire facias, to repeal letters patent for lands, &c. either because they had been obtained by false suggestions, had issued contrary to law, 512 or to the prejudice of his private rights, shall apply by petition to the Court or Judge, who shall direct the clerk to issue a writ to the Register, commanding him to certify the grant, &c. On the return of this writ, the grant is to be recorded, the scire facias issues, and the case proceeds according to the directions of the act, which are very special. Now, surely, it need hardly be observed, that this act can apply only to cases brought under it: that it can have no influence on a bill addressed to the general jurisdiction of equity, even since its passage; much less, on a bill filed long before, and depending in Court when it became a law.

In the revision of 1819, the law, after repeating what former statutes had enacted on the subject of caveats, has these words: "The omission, however, of any person claiming such better right to avail himself of the remedy by caveat, hereby given, shall in no wise be construed to bar or hinder such person, from asserting such better right in law or equity, in the same manner as if no such remedy by caveat had been given him." The whole frame and structure of this sentence shew, that it is prospective entirely. It is one of a large class of cases, in which the judicial decisions point out to the Legislature what they consider an evil, and they apply the remedy. But, the remedy always looks forward. The Legislature do not mean to say to the Judges, "You must decide thus and thus, in cases now depending before you." This would be usurpation. This act, then, while it acknowledged the rule established by Noland v. Cromwell to be, at that time, the existing law, did not intend to affect its operation in past or depending cases, but merely to provide for the future; and if any thing further were necessary to prove this, the saving at the end of the act, is conclusive to that purpose. Noland v. Cromwell, then, gives the law to the case before us; and we must examine whether under this law, the plaintiff has suggested and proved a sufficient excuse for failing to caveat. The excuse is, that instead of an actual survey by running over the ground, the notoriety of which 513 "would have put the opposite party on his guard, the surveyor merely protracted the lines of the last surveys from the courses and distances of the survey made for Razor. I will not consider what weight this allegation would deserve, if proved; because, to my mind, it is wholly disproved by the answer, which denies it; by the plat, which shews that the lines in the first and second surveys are not the same; and by Newell, the surveyor, who swears that he actually ran every line in the last surveys but the closing line, which is always protracted. The plaintiff states that Razor lived more than fifty miles from the surveyor's office, and that both he and the plaintiff were entirely ignorant of the interference, until the defendant's patent had issued; and this ignorance the Chancellor considered as giving him clear jurisdiction of the cause. But surely, this was in the very teeth of Noland v. Cromwell. It is there said, that the caveat law meant to prevent and cut up the numberless doubts and disputes, as to notice or no notice, and to establish a general criterion: that the notice principally established by the act, is the entry in the surveyor's book, which is open and accessible to all: that the entry, when followed up by a survey, which the law also provides, shall be made shortly after, affords complete notice of the claim thereby set up, and operates as an invitation to persons having prior pretensions, to bring them forward by way of caveat. Of this survey, (the Court add) it is not competent to adjacent adventurers, to aver an ignorance.

If it be said, that there was fraud in making the surveys of the defendant, I answer, 1st, that the only fraud suggested is the protracting, instead of surveying, the last surveys, which is disproved; 2d, that the existence of fraud will not take the case out of Noland v. Cromwell, unless it be also suggested and proved that the party was prevented from prosecuting a caveat; or, that upon the trial of such caveat, he could not have brought forward the fraud.

514 "The whole ground, then, taken by the amended bill, to excuse the failure to caveat, is taken away; and under the authority of Noland v. Cromwell, I must hold that the decree be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

JUDGE GREEN.

In the case of Hughes v. M'Clung,* I stated the reason of my opinion, that after grant issued, any one claiming a prior equity against the grantee, can in no case have relief in equity, unless upon the ground of actual fraud in the acquisition of the legal title, or unless the party was prevented from prosecuting his caveat, by fraud, accident or mistake.

In this case, the plaintiff alleges, that Razor, under whom he claims, was prevented from filing his caveat, by reason of a fraud in the surveyor, and the party under whom the defendant claimed, in returning a survey not actually made upon the ground, but made out by protraction; and that Paul Razor, being an ignorant man and residing more than fifty miles from the surveyor's office, did not discover the interference of this survey with his, until after the patent issued upon it. The suggestion of fraud in protracting the survey, for the purpose of keeping Razor in ignorance of the fact of the interference, is disproved by the surveyor, who testifies that he actually surveyed all the lines, except the closing line, and they were marked. The allegations as to Razor's ignorance and residence, are neither confessed nor denied by the answer, and are not proved. Both these facts were capable of proof; and if they were of any consequence in the cause, cannot be taken to be true, without proofs. Razor's entry was made on the 11th of November, 1782; his survey, on the 10th of February, 1783; and the other survey was made on the 6th of 515 June, 1783. His entry describes the land located, as "that upon which he resided; and both surveys being made early in the year succeeding Razor's location, and within four months of each other, there is the strongest reason to believe, that he resided on the land in controversy when the survey under which the defendant claims was made, and had actual notice thereof. The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to no relief, unless the legal title, under which the defendant claims, was tainted with actual fraud.

The surveyor, who made the survey of the 6th of June, 1783, (under which the defendant claims) and the persons entitled to that survey, had actual notice of Razor's prior entry and survey; and if the party entitled to the warrant under which that survey was made, had no just and equitable right to appropriate the land, notwithstanding the prior entry and survey, his doing so with full notice, was an actual fraud.

The plaintiff claims under a treasury warrant; the defendant, under a settlement and pre-emption warrant. Razor's entry and survey were made before the pre-emption warrant issued, and before the settlement right was surveyed. But, the existence of the settlement right was known; for, Razor's entry calls for it as the Pasture Settlement.

At the time of Razor's entry and survey, the state of things, in respect to the lands in the neighbourhood, was this: On the south side of New river, was a tract of land already surveyed, called Burgaman's Bottom; a corner of which is called for in Sayers' subsequent survey, under his pre-emption warrant made June 6, 1783, under an entry of December 10, 1782. Far below, in a deep northern bend of the river, Robert Sayers had a settlement right, surveyed the 31st of January, 1782, as the record is; probably in 1783. The intermediate land on the river was entered for by Sayers, under a pre-emption warrant, on the 10th of December, 1782. This entry surrounded Sayers' settlement survey, on three sides, (the river being on the other side;) and, besides taking all the land between his settlement and the tract called Burgaman's Bottom, extended

516 *down the river, to the settlement called the Pasture. The settlement, and the pre-emption thus located and surveyed, were called the Lead Mine tract. Next below this tract on the river, lay the Pasture Settlement. Next below the Pasture, and at the point where the river takes a great southern and southeastern turn, lay Samuel Ewing's settlement already surveyed; beginning on the river at the lower corner (or rather, what was afterwards the lower corner of the Pasture Settlement) and running southeasterly to the river, a great distance below, including the whole tract by one line and the river. This line ran nearly parallel with the lower line of the Lead Mine tract, leaving for the Pasture Settlement, between these two lines, only a space about 250 poles wide.

In this state of things, Razor located his treasury warrant, calling for both the Pasture Settlement and Ewing's line, and surveyed before the Pasture Settlement was surveyed; and if he had surveyed according to his entry, there would not have been one inch of land unappropriated, adjoining the Pasture Settlement, upon which the pre-emption warrant, attached to the Pasture Settlement, could be located; for, it could only be located on lands adjoining the settlement. The Pasture Settlement was bounded by S. Ewing's settlement on the west, by the river on the north, by Sayers' pre-emption on the east, and by Razor's entry on the south. The pre-emption warrant was not issued when Razor entered and surveyed; but, his entry was liable to yield to the pre-emption, if the warrant should issue at any time within the period allowed by law, and which was from time to time enlarged, until long after the period when these transactions took place. The pre-emption warrant was issued on the 18th of February, 1783; and the holder had a right to locate it upon the land entered and surveyed by Razor, under a treasury warrant, even if all the other adjoining land had been unappropriated.

517 *The owners of the pre-emption warrant, however, located their warrant on the 30th of April, 1783, to adjoin the Pasture Settlement, and the land called Burgaman's Bottom. They intended to take the very land covered by Sayers' pre-emption warrant already surveyed. Without taking this, the survey could not be made in the proportions prescribed by law.

For although, in consequence of Razor's survey not being made according to his entry, there was a narrow space left between his survey, and that afterwards made of the Pasture Settlement, through which opening the pre-emption warrant might have been surveyed, so as to run from the south side of the Pasture to Burgaman's Bottom land in the rear of Sayers' survey, and in a long narrow slip, probably ten times as long as it was wide; the locator certainly did not intend to lay off the land in this way. It would have been contrary to law, and the land of no value to him. The locator of the pre-emption warrant, either was ignorant that this land was previously occupied by Sayers' pre-emption survey, or intended to contest with him the right to pre-emption in this very land. Probably, this latter was the fact; for, on the 6th of June, 1783, the parties met, and Sayer exchanged his settlement and pre-emption for the Pasture Settlement and pre-emption; and it was agreed, that the lands should be surveyed according to the lines then agreed on. The balance, and more than the quantity of the balance of Sayers' pre-emption, was thereupon surveyed under his entry of December 10th, 1782, adjoining the Burgaman's Bottom land and the Lead Mine tract; and the Pasture Settlement was surveyed, and the pre-emption belonging to it, to the amount of 858 acres, was surveyed in three surveys; including the whole of Razor's survey, except about 66 acres, which have been since located under the same pre-emption warrant, but is not patented.

I have already said, that notwithstanding Razor's entry and survey, the pre-emption warrant might have been located upon the same land, in the first instance;
518 and the *question is, whether the right to locate it on that land was forever lost, by locating it elsewhere. I think not; especially as to one locating before the issuing and entry of the pre-emption warrant; however, it might be as to one induced to locate the adjoining land, by the fact of the party entitled to the pre-emption making his election by entry of other land. I incline to think, that as the owner of a treasury warrant might withdraw his entry and locate it elsewhere, the owner of a pre-emption warrant might shift his entry from one piece of land to another, falling within the terms of his entry, at any time during the period allowed by law for entering the pre-emption warrant, however this may be, when the first entry is upon land, to which no other has a better right. If the first entry is upon land to which another has a better right, and the entry could not be withdrawn and re-entered, the party would lose the benefit of his pre-emption; and in that case, he has, I think, a clear right to transfer his entry, having, by mistake, entered land, which he could not acquire; and this, particularly, against a locator under a treasury warrant, entering before the pre-emption warrant was issued.

Sayers' warrant, entry and survey, all preceding the issuing of the Pasture pre-emption warrant, the presumption is, that his right to the land first entered, under the Pasture pre-emption, was the best; and after a lapse of upwards of twenty years, arising from the laches of Razor and the plaintiff, this presumption cannot be overruled upon surmises not amounting to proofs, that the contrary was the fact. The owner of the Pasture pre-emption warrant might have withdrawn his original entry, and entered it upon the land, which was actually surveyed under it; in which case, his preferable right would have been unquestionable. The only difference in justice, between a survey of this land, with or without such a previous entry, is, that an entry would serve to give notice to Razor, so that he might, as it is said, withdraw his entry, and locate the warrant elsewhere. But this he could not 519 have done. The *warrant was merged in the survey; and it was his own folly to proceed so far as to survey, with the possibility of a pre-emption right displacing him. Taylor v. Myers, 7 Wheat. 24.

But, if such notice could have benefited Razor in any way, I am satisfied he had it in fact. He lived upon the land when it was surveyed, and no doubt was satisfied, that the other party had, in substance, a right to take the land, whether he proceeded strictly in conformity with the forms prescribed by law, or not, and acquiesced until after the patents issued in 1788, and then sold to the plaintiff; who, I have no doubt, purchased a chance, as the answer alleges, for a trifle, and was one of those hunting up stale claims to disturb the titles of others. He himself did not pursue his claim so acquired, until upwards of twenty-three years after the survey, when the parol evidence, which might have a decisive influence upon the equities of the parties, is probably lost.

I do not think that there was any actual fraud, which could affect the conscience of the party, and deprive him of his legal advantage. The decree must be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

JUDGE COALTER.

How far the case of Noland v. Cromwell, will operate on this case, seems to me to depend very much on several matters of fact, arising on the consideration of the merits of the cause; and I shall therefore proceed, first, to examine them as if they were open to examination, notwithstanding that case.

The first, and a very important enquiry is, what lands were covered, or intended to be covered, by the following entry; for, it is under that entry, that the lands in dispute have been surveyed and granted to the appellant, or those he claims under.

520 *1783, April 30th, Thomas Madison & Co., by virtue of a pre-emption warrant of 1000 acres, No. 2373, dated 18th of February, 1783, enters the same adjoining his settlement called the Pasture, and the lands called Burgaman's Bottom."

Although Thomas Madison & Co. are not called the Lead Mine Company in this entry, they are so denominated in the survey of their settlement right, and in the surveys made under this entry. They were a company, who had it in view to procure, and probably to work, a Lead mine, which it was supposed lay in that tract of country, between the Pasture Settlement and Burgaman's Bottom. One of the surveys, to wit, that made for Robert Sayers for 794 acres, (hereafter mentioned) calls for the head of Lead Mine branch, in the direction aforesaid; and the contract made between the company and Sayers (hereafter also mentioned) describes this tract of country as the Lead Mine hills. The Lead Mine tract of land, then, was doubtless the object of the Lead Mine Company.

But, one Robert Sayers had procured certificates of settlement and pre-emption, by which he had covered a considerable portion of this territory, before the entry in question was made. It appears by the certificate of survey of his settlement right, made on the 8th of November, 1782, that his certificate of settlement was obtained on the 13th of September, 1782; but, whether that of the company, for their settlement, was obtained before or after this, does not clearly appear; nor which was the earliest settlement, does not appear in this record. This settlement right, however, was surveyed by Sayers in November, 1782, six months or more before the entry of the company aforesaid.

Robert Sayers also, on the 28th of January, 1783, by virtue of a pre-emption warrant of 1000 acres, dated the 10th of December, 1782, No. 2356, enters the same joining his entry and survey on his settlement, on the east side of New river. As well this entry as the warrant, 521 it is true, are dated before the date of the pre-emption warrant *of the company, and even the survey for 794 acres, made by virtue thereof, is anterior both to the date of the warrant, and the entry thereon by the company. Yet nevertheless, it may have been, and probably was, the intention of the Lead Mine Company, to claim the Lead Mines against Sayers' pre-emption claim at least, if not his settlement, either by contesting his settlement right, or by shewing their settlement to be the oldest, and to carry with it priority of pre-emption right; or, they may have intended to dispute the matter on the ground that Sayers' location of his pre-emption warrant was too vague, inasmuch as it does not state on what side of the settlement survey it was to join, and left the matter as open in that respect, as the warrant itself, so as to join on any part of the settlement survey he might thereafter select; or finally, which is not very probable, they may have been ignorant of Sayers' claim, and made their location, so as to cover the Lead Mines, believing that tract to be vacant.

But, supposing them to be well acquainted with Sayers' claim, and that it was the best, they may still have made their entry or location in the direction of Burgaman's Bottom, with a view of covering some four or five hundred acres of the Lead Mine hills then vacant, and not included in Sayers' pre-emption survey.

I have endeavoured, therefore, to discover where the settlement and pre-emption surveys of Sayers, above referred to, lie in the Lead Mine survey, as laid down in the connected plat in the cause; and by comparing the various surveys, and notorious and common corners together, I have discovered that Sayers' settlement survey begins on or near the river, about as far above little a, as the length of the line a, b; to wit, 100 poles; that it runs around, and again comes to the river, at a point about 250 poles below the letters J. H.; and then down the river, to the beginning. I find also, that the pre-emption survey of 794 acres aforesaid, begins on the river, where the settlement survey calls to strike 522 it, and reversing the courses *of that survey, runs back with it, to or near the river; thence 100 poles to the point a; thence to a hickory corner at c, on the west side of Burgaman's branch; thence two courses up that branch, in all 114 poles. It then leaves the branch, and finally arrives at the point m; which is a notorious one in several of the surveys; and so goes round to the river, and down it as aforesaid; leaving out vacant land towards Burgaman's tract, to the amount say of 470 acres, afterwards surveyed by virtue of Sayers' pre-emption warrant, as will be hereafter more particularly noticed. Thus the company may at least have had this minor object, or this portion of the mine tract, in view, if not the whole. Or, there may have been, and probably was, other vacant land lying in that direction, and which was afterwards covered by the survey of 573 acres; of which particular notice will be taken hereafter. But I incline to think, that they had the whole mine hills in view, either through ignorance of Sayers' claim, or intending to contest it. For, if they knew of it, and intended to submit to it, nothing would have been more natural than to have called for it, as well as Burgaman's Bottom, in making their location. The 470 acres of Lead Mine hills, were surely no small object to the Lead Mine Company. Suffice it to say, that from all these reasons, I am well satisfied that the calls of their location, not only cover the lands lying in a direction almost opposite to those now in controversy, but that that land was the real object of the company; and that it would be very natural for every other adventure to suppose, that the Lead Mine Company would wish to acquire the Lead Mine tract, or as much of it as they could, must be apparent to every one.

Their location, then, of their pre-emption warrant, did not cover the land in controversy, but lay entirely in an opposite direction.

How then did these parties stand at this period of time?

Robert Sayers, on the 13th of September, 1782, had obtained from the commissioners a certificate for 400 acres, *on 523 the S. E. side of New river, including J. Castell's improvement; and on the 8th of November, 1782, he obtained a pre-emption warrant for 1000 acres on the S. E. side of New river, and adjoining his survey on his settlement. This he enters, as aforesaid, giving no further notice of the manner he intended to survey, than his warrant prescribed. But shortly afterwards, to wit, on the 31st of January, 1783, he proceeded to survey 792 acres thereof, binding all round on the settlement survey, as is above stated, leaving 208 acres unsurveyed of that warrant, and leaving also, other vacant land in the direction of Burgaman's Bottom, to the amount, in all, of 470 acres. At this time Sayers lived on what was called the Pasture tract, a considerable distance above his settlement right above mentioned.

On the 11th of November, Paul Razor, by a State warrant, enters 500 acres on the south side of New river, opposite the upper end of Samuel Ewing's land, to join his patent line, and the place Sayers lives on, called the Pasture, to include the improvement said Razor lives on, and those made by William Burke and Samuel Byrd; and he proceeds, on the 10th of February, 1783, to survey 274 acres of this entry. This is the land in dispute.

So far it seems, that this entry did not conflict with Sayers' claim on his settlement and pre-emption; nor did it interfere with the Pasture tract, or any settlement right that then was obtained, or might thereafter be obtained for it. Razor was a settler in the country, had purchased his warrant, and promptly surveyed his lands; his settlement, I presume, not being of a date old enough to entitle him to a settlement right from the commissioners. But it was surely enough to shew, that he was no speculator, but equitably entitled to the land, unless against those having superior equity. This could only be in relation to any pre-emption right, which might attach to the Pasture settlement. It would probably have to give place to that, but to nothing else.

524 *I am not entirely satisfied, that a pre-emption warrant will over-reach an entry made by a common treasury warrant, made before such certificate of pre-emption was obtained. The original act of May, 1779, chap. 12, sec. 5, directed the pre-emption warrants to be entered within twelve months, or the right of pre-emption would be forfeited; and the act of the same session chap. 13, sec. 3, provides, in order to prevent interferences, that no entry or location by a treasury warrant shall be made before the 1st of May then next following. See also what is said by this Court in the case of Jones v. Williams, &c. 1 Wash. 231, and in 2 Wash. 47.

But, it is not necessary to settle this question in this case; and I am not to be considered as deciding it, one way or the other. It may be too, that Razor had a settlement right made after 1778, which would have entitled him to a pre-emption of 400 acres; and which, as I understand the act, would have taken precedence of the pre-emption attached to the Pasture tract; but that he preferred taking it under a treasury warrant, to save the trouble of going before the commissioners.

Neither the certificate of settlement for the Pasture tract, nor that for the pre-emption thereto attached, is in the record; so that it does not appear when they were obtained. Most generally, I believe, they were obtained at the same time; the one following as incident to the other, if demanded, as we may well presume it was in this case. For, the Lead Mine Company could only acquire any portion of the Lead Mine Hills, by their pre-emption, as the Pasture Settlement did not extend to them. As to them, the pre-emption right was the main object. But the pre-emption warrant, as above described in the entry, was obtained on the 18th of February, 1783, and entered on the 30th of April following; and both of them, posterior to the entry and survey of Razor; and thereupon the party, with a full knowledge of Razor's actual residence on his land, under his prior entry and survey, proceeds to locate 525 his *pre-emption warrant, so as to call for lands not at all interfering with the land in dispute. If we confine our enquiry to this point of time, how would the parties stand? Suppose Razor had obtained his warrant; but believing his settlement must be taken, if the Lead Mine Company should elect to locate their pre-emption warrant in that direction, had waited to see what they would do; and finding they had located on the other side, had then made his entry. Would it have been competent for the company, after having thus made their election, to change their location and make another on the other side, after finding that the lands they had located were either claimed by superior rights, or were of inferior quality? It seems to me, that they could not. It was enough surely, to hold all the community in suspense as to what side of the settlement the pre-emption was to join, until the election was made; but that once made, it could not be necessary that the whole country should still stand in suspense, until a survey was made, in order to see whether the election would not be changed. If Razor had returned his plat, and it had been caveated on the ground that the company might change their election, and re-locate on that side, or until they might peradventure survey on that side, as they afterwards did by virtue of this same entry, what would have been said to them as to this matter?

The posterior laws, extending the time of making entries on pre-emption warrants, only extended to cases where they had not been entered at all, and were not intended to enable the party who had made his election, to change it and make a new entry. These pre-emptions were not so highly favoured as that. The party was to pay for the land the same price as for a treasury warrant; was to locate promptly, or forfeit his right to pre-emption; but then he might use it as a treasury warrant, either to cover the same land, if not before entered for by another; and if that was done, then he might take other lands elsewhere, as by any other warrant. May 526 Session, 1779, *ch. 12. The short time thus limited for its original entry, and the other provisions in the act of 1779, Ibid. ch. 13, sec. 3, and subsequent acts, October, 1779, ch. 27, sec. 2; May, 1782, ch. 49, sec. 7; October, 1784; clearly shew, that such location once made, bound the party, so that he could not change it from time to time, as it might suit him to do so. Surely, if his failure to enter deprived him of the privilege intended by the act, so as to let in other adventurers, his election to take it in a particular direction, would let them in on the residuum. Nor will Razor stand in a worse situation, than if he had not made his entry until after this election had been made. That election shews that the party did not choose to interfere with him, and was no notice to him to lift his warrant, and enter it elsewhere, but the reverse. Taking the case up then at this stage, and there can be no question as to whom the land in controversy then belonged.

It remains to see what followed afterwards, and whether it has varied these rights.

No survey had been made by the company at this time. A survey of their settlement right could not possibly interfere with Razor's survey; and had they proceeded to survey their pre-emption right according to its location, there would have been no interference. It surely cannot be contended, that if the entry is discovered to be made on another's land, that circumstance would justify surveying that entry wherever vacant land can be found, and entirely in an opposite direction, even without making a new entry; but in that case, the warrant only stands as other warrants, although he might originally have elected to take that land. Much less, would it authorize a survey of that other land, without any entry for it. All the cases, Johnson v. Brown, 3 Call, 259; Hunter v. Hall, 1 Call, 206, &c. prove, that the location must be pursued where it designates with certainty the lands intended to be covered; and also, that it must have reasonable certainty. Here, there is no doubt as to the land intended, which too, were 527 then unpatented, *and for aught that appears, may have been subject to this location. For they may, and probably did, locate that identical land, as aforesaid, with a view of contesting Sayers' survey, on the ground that their settlement was the oldest, and drew to it the oldest pre-emption. There were also 470 acres of vacant land in that direction, not surveyed by Sayers; and when there are two entries on the same land, and the first locator proceeds to survey, if he does not take all, then I presume, they had a right to survey what was left. For, there is no case in this Court, going to say, that the second locator is not entitled to the residue, in such case; but, the reverse seems to be pretty strongly indicated. Currie v. Martin, 3 Call, 28, 36; Johnson v. Brown, Ibid. 260, 268. The policy of the law was to have the lands granted, so as to derive revenue. It may be, if the first locator supposes that he has gotten his quantity, and if on calculation, (which can generally be made in an hour by the surveyor,) he finds that he has not, he might open his lines, and take in more land, before closing the survey, as he may wish to have his land in several tracts. But it must be, I conceive, one continued act of surveying; otherwise, it will be considered an abandonment. If he can suspend, without abandoning, for months, he can for years, and as long as the Legislature continues the time to survey; and thus keep the second locator out, even so as perhaps to forfeit his entry. The laws giving further time to survey, were never intended to produce this effect. No further time was necessary, to one who has made his survey. The act only provides too, that warrants may be carried into effect by one or more surveys, and may be exchanged, &c., not that entries are to lie open in this way. If the party does not survey all the land he enters by his warrant, he may get an exchange warrant, and locate elsewhere. This the law provides for.

This is my present impression of the law. If I am right in this, it then appears that, exclusive of the Pasture, or 528 *Settlement tract, there was then even vacant land, answering to the calls of the entry, to the amount of 470 acres; and if, after surveying this, they had been allowed to run in a different direction, and to take all the vacant land, so as not to interfere with that in dispute, there would have been, in addition to the above quantity, all that part of survey No. 2, and No. 4, which lies outside of the land in dispute, to the amount of at least 360 acres, and the whole of survey No. 5, of 240 acres; in all, 1070 acres.

But, instead of the Company proceeding to survey according to their entry, and contesting the matter with Sayers, or at farthest, proceeding to survey in the manner last mentioned, they enter into an agreement with Sayers, on the 6th of June, 1783, by which he gives up all his right, title and pretensions, he has or may have, to the Lead Mine hills, the 1000 acre survey, (what survey this is, does not appear in the record,) and the Bottom, called Buchanan's Bottom, (perhaps a misnomer of Burgaman's Bottom,) to the Lead Mine Company, for and in consideration of a tract called the Pasture tract; which is given in exchange, according to lines and courses now agreed on by both parties, and to be surveyed. It would seem by this, that the Pasture tract, or settlement right, was alone given in exchange; but the fact was otherwise, as appears by letter from Lynch, who negotiated this business, to Thomas Madison, another of the company, and their agent, dated 21st of July, 1795. What lines were agreed on, is not specified in the agreement; but the after acts of the parties shew, that Sayers was not to survey the pre-emption entry, according to its calls, on the Lead Mine hills towards Burgaman's Bottom. His pretensions thereto, under his original rights, were abandoned and transferred; and he was to survey the company claim, according to lines then agreed on. This part of the agreement shews that a conflict between these parties, as to the Lead Mine hills,

529 *was thus put an end to. The parties then proceeded thus. Instead of assigning the entries and surveys, as they then stood, they used each other's names in making the surveys, and those surveys were afterwards assigned; and those surveys are all made, or rather purported to be made, (for the fact could not be so) on the same sixth of June, 1783. When they were in reality made, and which was made first, does not appear. A survey is recorded as of that date for Robert Sayers, though in fact for the company, by virtue of his pre-emption warrant, for 470 acres, although this same surveyor, James Nowell, had shortly before surveyed 794 acres, by virtue of this same warrant; thus giving to the company 264 acres surplus, and for which there was no warrant; and which is within ten acres of as much as the land now in controversy. So that if, instead of this fraud on the public, as well as on this individual, they had even left that much of the Mine hills to be covered by their entry, now belonging to Sayers, this controversy need not have taken place. Sayers, on his part, under this agreement, though in the name of the company, proceeds to have the Pasture survey of 322 acres made, No. 1. He also proceeds to have made, or recorded rather, as of that date, the following surveys, by virtue of their pre-emption warrant, to wit; survey No. 2, of 214 acres; No. 9, of 338 acres; and No. 5, of 240 acres; in all 792 acres. And afterwards, to wit, on the 18th of October, 1789, another of 66 acres, No. 3; in all, 858 acres; No. 2 and No. 4, interfering with the land in dispute, and No. 3, taking the residue of it.

It is charged in the bill, that there was also a survey made by virtue of this same pre-emption warrant, on the 12th of June, 1783, for 573 acres. This, added to the 792 acres, (the amount of the three surveys above mentioned, and purporting to be made on the 6th of June,) would make 1365 acres; or 365 acres more than the warrant. And if the 66 acres are added, it will make 431 acres more.

530 *On this subject, the answer says, "that the respondent has heard and believes, that a survey made for the Lead Mine Company, of 573 acres, was found on the records of the surveyor, dated the 12th of June, 1783, purporting to be made by the same pre-emption warrant as the surveys before described, (to wit, those above mentioned, including that of 66 acres;) but that it was an error, which was rectified by returning that survey, by virtue of another warrant; and he insists, that no act done by the Lead Mine Company, on the 12th of June, could affect the surveys made on the 6th. For, on the 6th of June, the company exchanged the said pre-emption warrant, and the settlement also, with Sayers. Now, it is apparent, that all these surveys were made after the 6th; though this convenient surveyor makes them all bear that date. For, the very agreement of transfer and exchange says, the surveys were to be made according to lines then agreed on; that is, I presume, division lines, so as to save the Lead Mine hills to the company. All these surveys, then, though in the name of the company, were, in fact, afterwards made for Sayers; this one of 573 acres being one of them.

Mark these transactions. The Pasture land, and the pre-emption attached to it, were no object to the Lead Mine Company, unless they could, by the latter, get the Lead Mine hills. But to Sayers, who went for agricultural and pasture lands, and who lived on, and was doubtless attached to, the Pasture tract, the Lead Mine hills were of no value, except as an object of speculation. He would easily be persuaded to give them up, and get other lands, such as he wanted; and thus the location was to be changed.

But, it was a mistake. What mistake? If, by including more than the warrant, it seems to be one familiar with that surveyor. But it may be, that the first surveys were intended to exclude the lands in dispute, and ran round them; but, that it was afterwards concluded on to take 531 *these lands, and to secure the 573 acres otherwise. But, where does this tract of 573 acres of land lie? We know not; but very probably, more within the bounds of the location, than the land in dispute.

But, that survey stands on the records, as made by this warrant. How then could it be returned as made by another? It is true, this surveyor had the physical power to do so, much more than he had to make all these surveys on the after-part of the day, on which this contract was made. But, has he even done so? And who persuaded him to commit that crime of falsifying a record, or giving an untrue copy of it? Not the Lead Mine Company; for, the warrant did not then belong to them. But, where is the proof, that this survey has not been carried into grant, on this very pre-emption warrant? It is charged in the bill, that a grant has issued on it; and that seems admitted in the answer. But there is no proof, that it was by another warrant. It also charges, that Sayers sold the whole of the surveys to Jackson.

Badly as this surveyor appears in this case, we cannot impute to him such a fraud and crime, as returning an untrue record; and if we could, who had a right to control him in that business, but Sayers, for whom that survey must have been made, or those claiming under him?

In this view, then, this warrant has been more than filled up without the 214 acres in controversy, and we know not which of all these surveys was actually made first. Surely, if all this, or half of all this, had appeared on a caveat, there can be no doubt how it would have terminated. And the only question is, whether the case of Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155, is to deprive this party of his most just and equitable rights? If that case is to sanctify such proceedings, and to deprive a Court of Equity of their original jurisdiction to relieve against frauds of this description, we ought to pause before we give it that effect. All the preceding, as well as subsequent cases, it seems to me, would be in opposition to it.

532 *The bill in this case, it is true, does not say in express terms, that the party was ignorant, and therefore could not file a caveat. It was filed in 1806; and until the above case in 1814, this allegation was not deemed as important as it possibly may be now. But he says, that certificates of surveys had been made out, purporting that the lands had been surveyed; but, whether they were actually surveyed or not, he does not know; and on these certificates, purporting to be dated so and so, grants have issued, and amongst others, for the 573 acres, all by virtue of that warrant: that Razor, by his attorney in fact, transferred his survey to the plaintiff, who has obtained a junior patent, &c. He, however, insists, first, that more lands are covered by the defendant's patents, than his warrant justifies; and that the survey does not correspond with the entry; otherwise, it would not have touched the land in controversy.

As to there being more land covered, &c. the defendant, in his answer, after giving the account above mentioned of the 573 acres, says, even if that were not so, still the surveys, which cover the plaintiff's lands, were made prior to that; and if any was void, it would be that for the 573 acres. But, it is no where pretended, that these 573 acres were not within the limits of the location, though where they lie, is not stated or laid down in the plat; and it may have been in reality the first survey, though purporting to be on the 12th; for it is apparent, that those said to be made on the 6th, were not made on that day. As to not surveying according to his entry, he says, that it was necessary to join the settlement right; and if he could not do that, and join Burgaman's Bottom also, that part of the entry will be rejected, and the entry not void. In other words, he may then run in an opposite direction. But he says, it is practicable to lay off the 1000 acres, so as to join the bottom, by running out the 142 acres, still left of the warrant, in a narrow slip, so as to touch it; which would be good, after a patent, &c. This last 533 position is undoubtedly *true, if it is also true, that a patent covers and sanctifies every manner of fraud.

But it would look better, I think, to take it, as was done in this case, even without this finger reaching out, and as it were, pointing to the fraud. There was no objection in the answer to the jurisdiction of the Court, on the ground that a caveat had not been filed, as in the case of Preston v. M'Kinney, hereafter referred to. At this time, such objection was not thought of, where circumstances of fraud, &c. were relied on, and the party satisfies himself by answering to these objections.

Does the case of Noland v. Cromwell sanction all these actings and reasonings? Such an admission, I think, would go far to shake the authority of that case. I think it could not have been intended to go this far; and if it does, it may be remarked, that on this point, it was by a divided Court, two to two, so far as Judges were present in Court; and if it be taken two to three, it is admitted, that as to this matter of implied notice, arising from surveys of lands made at a different place from that called for by the entry, it was a new point, and did not exist in that case, though argued on by way of analogy; and if it did exist, could at most only be considered a single decision by a divided Court, on that point. In Witherington v. M'Donald, 1 Hen. & Munf. 306, Judge Lyons says, "The law has never been deemed to be settled on one decision, where there has been nearly an equal division of the Court." This is giving it all the authority to which any such decision is entitled.

But, several cases have been decided since, to say nothing of those before, which seem to me to settle this matter otherwise, and at any rate, to leave it as a matter open to enquiry and more solemn decision. Amongst these, the case of Preston v. M'Kinney, which was decided by Chancellor Brown of Staunton, in July, 1814, just after Noland v. Cromwell, and in this Court, in 1820, seems most like the present case. That case is not reported;

534 *and I may therefore be excused for stating it pretty much at length. It was this.

M'Kinney had the oldest entry, but Preston's survey and patent were older than his. Douglass, under whom M'Kinney claimed, made his entry for 500 acres in 1780, on a treasury warrant, which was surveyed on the 28th day of November, 1797, and was patented on the — day of — by John Balfour, as assignee of the entry or plat; and he conveyed by deed to M'Kinney, in February, 1802, who brought this suit in March, 1802.

The bill further alleged, that in the year 1782, an entry was made, in the name of James Dysart, for 300 acres, which was shortly afterwards surveyed, and interferes with the plaintiff's land upwards of 200 acres. The objection that the surveyor, Preston, had used the name of Dysart, instead of making his entry in the clerk's office according to law, was insisted on, and was answered by saying, that it was made for the benefit of the son of the surveyor, &c. and to whom the patent issued. It seems that this survey was made about December, 1785, and that the patent issued about August, 1792.

Various objections are made to the claim and proceedings of the defendant, in order to show the superior equity of the complainant; and amongst others, that his entry, survey and patent, were entirely different land from that called for in the entry.

The answer admits, that the complainant's entry is prior, but that the defendant has the oldest survey and patent; and also denies that the complainant's entry covers the land in dispute. And in an answer to an amended bill, the defendant insists that the Court can give the complainant no relief, "as he has not shewn why he could not enter a caveat," &c. After this, viz.; at July term 1811, the plaintiff has leave to amend his bill, in which he states, that he, and those under whom he claims, were prevented from entering a caveat against Preston's grant, by the following circumstances: that Douglass, in whose fa-

535 vour the entry *was made, lived at a considerable distance from the land in controversy, had actually removed to Kentucky before Preston's survey was made, and neither knew of the interference, or of the necessity of a caveat, if he had: that Balfour, his assignee, lived also at a considerable distance from the land; was never on it in his life, and did not know of the interfering claim, until after the patent issued; or did the plaintiff know of it, until long after

In 1813, Preston answers this bill: He says Douglass lived within five or six miles of the respondent at the time the survey was made, (the respondent was surveyor of the county) in December, 1785, on which a grant issued in August, 1792. He cannot say whether Douglass knew of the interference of his claim, but if it did interfere, presumes it was his duty to acquire that information and arrest the title, and his negligence cannot operate in his favour. He verily believes, that before his grant issued, Balfour understood and believed that his survey interfered with the entry, which in September, 1791, he purchased of Douglass; and thinks she had a conversation with him on the subject. He however thinks, that the mere negligence of the party to enquire, will not be a ground of relief. It was his duty to perfect his title with all convenient dispatch. There was no surprise, as six years elapsed between the making of his survey and patent; no fraud or concealment on his part; and the interference could easily have been discovered, and Douglass and Balfour resided but a few miles farther from the land than the defendant: that ignorance of law will not excuse; and he does not believe that any thing exists to take the case out of the general rule, which has been laid down as to the necessity of entering a caveat in such a case.

Much testimony was taken pro and con, on the various objections on both sides, made by the pleadings; and the counsel filed each a written argument.

In that filed by the complainant, the following observations were in substance made, as to the point now under consideration.

536 *On the caveat question, we contend for the plaintiff, 1st, that we have a right to come into Court for relief, because the defendant, Preston, gained his priority at law by bad faith. First, it is bad faith for a surveyor to enter and survey lands, under cover of another name, &c.: that even if this was matter for a caveat, Courts of Equity have concurrent jurisdiction in all matters of fraud, &c. Secondly, it was bad faith in him, not to survey for the plaintiff in due time, but to survey the land entered by him for another, by a junior entry, and especially when it did not cover the land, &c.

II. We could not enter a caveat, because we did not know of the interference. The answer does not deny this allegation. If it did, it will appear clearly that M'Kinney had no notice, until long after the patent issued. Had Balfour notice? It appears the entry was transferred to him in 1791. The patent to Preston issued in 1792, upon a survey made in 1788. When Balfour purchased, no one was settled on the land. There was no clearing, except Hoover's small improvement. The lines of Preston's survey did not run near that place, &c. Balfour then had no survey, and was never informed of the interference by oral communication. How then, was he to know it? Suppose he had gone on the land, and looked for the lines. Could he have found them? And if he had, would he have known whose lines they were? Suppose he had gone to the surveyor's office. Could the plat have informed him of the interference? There is no probability that it would. Besides, he had no right to see the book of surveys, or to have a copy of the plat; and he might have searched the Register's office in vain, &c. The plat does not call for any lines or courses of the plaintiff's land; nor for Hoover's improvement. Had Douglass notice? All the above observations apply to him.

The counsel for the defendant replies to this. 1st, He repels the argument of illegality, because the entry was 537 *not made with the clerk, &c. 2d, He repels the charge of a failure of duty in not surveying, &c.

As to ignorance, the defendant denies the fact, and if it was so, the law will not warrant the inference drawn. As to the fact: It is proved that Balfour had notice of Preston's claim, because he would not make a general warranty for that reason. There is no proof that this knowledge was imparted to him after Preston's patent had issued; and it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove their ignorance. But, it is denied that positive notice is necessary; implied notice is enough. When an entry is regularly made, embracing land which another has previously located, it is the duty of the first locator to take care that such second entry is not carried into grant. The entry book is intended as a notice to all persons interested, and every person is to take notice at his peril. When the entry does not embrace the plaintiff's land, but a survey is made thereon, which does embrace it, the case is different. This was the principle on which the Court determined the case of Unerbarger v. Walton's heirs. But, why shall the entry book be notice to a posterior locator, who intends to commence a title, and not be notice to one who has made a location, until his title is perfected? So that, abandoning the idea of a notice by the survey, he contends that the entry covered the land, and that a prior locator was bound to notice it.

The Chancellor, after disposing of the other points in the cause, says, "But there is a fifth ground of defence relied on, on which I am unable to form an opinion perfectly satisfactory to myself; viz: that the plaintiff has shewn no good cause why a caveat was not issued. He swears that neither he, nor those under whom he claims, had any knowledge of the interference of the surveys. The defendant Preston, in his answer, swears, that he cannot say whether Douglass had any knowledge of the interference, but believes that Balfour knew of it, before the patent issued: that

538 *1791, and the patent issued in 1792; and thinks that he had a conversation with him on the subject, but when the supposed conversation was, he does not say; but he seems to rely principally on the implied notice, which every locator is presumed to have, by the entry, and contends very properly, that it is the duty of every one interested to seek for the information necessary to protect his rights. There is evidence to shew, that both Balfour and the plaintiff had notice, at the time of the plaintiff's purchase from Balfour, which was about the year 1797, (several years after the patent issued;) but there is no positive evidence to shew, when that knowledge by either was first acquired. Balfour is dead; and his answer cannot be had; and we cannot expect proof of a mere negative from the plaintiff, nor dismiss his bill for want of it; more especially as the charge is not expressly denied. But, the implied or presumptive notice afforded by an entry, and which every one has a right to inspect, must be considered sufficient notice to all interested, of the facts stated in that entry. Now, what are the entries here, and what notice is afforded by Dy-sart's entry, of an interference with the entry of Douglass?" He then goes into a comparison of the entries, to shew that they appear not to cover the same land, and could not interfere; which brings the case, in his opinion, within the principle laid down in this Court, in the case of Unerbarger v. Walton's heirs. "That case," he says, "is now before the Court of Appeals, not acted on, to his knowledge. Indeed, this case is stronger; for in that case, there was no caveat, nor any reasons assigned why one had not issued. But, the principle of implied notice is the same. On the whole, believing the justice of the case to be with the plaintiff, I must decree in his favour, leaving it with a more enlightened Court to correct any error which I may commit." This decree was affirmed here in June, 1820. The case of Unerbarger v. Walton's heirs never came here; and therefore, was acquiesced in by the parties. Indeed, it was admitted by the counsel,

539 *a very able land lawyer, who argued this case below, that that case was well decided. As to implied notice by a survey, as a matter of record, even if the parties have access to the book of surveys, I never could perceive its force. It does not, like an entry, give a succinct and general description of the land, the water-courses, adjoining lands, entries, &c. where it is to begin, and in what direction to extend, &c.; but may begin at a tree in the forest, and run to another tree, &c. without designating any notorious landmark, or, as in this case, even other surveys which it actually adjoins. As to its being notice as an act in pais, that will depend on whether the party, whose title it interferes with, was present, or whether the line ran near his improvements, or around them, so that the chain-carriers, and other disinterested persons present, could discover the interference, and give notice. But where an open line is left, as in this case, and in that of Hughes v. M'Clung, how are they to know in what way the line is to be closed?

Suppose survey No. 4, had not been made before survey No. 2. When the surveyor got to the point D, he might have protracted a line to W, a course of No. 5, and would then have had lines of other surveys, conducting him to his beginning, and it would have been a lawful survey, with only one open line in it. The surveyor himself does not know which of these surveys was made first; why even those various surveys, made about the same time perhaps, joining though not calling for each other, were so made, unless it was to keep the thing as private as possible. No opinion is given, so as to shew on what point this Court decided the case of Preston v. M'Kinney; and it may be said that it went off on the ground of improper conduct in the surveyor, in entering land in the name of another, for the benefit of his son, instead of making the entry in the clerk's office. But I think this cannot well be supposed. The Chancellor did not decide on that ground. It was not an entry 540 for the survey; (and he gave "a reason for that course, which was doubtless considered satisfactory;) but, on the one now under consideration, and on which he had decided another case, and appeals, as were, to this Court, to say whether those decisions were correct. His Courts lay in a part of the State, to which these cases peculiarly belong; and in cases where the inferior Courts decree on particular grounds which are not thought here to be tenable, though the decree may be supported on other grounds, it is usual for us, (especially when the ground assumed is an important one in point of principle,) to say, that the decree is affirmed, but not for the reasons assigned by the Chancellor, &c. It is an undoubted fact, that the case of Noland v. Cromwell was not approved by that portion of the country peculiarly interested in the principles of that decision; and an attempt was made in the Legislature to obviate its effects. There was good ground, therefore, for this Court to pause, and at all events, not to carry that case beyond the points really arising in it. The merits of that case, too, were with the decree.

If the Chancellor's opinion, then, was approved of on this point, (as it seems to me it was,) it would be decisive of the case before us. But, if it went on the ground of improper conduct in the surveyor, either in making an improper entry as aforesaid, or in surveying lands not covered by the location, but in a different direction from it, and without giving notice to the party whose land he was surveying, which exists also in this case, (to say nothing of the other improprieties before noticed,) it seems to me that there is abundant ground in this case, to bring it within even that principle of decision. A public officer ought to stand indifferent, and do justice as far as depends on him. He had no authority by law to survey land, so entirely variant from the location, and might have refused to do so; at least so far as he was required to survey lands he had shortly surveyed for another, on a prior and regular entry. His duty, by law, was to be bounded by the lines of other surveys: and at all 541 events, he was inexcusable "in not notifying that other. His deposition is taken in the cause; and he does not pretend to say, that he gave any such notice, or any reason for thus violating his duty.

Under all these considerations, I cannot yield my assent to carry the case of Noland v. Cromwell any further than I am imperiously bound to do, and think that it does not, in any view of it, require that this decree should be reversed. The cases of Guerrant v. Bagby, 6 Munf. 160, Christian v. Christian, Ibid. 534, and Lyne v. Jackson, and The same v. Wilson, 1 Rand. 114, have also been since decided, and the case of Noland v. Cromwell, pressed on the Court, without effect.

The presumptive notice, in consequence of an actual survey on the land, I think cannot be maintained by the deposition of the surveyor. It is true, he says, that he ran the lines of the 214 acre survey, except the last line. But, whether he ran the lines L. P. O. which are common to the two surveys of 214 and 338 acres, when he ran the 338 acre survey, or the other, he does not know; for, he does not know which of them he made first; and he did not run them more than once. But, he ran the lines of Razor's survey on to D. I believe he did, when he ran them for Razor; but, I think he is mistaken, if he intends to say so, that he ran them again, when he made the 214 acres survey. Had he done so, he would have found that he had not reached Ewing's line, and of course, would not have called to run with it the last course. The surveys were made 38 years before his deposition was taken, and he had forgotten what happened. It was afterwards discovered, that they had not gone to Ewing's line; and the 66 acre survey was made, so as to cover all Razor's survey. When that survey was made, running probably near the improvements, the party gets notice, and files his caveat as to it. That survey was made in 1789. But, a patent had issued in 1788 for the 214 and 338 acres. So that no caveat was, or could be filed as to them; the party, as we may well presume, not having notice, or he would have caveated them as well as the 66 acre survey.

542 *As to the objection, taken on the trial, to the want of description of Razor's warrant in his entry, I think there is nothing in it; and that it comes too late. If he deposited his warrant with the surveyor, (which we must presume,) all he had to do, was, to direct the location specially, so as to designate the lands intended; and if the surveyor failed to take due notice of the warrant, his neglect could not prejudice the party. But, if the surveyor holds the warrant, and duly notes it on his book of survey, from which, and not from the book of entries, it is to be certified, it is enough to justify the patent. True, if there is any fraud or collusion with the surveyor in entering lands when no warrant is produced, so as to cover them until one is presumed, or withdrawing warrants once entered, and afterwards filing others, it is a fraud; which, if made out, ought to vitiate the proceedings. But, there is no such allegation here; and such misconduct in a public officer is not to be presumed. On the contrary, the warrant and all are returned, and a grant obtained.

There is no ground to say, that Razor's entry and survey were void for these reasons. They were good, were originally preferable in law and equity to the pre-emption right of the company, at least from the moment they made their location in a different direction; and that equitable right remains unimpaired to this day, and ought to prevail.

If my view of the facts is correct, (in which I think I cannot be mistaken,) it seems to me, there can be as little doubt of the law as of the justice of the case.

I think, therefore, the decree ought to be affirmed.

Decree reversed.

543 *Brown v. Toell's Administrator.

August, 1827.

Equitable Relief—Usurious Judgment—Bill.—Where relief is sought in equity, against a judgment at law, on the ground of usury, the bill must put that matter directly in issue.

Notes—Agreement to Pay Usurious Interest—Effect.—An agreement, subsequent to the execution of a note, to pay more than legal interest, in consideration of delay of payment, will not affect the note, although it may entitle the debtor to relief for all beyond legal interest.

Judgment—Relief of Bail.—Bail cannot be relieved in equity against a judgment at law by default, without assigning some good cause why he did not defend himself at law.

This was an appeal from the Lynchburg Chancery Court.

The following opinion gives a full view of the case, which was submitted without argument.

August 21. JUDGE CABELL.

Benjamin Perkins executed to Peter Toell his negotiable note for $500, on which Humphreys, administrator of Toell, brought suit in the Superior Court of Law for the county of Campbell, and Brown became common bail. No defence being made, judgment was rendered against Perkins and Brown for the amount of the note, with interest. Brown filed his bill in the Court of Chancery for the Lynchburg District, in which he stated, that shortly after the institution of the suit, he removed to the county of Nelson, "and taking it for granted that Perkins would attend to the said suit, and on the trial thereof, procure evidence of all the credits to which he was entitled, he gave himself no farther trouble about the matter;" but that Perkins, although entitled to large credits, failed, from the extreme derangement of his affairs, and other circumstances, (not specified,) to prove the credits; in consequence whereof, judgment was rendered, as aforesaid, for the whole amount of the principal of the said note, with interest thereon. He alleges as a fact, (which he says he will be able to prove,) that Toell was indebted to Perkins for various dealings, in a sum equal, or nearly equal, to the amount of the note; for none of which had Perkins been paid: that Toell acknowledged, 544 "in his life-time, that there was a very small balance, if any, due on the said note; and moreover, that since the death of Toell, Perkins had paid to his widow, with the knowledge of his administrator, $100; which payment was intended to be on account of certain extra interest upon the said note, agreed by the said Perkins to be paid to the said Toell. He prayed an injunction, which was granted.

Humphreys answered, denying all knowledge of the credits claimed, of the payment to Mrs. Toell, and of any agreement to pay usurious interest.

Brown filed an amended bill, and without making any new charge, made Perkins a party, calling on him to say, among other things, what excess of interest was demanded and received by the said Toell, of him the said Perkins.

The only evidence that could, in any aspect of the case, be relied on as a material, is that of Nicholas Harrison, who testifies, that Toell told him, a short time before his death, that the note in question had been given for money lent at an interest of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. a month: that the interest had been paid in goods; and that he was then dealing with Perkins, and would endeavour immediately to collect his whole debt; and that about \$200 were then due.

The questions are, whether any relief is to be granted, either on account of the alleged usury, or of the credits claimed for Perkins?

1. As to the usury.

It is competent to a party to an usurious contract, to go into equity for relief as to the interest, even after a judgment at law, and without assigning any reason for having failed to defend himself at law. But, this can be done only on a bill properly framed for the purpose.

If the bill in this case had impeached the transaction as usurious in its origin, and had sought relief on that ground, the testimony of Harrison might have been relied on in support of a claim to be exempted from paying any interest whatever. But, there is no such allegation in the bill; and, therefore, the testimony of 545 Harrison as to the usury, *relating to a matter not in issue, is irrelevant, and ought to be disregarded.

The only part of the bill that relates to the question of usury, is that which states that since the death of Toell, Perkins had paid his widow, with the knowledge of the administrator, the sum of $100 for extra interest on the note, agreed by Perkins to be paid to Toell. But, this is not stated to have been originally agreed, when the note was executed. It may have been a subsequent agreement, in consideration of delay of payment, after the note became due; in which case, it would not have affected the note, and the legal interest upon it, although, if supported by testimony, it might have entitled him to relief for all beyond legal interest. But, the allegation, as made in the bill, is denied in the answer; and is not supported by Harrison's testimony, nor any other in the cause.

The appellant was, therefore, rightly dismissed from Court, so far as relates to the question of usury.

2. We will next examine his pretensions,

Chancery Practice—Allegations and Proofs Must Agree.—In a court of equity as well as in a court of law, the allegations and proof must agree. A recovery will not be allowed upon a case, although proved, which differs essentially from that alleged in the bill. Wren v. Moncre, 95 Va. 375, 28 S. E. Rep. 568, citing the principal case as authority. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Smith v. Nicholas, 8 Leigh 364.

Usury.—See monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 698. The principal case is cited on the subject of usury in Moseley v. Brown, 76 Va. 426, and on the subject of equitable relief from a usurious judgment in Snyder v. Middle States, etc. Construction Co., 62 W. Va. 665, 44 S. E. Rep. 252.

Judgment—Relief of Bail.—To the point that bail cannot be relieved in equity against a judgment, without assigning some good cause why he did not defend himself at law, the principal case was cited with approval in Mann v. Drewry, 5 Leigh 304.

on the ground of the credits to which, it is alleged, Perkins was entitled.

It may be admitted that, as to these credits, Harrison's testimony is relevant, and even satisfactory. But the appellant will, nevertheless, be entitled to no redress. The bail had a right to make any defence at law, which the principal himself might have made. He might have defended himself on the ground of these credits. There is no allegation of a defect of testimony; for, even in his bill, he declares his ability to prove them. He ought to have defended himself at law; and as he assigns no good reason, why he did not do so, the door of the Court of Equity ought not to have been opened to him.

The decree of the Chancellor should be affirmed.

JUDGES CARR and GREEN concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.*

August, 1827.

Judgment—Interest—Error—Amendment—Method of.†—A judgment is rendered by default in the General Court, upon motion, on a bond due to the Commonwealth; but the clerk, in entering the judgment, only allows interest from a date posterior to that, from which, by the terms of the bond, interest was to run. This error may be amended, upon motion to the General Court, at a succeeding term. 1 Rev. Code, 612, sec. 108.

Same—Amendment—Motion.†—This power of amendment applies to a motion as well as to an action, and extends to the General Court.

This was an appeal from the General Court.

The whole case is so fully discussed in the opinions of the Judges, that any other report would be unnecessary.

The Attorney General, for the appellant.

Copland and Johnson, for the appellee.

August 21. JUDGE CARR.

In June, 1818, the Commonwealth obtained a judgment against George Winston in the General Court, for $17,993 24 cts. with interest from the 19th of April, 1817. As to $5,631 80 cts. part of this judgment, Winston appealed, leaving $12,361 44 cts. for which there was an undisputed judgment against him. For this last sum Winston obtained an act of Assembly, passed the 2d of March, 1819, allowing him five, six and seven years to pay it off by equal instalments. To secure these payments, he executed a bond, dated June 21st, 1819, with two sureties, for the sum of $24,792 88 cts. conditioned to pay $4,120 48 cts. on the 2d of March, 1824, and the same sum on the same day of the two following years, with interest on each instalment from the 19th of April, 1817. The time for the payment of the first instalment having passed, the Auditor gave Winston and his sureties notice, that a motion would be made in the General Court, on the 15th of June, 1824, for judgment against them for that 547 instalment, with interest *from the 19th of April, 1817. On the hearing of the motion, the defendants not appearing, judgment was rendered for the penalty of the bond, to be discharged by the payment of $4,120 48 cts. with interest from the second of March, 1824, and such other sums as should afterwards appear due, on scire facias being sued out. A notice was given by the Auditor to the defendants, that a motion would be made to the succeeding General Court, to amend this judgment; it being erroneously entered, in this; that it is made to carry interest from the second of March, 1824, instead of the 19th of April, 1817, as called for by the bond.

The General Court overruled the motion to amend the judgment. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth, excepted to the opinion, spreading the facts upon the record, and took an appeal.

We are to consider, whether in this judgment the General Court erred.

At the common law, an error committed by the Court, not in a point of judgment, but such as might be called a misprision of the Court, could be amended; but, no misprision of the clerk was amendable after the term. 8 Co. 157, Blackmore's Case. By the 14th Edw. 3, chap. 6, (which was the first act of amendment) it is enacted, that by the misprision of clerks in every place wheresoever it be, no process shall be annulled or discontinued, by mistaking in writing one letter or one syllable too much or too little, &c. but shall be hastily amended in due form. Upon this statute, many doubts seem to have arisen; among others, whether a word might be amended; as the statute speaks only of a mistake in writing a letter or syllable too much or too little; and it was determined, that under the statute, words, as well as letters and syllables, might be amended.

The most important English statute on this subject, is 8th Hen. 6, chap. 12, by which Judges had power to examine records, and in affirmance of judgments, 548 to amend *all that to them, in their discretion, should seem to be the misprision of the clerk.

In 1753, 6 Stat. at Large, 339, it was enacted, that all the English acts of jeofail and amendment, shall be in full force in this Dominion also. Under the statute of 8th Hen. 6, many decisions have taken place in England, drawing the line of distinction between misprisions of the clerk, and errors in judgment. See Petrie v. Hannay, 3 Term Rep. 659; Manners, qui tam v. Parten, 3 Bos. & Pull. 343; Newcomb v. Green, 1 Wils. 33; 2 Vin. Abr. 346, pl. 11; 372, pl. 11; 373, pl. 16; 374, pl. 20; Dunbar v. Hancock, 3 M. & Selw. 591; Short v. Coffin, 5 Burr. 2730. In this last case, the suit was against A. as executor, and a general verdict; but the judgment entered de bonis propriis. After a writ of error had been brought in the Exchequer, and in

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE COALTER absent.

†Amendments.—In Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 489, 22 S. E. Rep. 458, RILEY, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, referring to § 3451 of the Code, said that the errors authorized to be corrected by this particular provision are misprisions of the clerk and what may be termed clerical misprisions of the court, and cites the principal case to sustain the proposition. The principal case is also cited on this subject in Eubank v. Ralls, 4 Leigh 317, 319, 820; Powell v. Com., 11 Gratt. 824; Barnes' Case, 92 Va. 800, 23 S. E. Rep. 784; Vance v. Ravenswood, etc., Ry. Co. (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 402; Alston v. Munford, 1 Fed. Cas. 581. See further on the subject, foot-note to Halley v. Baird, 1 Hen. & M. 25; foot-note to Compton v. Cline, 5 Gratt. 187; foot-note to Price v. Com., 88 Gratt. 820; monographic note on "Amendments" appended to Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300.

nullo est erratum pleaded, it was moved in the King's Bench to amend; and the Court were all clearly of opinion to amend the judgment, by making it de bonis testatoris si, &c. It was objected, that this was a mistake in law, and cases cited to shew that it could not be amended. But, Lord Mansfield delivered the opinion of the Court, "That this is not an error in the judgment of the Court in point of law, but a mere mistake of the clerk;" and he repeated at large the case of Chapman v. Gale, from 2d Lev. 22, which was debt against an executor, who pleaded fully administered, and verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, which was entered generally; and thereupon error was brought, and it was assigned, that the judgment should have been de bonis testatoris si, &c. But, upon the affidavit of the attorney, that he gave the clerk instructions to enter it up according to the plea, and that it was a mere mistake of the clerk, "it was amended as a misprision of the clerk."

If the case at bar were to be decided under the English statutes, there could be no doubt that the case just cited would be considered a full and clear authority; indeed, a stronger case than ours. There, the whole effect of 549 the "judgment was changed by the amendment. Still, as the record shewed that the suit was against the defendant as executor, and the verdict in the same character, and the attorney swore that his instructions were to enter the judgment according to the plea, it was apparent, that the mistake was the clerk's, and as such, it was amendable.

In the case before us, it was contended, that the doctrine of amendments did not apply, because this was a motion, and not an action. But I can see no ground for the distinction. The questions in such cases always are, whether the mistake is clerical, and whether there is any thing in the record, by which the error can be safely corrected; and if these be answered affirmatively, whether it be a suit or a motion, the reason and the law are the same. In our case, there was a bond for the money, with interest from the 19th of April, 1817. The notice informed the defendants, that a motion would be made for judgment on the bond, with interest from this date. The defendants made no defence; thereby admitting the justice of the claim. The judgment is entered for the penalty; but, when the clerk came to state the sum by which it might be discharged, he sets it down as $4,120 48, with interest from the 2d day of March, 1824, instead of from the 19th of April, 1817; and evidence was offered to the Court (and improperly rejected by them, I think) to prove by the oath of the Auditor and the clerk, that instructions were given to enter the judgment agreeably to the condition of the bond, with interest on the instalment from the 19th of April, 1817, and that the entry actually made, was so made through the inadvertency and mistake of the clerk. These facts leave no rational ground for doubt. They shew the mistake to have been clerical; and they give the safe and sure guides, by which to correct the misprision.

But, it is said, that the English statutes were not in force here, when this case arose; and that is very true. I consider, however, that by the statute of 1753, they were incorporated into our laws, as 550 much as if they had been "repeated verbatim; and that they were not repealed by the subsequent declaration, that British statutes (as such) should no longer be in force here; but that they were repealed by the clause in the revival of 1819, declaring that all laws, not included in that revival, should be repealed. It was by no means, however, the intention of the enlightened board of revisors, to take away, or to curtail, the salutary power of amendment, so long exercised by the Courts. Accordingly, they inserted in the revival a clause to the following effect: "Where, in the record of any judgment or decree of any Superior Court of Law or Equity, there shall be any mistake, miscalculation, or misrecital, of any sum or sums of money, tobacco, wheat or other such thing, or of any name or names, and there shall be among the record of the proceedings, in the suit in which such judgment or decree shall be rendered, any verdict, bond, bill, note, or other writing of the like nature or kind, whereby such judgment or decree may be safely amended; it shall be the duty of the Court in which such judgment shall be rendered, and of the Judge thereof in vacation, to amend such judgment or decree thereby, according to the very truth and justice of the case; the opposite party having notice, &c." 1 Rev. Code, 512, sec. 108. This is the law by which we must decide this case.

It is objected, first, that the General Court is not within the words of the law. Secondly, That the misprision is not one of those declared amendable by the law.

With respect to the first, the statute itself declares, that for removing all doubts concerning the Courts to which this act may apply, all things herein contained, not restricted by their nature, or by express provision, to particular Courts, shall be the rules of decision and proceeding in all Courts whatsoever within this Commonwealth. We must enquire, then, whether the clause concerning amendments, either by its nature or its express words, be so restricted as not to embrace the General Court.

551 *It was not, and it could not be contended, that there was any thing in the nature of the power of amendment, which rendered it inapplicable to the General Court. On the contrary, if there be one Judicial tribunal, to which this power is more necessary than another, I should think the General Court would be that very tribunal. I must be understood to say this, not in reference to the members of that Court, (for whom I have the highest respect,) but to its constitution, the nature of the business before it, the dispersed situation of the Judges, and the shortness of the sessions, &c. It was strongly contended, however, that by the express words of the law, the General Court was excluded; "any Superior Court of Law or Equity." Our laws divide the Courts into two classes, as to grade, Superior and Inferior. To one or other of these classes, every Court in the Commonwealth must belong. The County and Corporation Courts are called in various acts, the Inferior Courts, and all above them, the Superior Courts. That the General Court is above them, no one will deny. Thus, in the general classification, the General Court, so far from being excluded, is expressly included by the terms, "any Superior Court of Law." But, there are many particular laws, which, in their provisions, most clearly take in the General Court, by the terms Superior Courts. Thus, the act concerning counsel or attorneys, passed in 1792, long before the existence of the Circuit Court system, enacts that before any person shall be licensed to practice law, he shall produce to those authorised to examine, &c. a certificate, &c. and three of the Judges of the Superior Courts, upon, &c., may grant to such person a license to practice law, in the Superior and Inferior Courts of this Commonwealth. Again, "Counsel who prosecute in an Inferior Court, shall not be permitted to appear in a Superior Court," &c. Again, "If any suit shall be dismissed for non-attendance of an attorney practising either in the Superior or Inferior Courts," &c. Now, surely, it will not be for a moment doubted, 552 "that in all these cases (and many others might no doubt be cited,) the General Court and its Judges are comprehended in the terms Superior Courts of Law. We see, then, that both by the nature of the power, and the words of the grant, the General Court so far from being excluded, is directly included. Nor does it render this construction at all doubtful, that in another part of the clause, the power is given to the "Court in session or the Judge thereof in vacation." Reddendo singula singulis, all appearance of obscurity or absurdity is avoided. The General Court, the Circuit Courts, and the Chancery Courts, may amend; and every Judge who has a particular Court or Courts, may, for errors in his Courts, amend in vacation.

But, secondly, it is contended, that the misprision here, though clearly (as has been shewn) clerical, is not within the law, because it is neither a "mistake, miscalculation, or misrecital, of any sum or sums of money, tobacco, wheat, or other such thing, or of any name or names."

We must recollect, 1st, that this is a law of jeofails and amendment, and therefore to be liberally construed. 2d. That whereas, under the English statutes of amendment, misprisions of the clerk only could be amended; under ours, mistakes of the Court also in every thing except matters of judgment may be amended; which is strong to shew, that the law did not mean to curtail the power, which had so long existed. For, it would be most strange to suppose, that the Legislature, while extending the power to mistakes of the Court, could mean to withdraw from it any mistake of the clerk. The clear meaning of the law, then, in my judgment, is, that any mis-prision of the clerk, (or mistake of the Court, not touching a matter of judgment,) may be amended, provided the record furnishes the means, whether bond, bill, note or other thing, by which the amendment may be safely made; and the terms mistake, miscalculation or misrecital, &c., are put rather for example, and as comprehending those misprisions which commonly happen, than as restrictions on the 553 power of the Court. If the clerk, in this case, had mistaken the name of a party, or the sum, there could be no question of the power of the Court to amend. Has he not, in effect, and in reason, mistaken the sum? By the bond and the notice, the judgment should have been for the instalment of $4,120 48, and $1,000 (within a trifle) for interest prior to the date of the bond. By the error of the clerk, this $1,000 is omitted. Is not this a mistake, and a capital mistake too, in the sum? To say that such misprision, is not within the meaning of the law, is to stick in the letter, to disappoint the intention of the Legislature, and to construe this statute as strictly as if it was a capital offence, instead of a misprision of the clerk, which was the subject.

I am of opinion, that the judgment of the General Court be reversed, and such judgment entered as they should have entered.

JUDGE GREEN.

Amendments after the term were allowed in very few cases at the common law. In a few cases, however, they were permitted, as in case of a mistake in the recital of a writ, the entry of an essoin, or of a continuance; all of which were palpable mistakes, amendable by other parts of the record susceptible of no doubt. These were allowed to be amended, because they were considered to be the misprisions of the Court. Blackmore's Case, 8 Co. 156, b. Such an amendment as is proposed in this case, whether it was considered as misprision of the Court or of the clerk, could not, after the term at which the judgment was rendered, be amended at common law. Before the statutes of amendment, no misprision of a clerk could be amended; and those statutes applied only to the cases of clerical misprisions. The first of those was that of the 14th of Edw. 3, ch. 6; and the most important, that of 8th Hen. 6, ch. 12. It was under the authority of these statutes, and not 554 by force of the principles of the common law, that amendments were made in the cases cited by the Attorney General, although the statutes are not directly referred to.

In 1753, 6 Hen. Stat. at Large, 339, the Legislature of Virginia adopted in mass all the statutes of jeofails and amendments in force in England; of which, those in force in England before the 4th of James 1, were, before the passing of this act of Assembly, in force here; and all those statutes applied to the proceedings in all our courts of record. These statutes of England, so adopted by our act of 1753, although not re-enacted in form by the General Assembly, continued in force here, until the 1st of January, 1820. The act of 1792, declaring that no act of Parliament should have any force here, was only intended to abrogate the acts of Parliament passed before the 4th of James I; which were, until abrogated by the act of 1792, always in force here, as declared by the resolution of the Convention of 1776. But, the act of 1792 did not abrogate the statutes which had been adopted and virtually incorporated into our code of laws, by an act of Assembly. These statutes of amendment, however, ceased to operate here on the 1st of January, 1820, when the laws enacted at the last revisal took effect, by one of which, all laws, not published in that Code, were repealed; and consequently the act of 1753, was thereby repealed. The only statute of amendment, therefore, now in force here, is that of 1819, ch. 128; the 108th section of which contains the only provision which can apply to the case at bar. That provides, "When in the record of any judgment or decree of any Superior Court of Law or Equity, there shall be any mistake, miscalculation, or misrecital of any sum or sums of money, tobacco, wheat, or any other such thing, or of any name or names, and there shall be among the record or proceedings in the suit in which such judgment or decree shall be rendered, any verdict, bond, bill, note, or other writing of the like nature or kind, whereby such judgment or decree may be safely amended, it shall be the 555 *duty of the Court in which such judgment shall be rendered, and of the Judge thereof in vacation, to amend such judgment or decree thereby, according to the very truth and justice of the case; provided the opposite party have notice," &c.

The statute does not, (as did the former laws) confine the power to amend, to mistakes, &c. made by the clerk only; but, extends to those also made by the Court, if they be not errors in the judgment of the Court, but only in the sum, name or quantity, which indeed would be properly clerical mistakes, in the Court reducing its judgments to writing. The questions, in this case, are, whether this statute extends to judgments of the General Court; and if it does, whether the mistake in question is such as can be amended under the statute.

The terms "Superior Court of Law or Equity," seem to me to embrace, in their natural import, all the Courts, except the County and Corporation Courts, and were probably used as the most comprehensive expression to distinguish these Superior from those Inferior Courts. The provisions that it shall be the duty of the Court, and of the Judge thereof in vacation, to amend, does not necessarily contradict this construction; for, taken distributively, it applies to all the Superior Courts, when in session, and to the Judge thereof in vacation, where the Court consists of one Judge. In the latter case, the amendment may be made as conveniently and as safely in vacation, as in term time; but not in the former. I am the more induced to adopt this construction of the statute, by the consideration, that when it was enacted, the former laws authorising such amendments, then in force and applicable to all Courts, were repealed, and the effect of many statutes condensed into this one, only a little enlarged in some respects, and restrained in others. I cannot think it was intended to take from the Courts, consisting of many Judges, a power which they before had; and to refuse to the General Court in term, a power to amend 556 their judgment, "confided to a single Judge of that Court in vacation, in respect to a judgment in a Superior Court of Law for a county.

I do not think that the admission of the Attorney General upon the record, that the judgment was satisfied, can receive the construction contended for by the appellee, and be a bar to the motion to amend. It was an acknowledgment, that all which could be claimed under that judgment as it was, had been paid; but whether voluntarily or coercively, does not appear. If a coercive payment would bar any further remedy upon the judgment, the fact should have been alleged and proved by the appellee.

Under the statutes in force before the 1st of January, 1820, the mistake made in this judgment, being a misprision of the clerk, might have been amended, 8th Hen. 6, ch. 12, sec. 2; and although the entry of the judgment was signed by the presiding Judge, it would have been considered as a clerical mistake. The statute of Hen. 6th, above cited, authorises the Courts "to amend, in affirmance of judgment, all that in their discretion seemeth to be misprision of the clerks." Under this act, a judgment entered on the records of our old District Courts, and signed by the presiding Judge, was amended by the Court at a subsequent term, and the amendment sanctioned by the Court of Appeals. Gordon v. Frazer, 2 Wash. 130. This could only have been properly done, on the ground that it was a misprision of the clerk; and the paper by which the judgment was amended, was the bond on which the suit was brought, and the endorsements thereon, which were considered as a part of the bond, and the credits also endorsed upon the bond. The construction given by the English Courts to the statutes of amendment, required that there should be something to amend by; and if there were, then a judgment, as well as any other part of the record, might be amended. Tidd's Prac. 246-247; cases cited in 2 Vin. Abr. 309, F.

557 *Some of the subsequent cases in this Court seem to have shaken the authority of the case in Washington; the first of which was that of Vaughan & Field v. Freeland, in a note, 2 Hen. & Munf. 477; in which the judgment was reversed, because it had been amended after the term. The verdict was erroneously entered on the record book signed by the Judge; and this error was corrected by amending the entry, so as to conform to the real finding of the jury. In this case, there was a paper, not only in the record, but an indispensable part of the record, by which a palpable error of the clerk might be corrected, as by the bond in Gordon v. Frazer; and I cannot but think, that the case of Gordon v. Frazer is the best authority; especially, as Judge Tucker, in Cogbill v. Cogbill, expressed his dissatisfaction with the case of Vaughan & Field v. Freeland.

The cases of Halley, &c. v. Baird, &c. 1 Hen. & Munf. 25, and Cogbill v. Cogbill, 2 Hen. & Munf. 478, do not conflict with Gordon v. Frazer. In the first, the District Court set aside in toto an office judgment, which stood confirmed, and was final at a preceding term; and reinstated the suit, and sent it to the rules for new proceedings. This was not an amendment, but an annihilation of the judgment. In Cogbill v. Cogbill, the Court refused to allow an amendment, by correcting the order in the record by the minutes of the clerk, a material part of the minute being omitted in the order. But it is observable, that one of the three Judges who sat in that case, dissented, and that the minutes of the clerk are not a part of the record as a bond is, at least to some purposes, and especially to amend by. I conclude, that the mistake in the entry of the judgment, sought to be amended in this case, was not an error in the judgment of the Court, but a clerical mistake in recording the judgment of the Court; and at all events, it was competent to the Court, in which the judgment was rendered, to decide upon motion, whether it was an error in the judgment of the Court, or a mistake in the entering of the judgment.

It only remains to enquire, whether this mistake, if it was clerical, could be amended by entering the judgment now, as it ought to have been originally entered, according to the condition of the bond. I have already observed, that no amendment can be made but by virtue of the statute of 1819, and in such cases as were allowed by the common law, of which this is not one. The question is, whether a mistake as to the date at which interest shall commence, is amendable under this statute.

Upon a strictly literal construction of the terms of the 108th section, compared with the 103d section, which prescribes the effect of a verdict in curing errors in the previous proceedings, it might be very well doubted, whether it authorized the amendment of a mistake "in the day, month or year;" especially if the difference in the phraseology of the two sections could be considered as designed by the Legislature. The 103d section provides for a mistake in the declaration or pleading of "the day, month or year," as well as of "the christian name or surname of either party, sum of money, or quantity of merchandize, (the name, sum, time, or quantity, being right in any part of the proceedings or record;)" and the 108th section provides only for the "mistake, miscalculation or misrecital, of any sum or sums of money, tobacco, wheat, or any such thing, or of any name or names;" omitting the case of a mistake in "the day, month or year," provided for in the 103d section. I can, however, see no possible reason to induce the Legislature to make a distinction, in this respect, between the effect of a verdict, in amending an error in the previous proceedings as to time, and the amending of such a mistake in a judgment. The law requiring in both cases some authentic document in the record to amend by, I consider both sections to have intended to produce the same effect; the one, upon the proceeding before the verdict; the other, upon the judgment, by remedy in "clerical misprisions," whether committed by the clerk, the parties, or the Court, where there was any thing in the record, by which it could be safely corrected. The difference in the phraseology is accounted for by the fact, that the two sections were drafted at different times, and by different hands; the 108th being a new provision recommended by the revisors, and which was necessary to obviate the effect of the repeal of the former statutes of amendment, and of the decision in Vaughan & Field v. Freeland. The statutes of amendment and jeofails have always received a liberal construction; and when the judgment is for a sum of money, with interest thereon from a time past, and there is a mistake in stating the time when interest shall commence, it may be fairly considered as a mistake in the sum of money adjudged; the interest being a constituent part of the debt recovered, as much as the principal.

I think the Court ought to have amended the judgment, according to the terms of the bond.

JUDGE CABELL.

On the 21st of June, 1819, George Winston, James Winston and Pleasant Winston, executed their bond to James P. Preston, Governor of the Commonwealth, in the penal sum of $24,722 88, with condition to be void if the said George Winston should pay the following sums of money, at the following periods, viz: $4,120 48, on or before the 2d day of March, 1824, with interest thereon from the 19th day of April, 1817, till paid; $4,120 48, on or before the 2d day of March, 1825, with interest thereon from the said 19th day of April, 1817, till paid; and the sum of $4,120 48, on or before the 2d day of March, 1826, with interest thereon from the said 19th day of April, 1817.

The period for the payment of the first instalment having passed, the Auditor gave the Winstons notice, that a motion would be made against them in the General Court, on the 15th of June, 1824, for a judgment on the said bond, because of the breach of the condition thereof, in this, that the said George Winston had not paid the first instalment, $4,120 48, with interest thereon from the 19th of April, 1817.

The Winstons neither appeared, nor made any defence against the said motion; whereupon, a judgment was entered against them on the 16th of June, 1824, for the penalty of the bond, to be discharged by the payment of $4,120 48, with interest thereon from the 2d of March, 1824, till paid, and the costs; and such other sum or sums of money as should thereafter appear to be due, upon suing out a scire facias, and assigning new breaches.

At the succeeding General Court, viz: on the 20th of November, 1824, and in pursuance of notice given to the Winstons, the Auditor of Public Accounts, on behalf of the Commonwealth, made a motion to the General Court, to amend the judgment aforesaid, because it had been erroneously entered, in this, that it was made to carry interest from the 2d day of March, 1824, instead of the 19th of April, 1817.

On the trial of the motion, it was admitted that the judgment sought to be amended, had been, previously to the notice and motion, fully satisfied as to the whole amount in the said judgment specified. The Attorney General then offered to prove by the Auditor of Public Accounts, and the clerk of the General Court, that the said clerk had received no directions, either from the General Court, the Auditor, or the Attorney General, to enter the judgment in any manner variant from the condition of the bond; but that his instructions were, to enter the same agreeably to the said condition, with interest on the instalment for which the said judgment was rendered, from the 19th of April, 1817; and that the entry of the said judgment, with interest from the 2d day of March, 1824, was made by the said clerk, through inadvertence and mistake.

561 But, the Court *refused to receive the evidence of the Auditor and of the clerk to that effect; and overruled the motion for the amendment.

The correctness of that decision is now to be considered.

At the common law, as well the judgment of the Court, as any other part of the record, may be amended, during the same term in which the entry was made; for, during the term, the record is in the breast of the Judges, and not in the roll. Co. Litt. 260; 5 Co. 74, b.; 8 Co. 156, b. But, at the common law, amendments were rarely admitted after the term. They were confined to those cases, where the act complained of could be considered the misprision of the Court itself, in the form of the entry," and where the mistake was amendable by other parts of the record, which admitted of no doubt; such as "a fault of entry of a continuance, or of an essoin, or misrecital of the original writ. 8 Co. 156, b. But at common law, there could be no amendment after the term, where the act complained of was the misprision of the clerk. 8 Co. 156, b. The statutes of the 14th of Edw. 3d, ch. 6, and of the 8th of Hen. 6, ch. 12, were made to remedy this evil. The last of these statutes declares, that the Courts shall have power to reform and amend, in affirmance of judgments, "all that to them, in their discretion, seemeth to be the misprision of the clerks." 8 Co. 157. These statutes were always in force in this country; but, they were, moreover, together with all the other British statutes, "commonly called statutes of Jeofails," adopted by our Legislature, in the year 1753, (6 Hen. Stat. at Large, 339,) "for so much thereof as relates to any mispleading, Jeofail, and amendment;" and they applied to the proceedings of all our Courts of record. They were not affected by the act of 1792, (13 Hen. Stat. at Large, 234,) declaring that no British statutes should have any force or authority in this Commonwealth. For, that act was manifestly intended to apply to such British statutes, as had been referred to by the ordinance of the 562 Convention of 1776, (9 Hen. Stat. *at Large, 127,) which were such as had always been in force here, and not to such as had, by previous acts of our Legislature, been expressly adopted, and, as it were, incorporated into our Code of Statute Law. But they were repealed by the act of 1819, (1 Rev. Code, 16,) because they were not included in the late publication of the laws.

It was not, however, the intention of the Legislature, to leave us exposed to the inconveniences of the limited powers of amendment given by the common law. In repealing the British statutes of amendment, they adopted a provision more extensive than any in the British statutes. That provision is to be found in the 108th section of the 128th chapter of the act of 1819, (1 Rev. Code, 512;) and it declares, that "where in the record of any judgment or decree of any Superior Court of Law or Equity, there shall be any mistake, miscalculation, or misrecital of any sum or sums of money, tobacco, wheat or other such thing, or of any name or names, and there shall be among the record of the proceedings in which such judgment or decree shall be rendered, any verdict, bond, bill, note, or other writing of the like nature or kind, whereby such judgment or decree may be safely amended, it shall be the duty of the Court in which such judgment shall be rendered, and the Judge thereof in vacation, to amend such judgment or decree thereby, according to the very truth and justice of the case, provided the opposite party, &c. shall have reasonable notice, &c."

The British statutes of amendment extended only to misprisions of the clerk; whereas, our new statute extends to those of the Court also; not indeed, to errors in the judgment of the Court, in point of law, but to mistakes of the Court, in the sum, name or quantity; which may be regarded as clerical misprisions of the Court, in reducing its judgment to writing.

But, before we proceed to consider the correct construction of the act of 1819, concerning amendments, which do not take effect till January, 1820, it will be use- 563 ful to consider *the nature of the error complained of in this case, and the power of amending it, under the laws that were in force here, prior to the 1st January, 1820.

The motion on which the original judgment was rendered, was a summary proceeding, in which the Court were authorised to give a judgment, without the formality of pleadings in writing. No declaration was required from the plaintiff, nor any bail, nor plea from the defendants. The plaintiff was entitled to a judgment according to the proofs adduced. The notice informed the defendants, that the plaintiff demanded the first instalment, with interest thereon from the 19th of April, 1817. The bond itself expressly bound them to pay interest from that time, and was, of itself, sufficient evidence to authorise and require a judgment for interest thereon, from that time, unless controlled by countervailing testimony. The record states, that on the trial of the motion, the defendants "were called, but came not;" and entry which, in a summary proceeding like this, necessarily implies that they did not appear either in person or by attorney, and that they introduced no testimony whatever. There was, then, nothing for the Court to do, but to render judgment according to the evidence of the plaintiff, viz: according to the bond, for the first instalment, with interest from the 19th of April, 1817. We know, however, that on such occasions, the Court enters into no detail in pronouncing its judgment. All that is then done, is to direct a judgment according to the bond; leaving it to the clerk to extend it, in proper form, upon the order book.

If we attend to the power of amendment as exercised by the Courts of Westminster Hall, under the very laws that were in force in this country until the 1st of January, 1820, it is incontrovertible that such a mistake as that complained of in this case, would be there considered as a misprision of the clerk; and that although the entry of the judgment should be signed by the presiding Judge of the Court, it would, nevertheless, be regarded and amended as a misprision of the Court, it would, nevertheless, be regarded and amended as a misprision of the clerk.

564 *The case of Chapman v. Gale, 2 Lev. 22, was debt against an executor, who pleaded plene administravit; verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, which was entered generally; and thereupon error was brought, and it was assigned, "that the judgment should have been de bonis testatoris si," &c. But upon the affidavit of the attorney, "that he gave the clerk instructions to enter it up according to the plea, and that it was a mere mistake of the clerk," it was amended as a misprision of the clerk.

The case of Short v. Coffin, 5 Burr. 2730, is to the same effect. That was the case of a motion to amend a judgment against an executor de bonis propriis, by making it de bonis testatoris si, &c., et de bonis propriis, si non, &c. It was after writ of error brought, in nullo est erratum pleaded, and an argument in the Exchequer Chamber. It was contended by the counsel opposed to the amendment, that it was not a mistake of the clerk, but a mistake in law; and that the amendment would alter essentially the judgment. But Lord Mansfield delivered it as the opinion of the Court, "that it was not an error in the judgment of the Court, but a mere mistake in the clerk;" and it was amended accordingly.

The first of these cases, Chapman v. Gale, shews also, that according to the practice in England, the General Court ought to have admitted the testimony as to the instructions given to the clerk, which would have proved clearly that the mistake was nothing more than the misprision of the clerk; and both cases shew, that in England, it would have been amended.

I am of opinion, that the most approved decisions of this Court are in conformity with the decisions of the English Courts. A judgment entered on the order book of one of the old District Courts, and signed by the presiding Judge, was amended by the same Court, at a subsequent term; and the power to amend was, on appeal, sanctioned by this Court, (Gordon v. Frazer, 2 Wash. 130,) on the ground that it was a misprision of the clerk, and that there was *something to amend by, viz: the bond on which the suit was brought, and the memorandum and credits endorsed thereon.

The case of Gordon v. Frazer, has never been expressly overruled; but, its authority is somewhat shaken by some subsequent cases, which seem to have been decided on principles inconsistent with it. The first of these is the case of Vaughan & Field v. Freeland, note to Cogbill v. Cogbill, 2 Hen. & Munf. 477. In that case, the clerk entered the verdict of the jury erroneously on the order book, and entered the judgment conformably to the erroneous entry of the verdict; and these entries were signed by the Judge. At a subsequent term, the same Court permitted the entries to be amended, so as to conform to the real finding of the jury. On appeal to this Court, the judgment was reversed on this ground, "that the order made for amending the record and altering the judgment entered on the said verdict, at another and a subsequent term, after verdict given and judgment thereon, fully drawn up, read and signed by the Judge in open Court, was erroneous; the said amendment, after the term, not being authorised by law."

In the case of Halley v. Baird, 1 Hen. & Munf. 25, which followed very shortly after, the same principle is declared, viz: "that the District Court had no power or jurisdiction to reverse, alter or amend the judgment given at a former term of the said Court, which had been entered on the order book, and signed by the Judge in open Court."

This last case was, no doubt, founded on the authority of Vaughan & Field v. Freeland; for, it is resorted to in the argument, and its phraseology expressly adopted by the Court. Both cases, so far as relates to the avowed principles of the decision, are in direct conflict with Gordon v. Frazer; for, in Gordon v. Frazer, the judgment had been "fully drawn up, read, and signed by the Judge in open Court."

566 *I do not think the case of Cogbill v. Cogbill, 2 Hen. & Munf. 467, can be considered as conflicting with Gordon v. Frazer. In Cogbill v. Cogbill, the question was, whether the entries in the order book, signed by the Judge, should be amended by the minutes of the clerk, as to a material fact noted in the minutes, but omitted to be carried into the order book by the clerk. This was a very different question from that which arose in Gordon v. Frazer. In Gordon v. Frazer, there was a bond, (which, to certain purposes, is a part of the record,) according to which the entry ought to have been made, and to which reference might be had, with safety, for correcting any mistake. But, the minutes of the clerk are no part of the record; they are generally taken hastily, and often inaccurately, and cannot, of themselves, be safely relied on for correcting errors in the order book, like a verdict, a bond, bill or note. The decision in Cogbill v. Cogbill may be, and I am inclined to think, is correct; but it does not weaken the authority of Gordon v. Frazer.

I feel myself at liberty to choose between the conflicting decisions of Gordon v. Frazer, on the one hand, and of Vaughan & Field v. Freeland, and Halley v. Baird, on the other; and I am constrained, by the best consideration I can give the subject, to prefer the authority of Gordon v. Frazer. Every body knows; that although the proceedings of the Superior Courts, after having been extended and entered on the order books, are read over in Court, and signed by the presiding Judge, yet, when these entries are founded on a verdict, bond, bill or note, or any such writing, there is a confidence that the clerk has extended them conformably thereto; which, almost always, prevents any enquiry into their correctness. In such cases, the mistake, if there be one, is, in its origin, that of the clerk; and it continues to be so, notwithstanding the reading and signing by the Judge. For, no comparison is made by the Court, between the entries as made by the clerk, and the papers on which they 567 are founded. The *judgment of the Court is not exercised on the subject. I feel less hesitation in rejecting the authority of the cases opposed to Gordon v. Frazer, because Judge Tucker, who sat in one of them, appeared, in Cogbill v. Cogbill, 2 Hen. & Munf. 478, not to be satisfied with Vaughan & Field v. Freeland; and I reject them the more readily, because this Court, in the late cases of Wren v. Thompson & Veitch, 4 Munf. 377, and Bent v. Patten, 1 Rand. 25. adverted to the case of Gordon v. Frazer, in a manner indicating no disapprobation.

The principle which I extract from the British decisions, and from Gordon v. Frazer, is, that that which, in its origin, was a mere misprision of the clerk, does not cease to be so, merely because the entry has been read in Court, and signed by the Judge; and that it will be amended as the misprision of the clerk, provided there is any thing in the record, by which it may be safely amended.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion, that if this case were to be decided by the laws in force, prior to the 1st of January, 1820, the mistake complained of would not be considered as an error in the judgment of the Court, but as the mistake of the clerk in entering the judgment of the Court; and that it would be amended as a clerical misprision, there being a bond in the record, by which the amendment might be safely made.

It remains, now, to consider the case under the act of 1819, which took effect on the 1st of January, 1820.

It is objected, that that act does not apply to the proceedings in the General Court.

The 11th section of the act, for the purpose of removing all doubts concerning the Courts to which the act may apply, declares, "that all things herein contained, not restricted by their nature, or by express provision, to particular Courts, shall be the rule of decision and proceeding in all Courts whatsoever, within this Commonwealth."

It will not be pretended, that there is any thing in the nature of the power of amendment, or in the nature and 568 *constitution of the General Court, which should restrict the salutary power of rectifying inadvertent mistakes, miscalculations, and misrecitals, to other Courts, in exclusion of the General Court.

Is there any thing in the "express provision" of the law, which operates such exclusion?

The section giving the power of amendment, applies, in terms to every Superior Court of Law and Equity.

All our Courts are classed, as to grade, into Superior and Inferior. This classification is recognised by various acts of Assembly, to which it surely cannot be necessary to refer. In reference to this distinction, it never has been, and I presume never will be, denied, that the General Court is a Superior Court of Law.

But, those Courts which are held in each county, by a Judge of the General Court, are also Superior Courts of Law, in reference to the Courts of Law held by the justices of the County Courts; which last are expressly designated by our laws, as Inferior Courts.

The question, then, as to this point, resolves itself into this: Did the Legislature, in using the terms "any Superior Court of Law," mean to confine them to the Superior Courts of Law for the several counties, or did they mean to extend them to all the Superior Courts of Law known to our system?

The terms "any Superior Court of Law" are, unquestionably, broad enough to embrace all Superior Courts of Law; and the reason of the law clearly applies to all. Unless, therefore, we have some evidence of the intention of the Legislature to exclude a particular Superior Court, the law must apply to all.

It was contended in the argument, that such evidence is to be found in that part of the act, which declares that the power of amendment shall be exercised by the Court, and "the Judge thereof in vacation." But I think we should construe that part of the act distributively, so as to apply it to all the Superior Courts when in ses-

569 sion, and to the *Judge, in vacation, of such Superior Courts as consist of one Judge only. We must necessarily adopt this construction, or the General Court, when in session, will be deprived of a power, which has for ages been deemed essential to the due administration of justice, and which that Court (as to clerical misprisions) always had before the passage of this law. When, in altering the former law, the power of amendment was enlarged as to all the other Superior Courts, it cannot be believed that it was intended to be taken away, altogether, from the General Court, to which it was as necessary as to any other.

The act, therefore, applies to the General Court.

It is also objected, that the mistake in this case, even if it be a clerical mispension, is not amendable under the act of 1819, which speaks of mistakes, miscalculations and misrecitals of sums and names, but is silent as to mistakes, &c. of a day, month or year. But, the act of 1819, is a statute of jeofail and amendment, and is, therefore, to be construed liberally. A mistake of a day, month or year, is of the same character with those enumerated in the act; and it is impossible to conceive a reason for amending the latter, which is not equally applicable to the former. Besides, the power of amendment is certainly enlarged as to those subjects which are embraced by the law; for, the mistakes, &c. of sums and names, are to be amended, whether they be the act of the clerk or of the Court. We cannot, therefore, suppose, that the Legislature intended to leave mistakes, &c. of other things of the same kind, unprovided for altogether. The subjects of mistakes, &c. enumerated in the act, were given as an example; and the act, by a just construction, must be extended to all other subjects of the same character. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the mistake in this case was not only a clerical mispension, but is amendable under the act of 1819.

The right to amend is not impaired, I think, by the admission on the record, that the judgment sought to be amended, had been, previously to the notice and motion, "fully satisfied as to the whole amount in the said judgment specified." The fair construction of that admission is, that the whole amount had been paid, which the judgment, as it then stood, authorised the Commonwealth to demand, viz. the first instalment, with interest thereon from the 2d day of March, 1824. It did not admit that to be paid, the demand of which was not authorized by the judgment. Whether the payment made was voluntary or coercive, does not appear. It cannot be pretended, that the voluntary payment of that which the judgment bound the party to pay, precluded the right to amend the judgment as to that which the judgment ought to have bound, but did not bind, the party to pay. If a coercive payment would have had that effect, the fact of such coercive payment, ought to have been alleged and proved.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the judgment of the General Court is erroneous, and should be reversed, with costs; and that this Court, pronouncing such judgment as the General Court ought to have rendered, should amend the first judgment, so as to make the $4,120 48, therein mentioned, bear interest from the 19th of April, 1817, till paid.

the other, land, negroes, &c. he paying therefor a stipulated annual sum, is not a sale, but a rent. Rent—What Constitutes.—Such a contract does not lose its character of a rent, by slaves and other personal property being included in the contract. Rent—Action for Recovery of—Interest.—Interest cannot be recovered as of course, in actions for the recovery of rent, but may be given, under circumstances, to be judged of by the jury.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Louisa county; where Lawrence, executor of Sarah Wood, deceased, brought an action of covenant against Mickie, on a contract in writing, sealed with the seals of the said Wood and the said Mickie, by which the said Mickie covenanted to give the said Wood 100l. each year, as long as the said Wood lived, for which he, the said Mickie, was to have her, the said Wood's, land and negroes, &c. The breach assigned was the non-payment of the said 100l. annually.

Issue was joined on the pleas of covenants performed, and covenants not broken. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,610 62 cts. with interest on $2,187 71 cts. from the 15th of March, 1815, till paid, and interest on $236 98 cts. from the 15th of October, 1815, till paid.

At the trial, the defendant filed two bills of exceptions; the first of which, not being noticed by the Judges, in their opinions, need not be further mentioned.

The second states that the defendant, by his counsel, moved the Court to instruct the jury, that unless they should be of opinion, from the evidence in the cause, that there were some special circumstances in this case, to take it out of the general rule of law that interest is not recoverable for rent due, they should not allow interest in this case; but the Court refused to give the instruction, because the demand of the plaintiff in this case, as it is considered by the Court, is not subject to any such rule, 572 but is a contract *to pay a certain sum in gross, as appears by the covenant on which this suit was brought. To this opinion, the defendant excepted, and appealed.

Wickham, for the appellant.

Stanard, for the appellee.

August 21. JUDGE CARR.

By contract under seal, it was agreed between Mrs. Wood and the appellant Mickie, that he should have, during her life, her land, negroes, &c. he paying her therefor a stipulated annual sum. After her death, suit was brought on the contract by her executor against Mickie. On the trial of that suit, the Court instructed the jury, that this was a contract to pay a sum in gross, and not a rent: that, therefore, the rule did not apply, which refuses interest or rent in arrear. Under this instruction, the jury gave interest on the sum due. The appellant excepted to the opinion of the Court, and appealed from the judgment.

There can be no question, I think, that this is substantially a lease, and not a sale. Such was clearly the intention of the parties; and no set form of words is necessary to constitute a lease. It is equally well settled, that the sum stipulated to be paid, is to be taken as rent issuing out of the land; though there were slaves and other personal property included in the lease. This is decided in Newton v. Wilson, 3 Hen. & Munf. 470, and other cases in this Court, and by many English cases. The simple question then is, whether interest be of course recoverable on rent in arrear?

Gratt. 178: Upper Appomattox Co. v. Hamilton, 83 Va. 324, 2 S. E. Rep. 195.

†Interest—Rent in Arrear.—See foot-note to Kyle v. Roberts, 6 Leigh 496: monographic note on "Interest" appended to Fred v. Dixon, 27 Gratt. 541: monographic note on "Landlord and Tenant" appended to Mason v. Moyers, 2 Rob. 606.

I have felt the full force of the remarks of the counsel for the appellee, shewing the different course of decision on the subject of interest, between the Courts of Westminster Hall, and ours; that there, interest is denied in all actions for money lent, goods sold and delivered, an 573 account *stated, money had and received, &c. &c.; and that it is the same spirit which withholds it there, in the case of rent arrear: that with us, interest in all these cases, and indeed in almost all cases of a liquidated demand for money, is constantly allowed; and that, in conformity with this course, on rent arrear ought also to be allowed, where it is a monied rent, and fixed in amount.

I confess, I think this the substantial justice of the case; and if it were res integra, I should not feel much hesitation on the subject. But, every day's experience impresses me more deeply with the importance of the maxim stare decisis. When this Court has had a question elaborately and repeatedly discussed before them, and have, upon consideration and re-consideration, decided in the same way, the circumstances must be strong indeed, and of rare occurrence, which, in my mind, would justify us in disturbing and unsettling the point. It is better for the community, that being once settled, it should remain, than that every Judge should feel himself at liberty to depart from it, in order to arrive at what he may consider more exact justice. Few questions have been more elaborately discussed by counsel, or more carefully considered by the Court, than this of interest upon rent arrear. Skipwith v. Clinch, 2 Call, 257; Newton v. Wilson, and Cook v. Wise, 3 Hen. & Munf. 483, re-considered, 500; Dow v. Adams' adm'r, 5 Munf. 21, and several other cases. In this last case, (which, though briefly reported, we are told by the experienced counsel for the appellant, was elaborately argued,) the decision is, "that although interest ought not to be given as of course, in actions for the recovery of rent, it may nevertheless be given under circumstances, to be judged of by the jury," &c. Here I think it best that the point should rest, and this be taken as the law of the case.

I think, therefore, the Court below misdirected the jury, and that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause sent back.

574 *JUDGE GREEN.

The question, whether interest is of course recoverable on rent in arrear, has been repeatedly and fully considered in this Court in the cases of Cook v. Wise, 3 Hen. & Munf. 463; Newton v. Wilson, Id. 470, 500; Dow v. Adams' adm'r, 5 Munf. 21, and other cases; and the rule is established by those cases, that it is not recoverable of course, but may be allowed under circumstances justifying such allowance. It was also decided in the case of Newton v. Wilson, in conformity to the well settled doctrine in the English Courts, that a compensation stipulated to be paid for the use of land and personal property together, is not a sum in gross, but rent issuing out of the land. The Court below instructed the jury, that the rule in respect to interest upon rents in arrear, did not apply to the case before them, inasmuch as the contract was to pay a sum in gross, and not a rent. The contract has all the essentials of a demise by deed, with reservation of rent. The defendant was to have the lands, slaves, &c., for a stipulated sum, to be paid annually during Mrs. Wood's life; and no form is necessary to the validity of a lease. I think, therefore, the Court erred in the construction put upon the contract.

But, it is said, that upon the face of the contract, there is a circumstance which, of itself, would entitle the plaintiff to interest; since it may be inferred, that there was no personal property on the land, out of which the rent might have been made by distress, except that which belonged to the lessor, and was demised to the lessee. This may be so; and Mrs. Wood may not have had a reversion, so as to entitle her to distraint. But, whether these things were so or not, was proper for enquiry before the jury. The decision of the Court precluded any evidence from being given to the jury on these points. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had therein.

575 *Upon a re-consideration of this case, with the aid of the notes of counsel, the contract is still considered as a contract of lease, and not of sale. If it were the latter, Mickie might have sold the interest of Mrs. Wood in the land, &c., for her life, to any other; and the purchaser would not have been liable in any for the payment of the sum stipulated to be paid annually to her. If a lease, he would have been responsible. If it was a sale for her life, she not being bound to warranty, if Mickie had been evicted by a paramount title, he would nevertheless have been bound to pay the annual sum stipulated to be paid. If a lease, he would have been discharged from that liability, or it would have been apportioned according to the circumstances of the case. The intention of the parties is to be considered; and the nature of the property, and the terms of the contract, shew satisfactorily that the parties did not intend the consequences of sale of the property for the life of Mrs. Wood; and that the negroes, &c. were intended to go with the land, for its cultivation.

The acts of Assembly directing an execution on an office judgment, founded on a bond, bill, or promissory note, or other writing for the payment of money or tobacco, to issue as well for interest until paid upon the principal sum due, from the time it was due, as for the principal sum, and that the jury shall, in all actions upon contracts, if interest is allowed, fix the time when interest shall commence, have no direct application to such a case as this. There could be no final judgment in the office, in any action founded on this contract. To ascertain the sum due, it was necessarily to be shewn, at what time Mrs. Wood died; and this fact could not be determined by the clerk. The first of the acts aforesaid, only applies to cases in which a certain sum is, by the terms of the writing sued upon, payable unconditionally on a certain day. The annual sum, stipulated by this contract to be paid, was not payable unconditionally, but upon the condition that the party was not prevented by eviction, from enjoining the 576 *property. The other act supposes the jury to have, in some cases which the act does not attempt to define, a discretion to allow interest, or not.

These acts, however, with the many cases mentioned in the notes of the plaintiff's counsel, prove that the spirit of our laws is, to allow interest in almost all cases of a liquidated demand for money, and in very many cases, in which it is not allowed in England. If the question under consideration was a new one, or if the former decisions of the Court on this subject had passed without a deliberate examination of the subject, I should have inclined to think, that interest ought to be allowed, as a general rule, upon a fixed and stipulated rent; and that, more properly than in many cases, in which it is usually allowed. The cases, however, appear to have been carefully considered, and fix the rule that interest is not recoverable, of course, upon rent; but may be recovered, upon circumstances which justify the allowance. These precedents, I think, bind us, and the judgment formerly pronounced may be entered.

JUDGE CABELL concurred, and the judgment was reversed, and the cause sent back.*

Advancements—Satisfaction of Legacy.—Where a legacy is given to a child, and afterwards an advancement is made to that child, such advancement shall be taken as a satisfaction of the legacy; but this presumption may be rebutted by evidence.

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE COALTER absent.

†Advancements.—See monographic note on "Advancements" appended to Watkins v. Young, 31 Gratt. 84.

‡Same.—When Satisfaction of—Legacy.—An advancement to a child, made subsequent to a will, is to be taken as a satisfaction pro toto or pro tanto, according to its amount. Moore v. Hilton, 12 Leigh 29, citing principal case as authority. And in Hansbrough v. Hooe, 12 Leigh 332, it is said, "The doctrine upon this subject so far as relates to legacies, was very concisely, but lucidly laid down by LORD ELDON in Trimmer v. Bayne, 7 Ves. 508. He says, 'The rule is settled, that where a parent, or person in loco parentis, gives a legacy as a portion, and afterwards, upon marriage or any other occasion calling for it, advances in the nature of a portion to that child, that will amount to an ademption of the gift by the will, and this court will presume he meant to satisfy the one by the other.' This rule was fully considered, recognized and acted on by this court, in the case of Jones v. Mason, 5 Rand. 577. I am clearly of opinion, that this rule is applicable to, and is decisive of, this case, so far as respects the legacies of slaves and other personal property; and consequently, that the decree as to those subjects is correct." To the same effect the principal case is cited in Strother v. Mitchell, 80 Va. 154.

Same—Rule of Ejusdem Generis.—The rule that the thing advanced must be ejusdem generis with the thing bequeathed, may be controlled by evidence shewing that it was the testator's intention, that the one should be in satisfaction of the other.

Chancery Practice—Costs.—In a case of great novelty, the Chancery Court ought not to give costs to either party.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court. The suit was originally brought in the County Court of Greenville, by Robert B. Jones against Edmunds Mason, executor of Benjamin Jones, deceased. The nature of the controversy is fully explained in the following opinions.

Stanard, for the appellant.

August 21. JUDGE CARR.

In the year 1816, Benjamin Jones made his last will, in which he seems to have apportioned his estate with great care and deliberation among his children. They were seven in number; three sons and four daughters. Three of the daughters were married and portioned. The fourth, Martha, with the three sons, Robert, Benjamin, and Thomas, were infants. It is to these infants that the bounty of the testator was principally confined. To his sons, he gave all his land, each a tract. His slaves, he seems (so far as we may judge) to have meant to divide equally. At least, this was so, with the three youngest,

Benjamin, Thomas and Martha. To 578 Robert (the eldest, *as I take it) he gives his plantation in Brunswick county, including the mill, &c., and 13 slaves by name, together with stock, horses, tools, &c.; among the negroes given, are Moses, Harry and Sam. When Robert came of age, his father put him in possession of the plantation as it stood; except that he took from it several slaves, not among those he had by will given his son, and also took away Moses and Sam, two of the slaves in the will; and left Ellick, Aggy and their child, not in the will. Harry, another slave mentioned in the will, was on the Manor plantation of the testator, when his son was invested with possession. It is stated by the executor in his answer, that the three slaves Ellick, Aggy and their child, were intended to supply the places of Moses, Harry and Sam; and that though somewhat inferior in value, that difference was more than made up by other property left on the estate, and advanced to Robert; and further, that at the time his portion of the estate was given up to him, it was a full and equal proportion of the testator's estate.

Things remained thus, till the death of the testator; when that took place, we are not told. He died without altering his will; and this bill is filed by Robert, to recover of the executor the three slaves Moses, Harry and Sam, claiming that Ellick, Aggy and child, were not given in substitution of them, but in addition to them; and that he has a right to both.

The executor, by his answer, controverts this claim, contending that when the testator put the plaintiff in possession, he manifested his intention of giving off to him at once, his whole portion, by removing from the place all those slaves he did not intend for him, and leaving those he meant to give him; and that by taking away Moses, Harry and Sam, and leaving Aggy, Ellick and child, he proved that he meant these last to stand instead of the former, and not in addition to them.

The case was set down for hearing by consent, on the bill and answer, and heard the same day.

579 *A question was raised at the bar, whether the statements in the answer were to be taken as true; a question of very little moment (in my mind) as to any influence it can have on this cause. I do not consider that the case comes directly within the letter of the rule, that where the plaintiff sets down a cause on bill and answer, he takes the answer as true in all things. There he acts upon his right; here the matter is by consent. But, I think it within the reason of the rule. I have no doubt, that this whole proceeding was taken at once, without the regular steps, for the purpose of trying without delay, in a friendly manner, the rights of parties; and that the bill and answer were intended to present the whole case to the Court, there being, in truth, no contradiction between them as to facts. The two affidavits are merely as to the amount of the difference in value between the slaves, not as to the fact of difference. I think then that the answer must be taken as a part of the case agreed to by the parties; that is, so far as it states facts, and so far as any extrinsic evidence can be looked to.

The great question in the cause is, was the legacy in the will, of Moses, Harry and Sam, revoked, adeemed, or satisfied, (for sometimes one term and sometimes another is used,) by the taking these slaves from the son's plantation, when he was put into possession, and giving him Ellick, Aggy and child? This question is important, and I believe, in this State, of the first impression. In the English books, there are many cases turning upon it; and the principles, which govern it, are considered as well settled. I will cite some of those cases.

Izard v. Hurst, 2 Freem. Rep. 224. "The defendant's testator, by his will, gave his four daughters 600l. apiece, and afterwards married his eldest daughter to the plaintiff, and gave her 700l. portion. After that, he makes a codicil, and gives 100l. apiece to his unmarried daughters, and thereby ratifies and confirms his will, and dies;

580 and the plaintiff preferred his bill for the legacy of 600l. given to *his wife by the will; and the only question was, whether the portion, given by the testator in his life-time, should be intended in satisfaction of the legacy? And held that it should; and agreed to be the constant rule of this Court, that where a legacy was given to a child, who, afterwards, upon marriage or otherwise, had the like or a greater sum, it should be intended in satisfaction of the legacy, unless the testator should declare his intent to be otherwise."

In Ellison v. Cookson, 1 Ves. jr. 100,

Lord Thurlow, speaking on this subject, says, "The common way of arguing this, is to forget entirely the rule of law; namely, that where a legacy is given to a child, it is deemed a portion, and therefore carries with it these qualities; that it is a deliberate distribution among his children of such portions as the testator thinks fit. Crediting him for that deliberation, if he advances in his life that sum which he has adjudged to be the due and proper portion for that child, the presumption of law is, that he has satisfied that intent, and consequently, that it is no longer a ground for any further demand."

But, though it is a presumption of law, it is not that kind of conclusive presumption, against which nothing can be said, but a presumption which the law makes upon the general facts, liable to be rebutted by evidence; and the kind of evidence for that is, any demonstration from the conduct and language of the author of both gifts, that he considered the gift by the will as still a subsisting benefit.

In Trimmer v. Bayne, 7 Ves. 508, Lord Eldon says, "The rule is settled, that where a parent or person in loco parentis gives a legacy as a portion, and afterwards, upon marriage or any other occasion calling for it, advances in the nature of a portion to that child, that will amount to an ademption of the gift by the will, and this Court will presume he meant to satisfy the one by the other."

The same doctrine is explicitly laid down in many other cases, as the unquestionable doctrine of equity; though some of the Judges seem rather disposed to quarrel with *the rule. See Twisden v.

Twisden, 9 Ves. 413; Hartop v. Hartop, 17 Ves. 184; Ex parte Pye v. Dubort, 18 Ves. 140; Coop. Equ. Cas. 270, and numerous other cases.

This being the established rule, let us see whether our case be within it.

That the testator meant to dispose of his whole estate, by his will, is most apparent. He does in fact dispose of it with great deliberation, and particularity, giving to each object of his bounty all that he intended such object should enjoy. Living till his eldest son came of age, he determined, as regarded him, to do at once what he had ordained should be done after his death. In the execution of this purpose, he had a full right to change or modify any part of the gift, and no man could say, "why dost thou?" The plantation which he had devised to the plaintiff, had been for some time settled as a quarter; and there were several slaves there, more than he intended to give to the plaintiff. When he invested his son with possession of the land, slaves, stock, &c. he sent from that place to his home plantation, those slaves he meant to keep himself, and left with his son those he meant to give him. Moses, Harry and Sam, though named in the will, were not left. Moses and Sam were sent from his son's place to his own; and Harry was already there. But, he gave to his son three slaves not in the will, Ellick, Aggy and their child. That these were given, the bill avers, and the answer acknowledges; and they have ever since been held, and are still held, by the plaintiff, as his property. It is agreed, that they are not of equal value; but the answer states, that the difference in value was more than made up by other property, and that at the time possession was given to the plaintiff, he took a full proportion of the estate. These statements I consider as proper evidence. Now, I ask, how this proceeding is to be explained? Can we understand it in any other way, than that the father was establishing his son, setting him up 582 in the world, giving him *his full proportion to manage for himself? Why, in this proceeding, should he withhold three of the negroes which the will had designated for his son? Why send them away from his place, and leave three others there? Clearly in my judgment, because he had changed his mind in this respect, and for some reason, determined to keep these slaves himself, and give his son others. He might have many reasons for this. These slaves might suit particular purposes, important to him. He might have a particular fancy for them. His will was his law in this matter, for all were his. But, if he did not mean to change this part of his gift; if he intended these slaves still for his son; can we conceive why he should not have given them to him, when he was setting him out, and delivering to him all the rest of his portion?

But, it was insisted, that the rule as to ademption of legacies could not apply to this case, because it is an essential ingredient in that rule, that the thing bequeathed, and the thing given, must be ejusdem generis; and it was affirmed, that no case could be produced, where a legacy of a specific thing was adjudged to be adeemed by the gift of another specific thing.

We must recollect, that this whole class of cases depends upon intention. We imply from a man's acts, his meaning. When he gives 500l. to A. his child, by will; and after, on her marriage, advances this same sum of money; its being the same thing in amount and in kind, makes it more apparent that the gift was a consummation of the bequest: that he was performing, in his life-time, the duty towards his child, which he had set down in his will to be performed after his death. Every legacy given to a child by a parent, is considered a portion for the advancement of such child. In England, from the nature of their property, and the situation of society, these portions and legacies are almost always in money. With us, nothing is so usual as to advance children by gifts of slaves. They stand with us, instead of money. If a man were to bequeath 583 *ten slaves by name to his daughter, and afterwards, on her marriage, to advance to her these same slaves, nobody would deny, I presume, that his was a satisfaction of the legacy. Suppose he were to bequeath to her ten slaves, to be selected by his executor; and after, on her marriage, he were himself to select ten, and advance to her; would anybody deny that this was an ademption of the legacy, especially when it was a full child's part, and as much as he could give to any other? Suppose a man were to bequeath to his child $10,000; and after, were to make to that child a deed for a tract of land, and declare in the deed, that it was in satisfaction of the legacy. All will agree, that this gift, though not ejusdem generis, would adeem the legacy; because it declares the intention; and the power of the owner being plenary, that intention must prevail. It is only a means to discover that intention, where it is not expressed, that the rule of ejusdem generis is resorted to. A reference to some of the English cases will shew that this is the ground of the rule.

Hoskins v. Hoskins, Prec. in Chan. 263. A father gave his son 750l. in his will. Afterwards, he bought him a cornet's commission, which cost 650l. It was decided, that this 650l. should be a satisfaction pro tanto for the 750l. If it be said that it was so decreed, because it was in proof, that the testator intended the 650l. should be discounted out of the legacy, and meant to have struck so much out of his will, but died before the accounts came from London, I answer, it still shews that intention is every thing; ejusdem generis, nothing. For, no one will contend, that the commission in the horse was ejusdem generis with the 750l.

Chapman v. Salt, 2 Vern. 646. S. devised 50l. to Mary, the wife of L. C. Afterwards, the testator gave L. C. a note for 50l. payable on demand. Objected, that the note was to one, the legacy to another. If the wife survived, she would have the legacy, and the executors of the husband, the note. But, it was proved, that 584 the *note was intended as a satisfaction of the legacy, and the bill was dismissed; shewing still, that intention is all.

It is laid down generally, that a residuary legacy will not adeem a portion due under a settlement; because, it is entirely uncertain what that legacy may be. But, this rule, like the rest, yields to intention.

Thus in Rickman v. Morgan, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 63; 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 394; to which I refer principally for the powerful argument of Lord Thurlow, on the subject of the intention of the party.

The last case I shall cite, is Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. 507, where it is decided, that a request of a share in powder works, to be made up in value 10,000l., charged with an annuity of 20l. for life, was a satisfaction of a portion of 2,000l. This certainly was not ejusdem generis; but the rule yielded to clear intention.

In the case before us, I have already stated the various considerations which tend to shew the intention of the father, in the gift of three slaves, Ellick. Aggy and child: that it could only be, to substitute them for Moses, Harry and Sam. It might, I think, be very fairly argued, that they are ejusdem generis; for, they are considered only as property, and they are property of the same kind. But, I do not think it necessary to press this point.

Upon the whole, I am clearly of opinion, that the plaintiff has no claim to Moses,

Harry and Sam, the legacy being adeemed by the subsequent gift.

The County Court certainly were wrong in supposing this a case of election; but, as no election was made, and the bill was dismissed, no harm is done.

I rather think it was harsh in the Superior Court, to give costs in a case of such novelty. What was said by the testator in his last illness, I do not think of any avail. It is too vague and uncertain to rest a decree on.

585 *JUDGE GREEN.

Robert B. Jones filed his bill in March, 1821, against Edmund Mason, executor of Benjamin Jones, the father of the complainant, stating that the testator, by his will, dated in July, 1816, devised to him a tract of land and sundry slaves by name, (14 in number) and amongst them, Moses, Harry and Sam: that upon his coming of age, his father put him in possession of the land devised to him, and delivered to him the slaves bequeathed, except the three above named: that the time of this advancement, his father, in addition to the slaves bequeathed, (with the exception of the three above specified,) advanced him other slaves, Ellick and Aggy and their child, who were far short in value of the slaves Harry, Moses and Sam: that his father always intended to make an equal distribution of his estate amongst his children: that after the publication of the will, and the settlement and advancement of the plaintiff, his father's estate had greatly increased in value, and in his opinion, the slaves bequeathed to him, with Ellick, Aggy and their child, did not exceed a child's part; and prays that the executor may discover, "whether the testator in his last illness, did, (when the executor was reading over the clause of bequest to the plaintiff,) ask him if the negro man Ellick was not embraced in the said clause; and whether he did not understand, that the testator's extreme indisposition prevented from proceeding to alter his will?"

The executor answers, that the plantation devised to the plaintiff was settled as a quarter; and when the plaintiff attained full age, the testator invested him with the possession of the estate as it stood, except in relation to some of the negroes attached to it: that at the time of the investment aforesaid, all the negroes contained in the said legacy, with the exception of Harry, (who was on the Manor plantation of the testator) were on the quarter aforesaid, together with several other negroes: that instead of 586 *the testator (who seemed desirous to give off to the complainant his estate at once) sending Harry up there, he, amongst others, brought Moses and Sam to his own house, and left, from among the negroes already on that estate, three other negroes, Ellick, Aggy and their child, which were intended as supplying the place of Moses, Harry and Sam: that this arrangement was, as he believed, so understood by all the parties. He admits, that the testator's estate has increased in a greater ratio than the plaintiff's; yet his was, at the time when he was invested with the possession, a full and equal proportion: that he has no doubt there was an inconsiderable difference in the value of the negroes so substituted, and those for whom they were substituted; but that this difference was greatly more than exceeded by other property left on the said estate, and advanced to the plaintiff; and he admits, that in the testator's last illness, he asked the questions mentioned by the complainant, and indicated a desire to new-model the whole will; but he did not, in that or any other conversation, express the least wish to give to Robert either of the three negroes retained at home, but expressed a wish to give him a particular boy, in lieu of one which Robert had lost among his own.

The will, besides the plantation and the negroes, gave to Robert the stock of cattle, hogs and sheep, on the plantation, two riding horses, a black and a bay, (called his.) one bay mare and colt, one sorrel mare, two beds and furniture, and all the plantation tools on the said plantation; and after various other devises and bequests, both specific and pecuniary, he gave the residue of his estate, real and personal, to be kept together for the support of his younger children and his wife, and to be equally divided between his three younger children, Benjamin, Thomas and Martha.

Two affidavits were taken by consent on the 28th of February, 1821, proving that Moses and Sam were worth $200 more than Ellick, Aggy and their child.

587 *The bill, answer, will and affidavits, were filed together on the 6th day of March, 1821, and the cause immediately heard by consent upon these papers.

A question is made, whether, in consequence of this proceeding, the answer must be taken to be true; and I think it must. It was really bringing the cause to hearing on bill and answer. The bill and answer both stated, that the three negroes bequeathed and not delivered to the legatee, were of more value than the three delivered, which were not bequeathed; and the only purpose of the affidavits was, not to contradict the bill or answer, but to supply a defect in both, by ascertaining the quantum of difference in the values of these slaves.

Upon this case, both the Courts below decreed that the plaintiff was bound and entitled to elect, whether to take the three slaves bequeathed but not delivered to him, or the three delivered but not bequeathed to him, but could not take them all. In this respect, the decrees are clearly erroneous. If Ellick and Aggy and their child were not given, so as to vest a title in the plaintiff, then the transaction could not amount to an ademption of the legacy of the three not delivered; and in that case, he would be entitled to the slaves bequeathed, and the Court could not make it a condition upon which to give relief, that he should deliver to the executor those to which he had no title and held wrongfully; and which the executor might have, at any time, recovered by an action at law. Specific property cannot, in any case, be set off against specific property, in a Court of Equity. If, on the other hand, Ellick,

Aggy and their child, were given by the testator to the plaintiff, (as both the bill and answer virtually affirm, and therefore must be taken for true,) then it is either an ademption of the legacy as to Moses, Harry and Sam, or it is not. If it is, the will is annihilated as to them; and is as if it did not contain their names. If not, then he has a right to them under the will, and to the others under the gift. He would not, in that case, claim under and against the will: which *is the only case in which a party claiming under a will, can be put to his election.

Before I proceed to examine the effect of the facts admitted in this case, it will be proper to ascertain the general rules which have been well settled, as applicable to cases like this.

The statute now in force, passed in 1785, ch 61, sec. 7, 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, 141, is the same in effect (but in an abridged form,) as that of 1748, ch. 5, sec. 12, which was taken verbatim from the 22d section of the British statute of frauds of the 29th Ch. 2, and provides, that "no will in writing or any devise therein of chattels shall be revoked by a subsequent will, codicil, or declaration, unless the same be in writing." The object of this provision was to prohibit the revocation, wholly or partially, of a written will, by parol declarations or nuncupative dispositions, which might have been done before the statute of frauds, even as to wills of lands. The statute of frauds, however, has never been held to prohibit the revocation either of wills of land, or of personality, by implications founded upon events subsequent to the making of the will; although the prohibition by the statute as to the revocation of a will of lands, is much stronger than that as to the revocation of a will of personality; in respect to lands, the statute declaring that no will shall be revoked, in whole or in part, but by another will in writing, or by burning, cancelling, tearing or obliterating; and in respect to personality, declaring, that no will shall be revoked in whole or in part, by another will, codicil or declaration, unless it be in writing; leaving all other modes of revocation to operate as at common law. Thus in England, the subsequent marriage and birth of a child was an implied revocation of the will, both as to real and personal property; as it was with us, (Wilcox v. Rootes, 1 Wash. 140,) until the 1st of January, 1787, when the act of 1785, ch. 61, sec. 3, took effect, by which it is provided, that a last will and testament, made when the testator had no child living, *wherein any child he might have is not provided for or mentioned, if at the time of his death he leave a child, or leave his wife enseat of a child, which shall be born, shall have no effect during the life of such after-born child, and shall be void, unless the child die without having been married before he or she shall have attained the age of 21 years.

As, notwithstanding the statute, a revocation in toto might be implied from facts afterwards occurring, so a partial revocation as to any particular legacy might be implied from subsequent facts, and the acts of the testator. Thus, if a testator gave to his daughter 500l. by his will, and afterwards, on her marriage, advanced the 500l. to her, this would be an implied revocation of that particular legacy, upon a presumption of law that it was intended by the testator as a satisfaction and ademption of the legacy. But, this presumption must be founded solely upon the qualities and circumstances of the fact, without regard to the declarations of the testator; for, if the circumstances and qualities of the act were not, of themselves, sufficient to justify the presumption, then to admit the declarations of the testator to be used to supply the defect of the fact, in order to raise the presumption, would be directly against the terms of the statute. But, if the fact itself be sufficient to raise the presumption, the evidence of the declarations of the testator are admissible to rebut the presumption, and to shew that he did not intend, by the act in question, to adeem the legacy, as parol evidence is in all other cases admitted to repel a presumption. These principles are well explained in Ellison v. Cookson, 1 Ves. jr. 100; Trimmer v. Bayne, 7 Ves. 508; Hartop v. Hartop, 17 Ves. 184. And in like manner, a particular legacy may, by implication, be adeemed in part as well as in toto, if the act of the testator be such as to shew that a subsequent advancement was intended as a satisfaction of the legacy in part.

590 *The ground, upon which the presumption of law in such cases is founded, is this. Legacies to a child are in general given, in pursuance of the natural obligation of the parent, as a provision for the advancement and establishment of the child in life; and, if in the life time of the father, the child is settled in life, by marriage, or otherwise separated from the family of the parent, and commences the business of his life, and the parent makes him substantial advancements in proportion to his ability and pre-determination as expressed in his will, he is presumed to have intended to give now what (when he made his will) he intended to give at his death, in whole or in part, according to the amount and circumstances of the advancement, rather than to have intended to abandon and violate the deliberate purpose expressed in his will, as to the distribution of his property amongst the members of his family, by giving to the child advanced an undue proportion of his estate, and more than he intended by his will, both the legacy and the advancement.

The testator, in the case at bar, left a wife and three sons, all under age when he made his will, and four daughters, of whom three were married, and had been in part advanced, and the other was an infant. To the daughters and their families, he gave money and negroes. To the sons, he gave all his land, consisting of two tracts, the quarter which he devised with the stock, &c. upon it to Robert the complainant, and that where he resided, which he divided between his two younger sons. A part of the negroes at the quarter, he bequeathed to Robert by name; and gave the balance, except those specifically bequeathed, to the families of his married daughters, together with all his undisposed of residuum, consisting of stocks, &c. to his two youngest sons and unmarried daughter, to be kept together and worked on his home plantation, for the support of his wife and three youngest children; and when Benjamin came of age or married, he was to have his part of the land, and one third of the residuary negroes, stocks, 591 *&c. and the balance to be kept on that part of the land, and worked for the support of the widow and two youngest children, until Martha came of age or married; when she was to have the money given her, and a moiety of the remainder of the negroes, and Thomas was to have the residue of the land, negroes, &c. charged with the support of the widow.

When Robert came of age, the testator put him in possession, as his own, of all that he had devised and bequeathed to him, except the negroes in question; two of which he withdrew from the plantation given to Robert, to which they had belonged; and instead of these three negroes, he advanced to Robert three other negroes, which lived on that plantation, and other articles not bequeathed to him by the will; which, with the value of the three negroes not bequeathed, exceeded in value the three negroes bequeathed and not advanced or delivered to Robert; and this was a full and equal proportion of the testator's estate. What the other property not bequeathed, given to Robert, besides the negroes not bequeathed, consisted of, is not stated; but, it was probably provision to support the plantation until Robert could make a crop, which was not provided for him by the will.

These are the facts and circumstances, on which we are to say, whether a legal presumption arises, that the testator, by this gift to Robert when he came of age, intended to satisfy and adeem the legacy in full, and whether the bequest is revoked by implication, or not?

I cannot resist the conviction, that such was the intention of the testator. The circumstances that when his son came of age, he put him immediately in the possession of all the property devised and bequeathed to him, except the three negroes, and gave him three other negroes not bequeathed, of less value indeed than the others, but compensated in other property; the separating, at that precise time, the two negroes bequeathed, from the rest, and removing them from the plantation, 592 where they had been *resident and employed; as well as the separating and removing of all the other negroes not given, who were settled on the same plantation; indicated clearly an intention to separate this son finally from the family of the testator, to set him up in life, and to advance him fully to the extent intended by the father. He was doing, in his lifetime, in effect, all he had intended to do for this son by his will; and the substitution of three other negroes for the three taken away, and compensating the son for the difference in value, with other property not bequeathed, fortifies this conclusion.

This conclusion was resisted, in the argument of the cause, by the suggestion that the negroes given by the testator, were not of equal value with those given by the will, and withheld. This objection is unfounded; for, that difference in value was made up with other property given with them.

The only real objection insisted on is, that no case has been decided, in which a gift of a specific thing has been adjudged to adeem a legacy of another specific thing; and that the rule in respect to satisfactions and adempptions, presumed from circumstances, is, that the thing given, and the thing bequeathed, should be ejusdem generis.

In cases of this class, the question is only as to the intention of the testator, to be inferred from his acts, and not from his expressed will. It is impossible to prescribe any technical and inflexible rules governing the result of such an enquiry. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances. The rule of ejusdem generis is of some use in elucidating the enquiry into intention. If either the specific thing, given by the will, or given by the testator in his life, should appear not to be intended as a portion, or as a substantial part of the intended advancement for the establishment of the child in life, and intended as an additional manifestation of kindness, the gift of one would not adeem the other; and in England, hardly any other case of the bequest and gift of specific 593 articles can occur. There *the universal practice is to provide the portions or fortunes of younger children in money, either by will or settlement; and the obligation, when resulting from a settlement or a promise made by will, is generally satisfied by a bequest of money, or a gift of money in the life-time of the party. With us, the advancement of children is most frequently in negroes; and a bequest or gift of negroes is generally made as an advancement for the better establishing the child in life; and here, a gift of negroes, in lieu of other negroes, may be considered as an ademption of the legacy, if other circumstances shew that such was the intention of the testator. These are, to all the purposes of the argument, ejusdem generis.

There are also cases in the English books, in which this rule has not been strictly adhered to. A few examples of the application of the rule, and in which it has been disregarded, will illustrate the reason and foundation of the rule.

In the case of Grave v. The Earl of Salisbury, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 425, it was held, that the grant of a lease for 99 years at a rent of 40l. per annum, which was worth 180l. per annum, and money paid for repairs, and the standing crop, the commissioner estimating the value of the whole at 4,400l., was not an ademption pro tanto of a legacy of 10,000l. The Chancellor says, upon this rule of ejusdem generis, "In the present case, it would be presuming that Lord Salisbury had the idea of a portion in his mind, when he was giving a thing not ejusdem generis. The true ground of this case is, that the whole gift of the lease, repairs and crop, being one and the same transaction, was either intended as an advancement and ademption of the legacy pro tanto, or the testator had no such intention. If he had intended it as an ademption pro tanto, he would have fixed a value upon it, and not have left it to be afterwards ascertained by estimate and conjecture. See Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. 507.

594 *In Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 555, it was held by the Lords Commissioners, that a legacy to a son of 500*l.* was not adeemed by the father's taking him into partnership with him, in a trade in which they were to have a capital of 3000*l.* to be brought in equally. The father brought in the whole capital, and had said that he meant to give half the stock to his son, and so it was understood in the family; and one witness said he had given him half the stock. This was not held to be a satisfaction, not being ejusdem generis, and that it must have been the testator's intention that he should have both.

It has also been held, that the bequest of a residue is not a satisfaction of a portion, for which the father was bound, as it consists of choses in action and is uncertain as to its amount. In such a case, when the father is under a legal obligation to pay a portion, the provision by will must be equal to the portion, and subject to no condition or uncertainty; a rule, which is not strictly applied to a case of the ademption of a legacy by a gift. For, both the legacy and the gift are purely voluntary, and the testator may substitute, if he choose, one thing for another, or a lessor for a greater value.

The only enquiry is, whether, in fact, the circumstances were such as to prove that intention. The cases above noticed, proceeded upon intention; and the difference in the things given and bequeathed, and the uncertainty of the residue both as to the amount and time of payment, were calculated to induce a belief, that the testator had no intention to adeem the legacy, or satisfy the portion. Other cases have occurred, in which the rule of ejusdem generis has given way to the intention of the testator, inferred from the other circumstances of the case, and a residue has been considered as a satisfaction; as in Hoskins v. Hoskins, Prec. in Ch. 263, the father bequeathed to his younger son 750*l.* and afterwards bought him a cornet's commission for 650*l.*; and this was held to be a revocation of the legacy pro tanto. In this case, it was proved that 595 *the testator intended to alter his will, and deduct this from the legacy, but died before he did it. This evidence probably had no influence on the decision; for, it was clearly inadmissible, the case occurring after the statute of frauds.

In Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. 507, it was held, that a portion of 2000*l.*, for which the father was bound, was satisfied by a legacy of a share in powder works, (charged by the will with the payment of an annuity of 20*l.*) which the testator directed should be made up in money to the value of 10,000*l.* The value of the share did not appear, and might have been 9,500*l.* The value of the legacy, as fixed by the testator, ascertained his intention; and in Rickman v. Morgan, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 394, it was held, that a residue was a satisfaction of a portion of 8,000*l.*; the intention of the testator being inferred from the quantum of the residue.

It seems, therefore, that the rule of ejusdem generis is not conclusive that the testator did not intend to adeem a legacy by giving another thing in his life-time; but is one (and in England, a strong) circumstance to prevent the presumption of ademption or satisfaction, yet capable of being overruled by other circumstances; and in the case at bar, I think the manner and circumstances of the gift shew, that the intent of the testator was to give at once to the plaintiff all he intended to give him, and to substitute the three negroes and other property given, for the three negroes bequeathed and not given.

The declarations of the testator are admissible evidence to rebut this presumption. But, they were not such as to impair the legal presumption in this case. The enquiry of the testator, when the clause in the will giving the negroes to the plaintiff was read, whether Ellick and Aggy were not in it, does not prove that he wished to insert their names in addition to the others; but might have been to provide, as he had done in respect to others of his children, and as is very usual, a clause confirming the title to what he had already given him. It is not necessary to 596 examine *the other suggestions of the executor's answer, in respect to the testator's intentions.

This case being one of the first impression with us, and presenting a question of some novelty and difficulty, I think the County Court were right in not decreeing costs to either party; but wrong, in giving the plaintiff an election; which, however, can now do no injury to the appellee; and that the decree of the Chancery Court should be reversed with costs, and that of the County Court affirmed, with costs of the Chancery Court to the appellee.

JUDGE CABELL, concurred, and the decree was reversed.*

defendants; but, it did not specify the names either of the plaintiffs or defendants, "but only describes them as "the above named defendants."

The sheriff returned, that it was levied on one ox-cart. The defendants still failed to appear; and judgment was entered at the rules, which was made final at the succeeding Court.

From this judgment, the defendants appealed.

The case was submitted.

August 21. JUDGE CABELL.

This was an action of debt on a bond against Charles Clay and Edward Clay. The capias being returned "not found," an attachment was thereupon issued, which was returned "levied on an ox-cart." The defendants still failing to appear, a common order was taken against them, which was afterwards confirmed.

A supersedeas was awarded on the application of Edward Clay.

The attachment specifies neither the names of the plaintiffs, nor of the defendants, nor any sum of money as being demanded in the suit. For these reasons, the attachment was fatally defective, and unfit to be the foundation of the judgment.

I consider the return, also, on the attachment, as defective. It does not state to whom the "ox-cart" belonged; and there is nothing in the body of the attachment to lead us to the knowledge of the fact. An attachment is resorted to, for the purpose of forcing an appearance. It is intended to supply the place of a capias executed. It ought, therefore, to be levied on some property belonging to each defendant; otherwise, there will be nothing to inform him of the existence of the suit; and a judgment would thus be obtained by surprise. Even if the attachment had specified the names of the defendants, yet I should be inclined to think the return defective, in not specifying to whom the ox-cart belonged. The defendants were not sued as partners, *and it is very improbable that the ox-cart belonged to them jointly. If it belonged to one of them only, there was no service of the attachment as to the other.

The judgment should be reversed, the attachment quashed, and the cause remanded to the rules, to be farther proceeded in.

APPENDIX—No. 1.

OPINION OF JUDGE CABELL, IN THE CASE OF LAND v. JEFFRIES.

[See the case pa. 268.]

Land v. Jeffries.*

June, 1827.

Mrs. Birdsong, a widow, being entitled to several slaves as her dower in the estate of her former husband, and to some furniture in her own right, and being about to marry John M. Jeffries, who was known to be very much in debt, was very desirous to have her property conveyed to her own separate use and benefit, and protected from all liability to the payment of the debts of her intended husband. Jeffries was utterly opposed to becoming a party to any marriage settlement, but declared his entire willingness that she should make any disposition of her property that she and her friends might desire. Nathaniel D. Land, one of the brothers of Mrs. Birdsong, on whom she relied for taking such measures as might be necessary for effectuating her wishes, in relation to her property, confiding in the integrity and skill of Jeffries, the intended husband, (who was a lawyer by profession,) consulted him on the occasion; and he advised the execution of an absolute conveyance of the property to John W. Land, another brother of Mrs. Birdsong, who was then absent in the military service of the State. Such a conveyance was accordingly drawn by Jeffries himself, and executed by Mrs. Birdsong, in the presence of many persons, on the day of the marriage, and probably not an hour before the marriage. The property, after the marriage, passed into the possession of Jeffries until the return of Land, which seems to have been shortly afterwards, when it was hired by Land to Jeffries, for one year; and he continued to hold it, afterwards, on the same terms, until some of the slaves were taken in execution, by Charles W. Steward, a creditor of Jeffries. John W. Land, the grantee, in the deed executed by Mrs. Jeffries, as aforesaid, presented, as her next friend and trustee, to the Chancellor of the Richmond District, a bill of injunction, stating the above circumstances, and particularly, that the object of the conveyance was to secure the property to the separate use of Mrs. Jeffries, free from the claims of the creditors of Jeffries. The injunction was awarded, and afterwards dissolved by the Chancellor.

The question is as to the validity of the deed from Mrs. Birdsong to her brother John W. Land.

The statute of frauds, (under which it is contended that the deed is void,) is merely declaratory of the common law, and vacates no conveyance, unless it shall appear to have been executed with intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors or subsequent purchasers; for, as Lord Mansfield said, in Cadogan and Kennet, Cowper, 434, "that statute does not militate against any transaction, bona fide, and where there is no imagination of fraud; and so is the common law."

The burden of proving the fraudulent intent, is on him who seeks to vacate the conveyance. But, he will be allowed to establish it by any kind of legal testimony; whether it be direct and positive, or presumptive or circumstantial.

In the absence of direct and positive testimony, there are many facts and circumstances which the law admits to be marks or signs of fraud; and from which, therefore, the fraudulent intent may be inferred. Some of these circumstances afford only prima facie evidence of it; but others afford conclusive evidence, and establish it decisively.

There are some cases where the conveyance is said to be fraudulent in law, and others where it is said to be fraudulent in fact.

A conveyance is said to be fraudulent in law, when it has been executed under such circumstances, that the law itself conclusively infers a fraudulent intent, from the intrinsic nature of the circumstances, without any enquiry into the actual intent of the parties to the transaction. A conveyance is said to be fraudulent in fact, where the circumstances are not such as that the law conclusively infers a fraudulent intent from them, but where the parties have actually intended to delay, hinder or defraud creditors or subsequent purchasers. But, both descriptions of cases are equally void under the statute of fraud; for, in the first, the fraudulent intent is inferred by the law, and in the second it is actually proved.

It is contended for the appellee, Steward, that the conveyance, in this case, is fraudulent in law, because, the possession did not accompany and follow the deed.

Before I examine the character of the possession in this particular case, and the weight to which it is entitled, I deem it important to state, as concisely as I can, my views of the doctrines of the law on the subject of the possession of personal property, in general, after an absolute conveyance of them. I deem it important, because I conceive that the decision of this case will depend mainly upon the correct understanding of these doctrines.

I will premise that I have not been able to discover, any contrariety or inconsistency in the modern decisions of the English Courts,

*JUDGE CABELL refers to this decision in Clayton v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 316; Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 460; and BALDWIN, J., refers to it in Tavenner v. Robinson, 2 Rob. 386.

or in the opinions of their Judges on this subject. There is certainly no such contrariety nor inconsistency to be discovered in the Supreme Court of the United States, or in this Court. If there be the appearance of 602 *contrariety or inconsistency of opinion, that appearance will vanish, if the expressions of the Judges shall be construed, (as they always ought to be) in reference to the circumstances of the particular case, and to the points presented for decision.

The only real question that has ever been submitted to the Courts, on this subject, is whether a possession not accompanying and following the deed, is to be considered as only a badge or evidence of fraud, to be submitted to the jury, under the direction of the Court, and, of course, liable to be rebutted by counter-testimony, or whether it is to be considered "such a circumstance per se, as makes the transaction fraudulent in point of law."

But, that question does not, by any means, involve any doubt as to the effect of the mere circumstance of actual possession not passing from the grantor, contemporaneously with the execution of the conveyance; nor as to the effect of the mere circumstance of such possession being found in his hands afterwards. No body ever pretended that either of these, was such a circumstance, per se, as makes the transaction fraudulent in law. Every body admits that the mere possession of personal property, after an absolute conveyance, is only evidence of fraud, to be submitted to the jury, and that it is only prima facie evidence. This is expressly stated by Lord Eldon, in Lady Arundel v. Phipps, 10 Ves. 144. He says, "the mere circumstance of possession of chattels, however familiar it may be to say that it proves fraud, amounts to no more than that it is prima facie evidence of property in the man possessing, until a title, not fraudulent, is shewn, under which that possession has followed. Every case from Twyne's Case downwards supports that." Being only prima facie evidence of fraud, it must, from its very nature, be liable to be rebutted by other testimony. (1 Starkie's Evidence, 453,) and consequently, the possession of the vendor is susceptible of explanation, as to its character, for the purpose freeing it from the imputation of fraud. Many cases might be stated as examples, for shewing the operation of this principle; but a single one will suffice. A man purchases a slave of another, for full consideration, and bona fide; the slave at the time of the sale, is on the farm of the vendor; it is the expectation and intention of both parties that he shall be removed with all reasonable despatch; and he remains, in the mean time, in the possession of the vendor, without any regard to his convenience, but solely to await the reasonable convenience of the vendee in removing him. But, before the vendee can thus remove him, an execution comes out against the goods and chattels of the vendor, and the sheriff finding the slave in his possession, levies the execution upon him and sells him. In an action of trespass brought by the vendee against the sheriff, if the vendee exhibits nothing but his absolute bill of sale, the sheriff may shew that notwithstanding that bill of sale, the slave was found by him in the vendor's possession. Now, as the possession of personal chattels is, prima facie, evidence of property in, or of trust for, the person possessing, the possession of the vendor, thus exhibited, would be prima facie, inconsistent with the avowed object of the absolute conveyance to the vendee, and would, therefore, be prima facie evidence of a trust for the vendor, and that the absolute conveyance was intended as a cover to disguise and conceal that trust, and thereby to delay, hinder and defraud creditors, &c. But still, this would be prima facie evidence only, liable to be rebutted by other testimony. If, therefore, the vendee shall prove that the possession of the vendor was connected with no motive of benefit or advantage to the vendor, but was for the reasonable convenience of the vendee only, and was intended to continue no longer than such reasonable convenience required, all presumption of property in the vendor, or of trust for him, is done away, and consequently, the possession of the vendor is shewn not to be inconsistent with the purpose of the absolute deed; and thus, the whole foundation for the inference of fraud, would be removed. *But, suppose the sheriff should not only prove that the slave was found in the actual possession of the vendor, but that it was agreed between the vendor and vendee, at the time of the conveyance, that the slave should remain in the possession of the vendor, for a long or a short time, to be used by him, during that time, as if he were the owner. Such a possession by the vendor would be manifestly inconsistent with the deed; for, the deed purports to be for the sole and exclusive benefit of the vendee, whereas the possession, as explained by the agreement, shews a trust for the benefit of the vendor. Or, suppose there be no agreement expressly proved, that the slave shall remain with the vendor to be used by him as if he were the owner, yet if the slave be actually found in his possession and use, after the conveyance, or if he be found in his possession only, that is (as has been already said) prima facie evidence of property in, or of trust for the vendor, inconsistent with the deed; and although, as being prima facie evidence only, it is liable to be rebutted by other evidence shewing that the possession is not inconsistent with the deed, yet if there be no such rebutting testimony, the prima facie evidence acquires, thereby, "a conclusive quality," (1 Starkie, 454,) and proves the fact it purports to prove, the inconsistency of the possession, as decisively as if there had been an express agreement that the slave should remain in the possession and use of the vendor.

This inconsistency of possession is all that is meant, when it is said that possession does not "accompany and follow the deed;" and the only question that has ever been made upon the subject, is whether such inconsistent possession be only evidence of fraud, to be submitted to a jury, and liable to be rebutted by other testimony, or whether it be "such a circumstance per se, as makes the transaction fraudulent in law."

In some cases, the inference of fraud is a mere question of fact; and being a question of fact, can only be found by 605 *a jury. It is always so, when the fraud depends, not on the mere act done, but on the intention with which it was done. As, for example, when a debtor assigns his property for valuable consideration, and delivers possession thereof; this will be fraudulent or otherwise, according to the intention with which it was done; and that can be ascertained by a jury only. 1 Starkie, 427; 2 Starkie, 616.

But, there are other cases in which the inference of fraud, is a mere question of law. And it is always so, when the act itself is deemed fraudulent, without regard to the particular intention with which it was done. 1 Starkie, 427; 2 Starkie, 616. In such cases, the inference of fraud is pronounced by the Court as a matter of law arising from the fact as found by a jury, agreed by the parties, or admitted by the pleadings; or, if the Court perceive that the testimony tends to establish a fact which the law deems fraudulent per se, the Court may instruct the jury that, if they accredit the evidence, they should find accordingly.

The case of possession by the vendor, inconsistent with the conveyance, presents one of the strongest instances of the inference of fraud being a question of law. Mere possession may be explained; and the presumption arising from mere possession, will be removed by an explanation shewing that the possession was not inconsistent with the conveyance. But, a possession, admitted or proved to be inconsistent with the conveyance, admits of no explanation, nor can the inference from it be repelled or rebutted by even the strongest testimony of the actual fairness of the intention of the parties; for, an inconsistent possession is, in the language of Judge Buller, (in Edwards v. Harben, 2 Term Reports, 596,) "such a circumstance per se, as renders the transaction fraudulent in point of law." The rule is not always declared, precisely in this form; for the same Judge laid down the rule, in different language, in the case of Haselington v. Gill, decided a few years before Edwards and Harben, and reported in a 606 note to Jarman v. Woolloton, 3 Term Reports, 620. He there expresses himself thus: "It has been frequently determined that possession alone is not evidence of fraud. The transaction must be shewn to be fraudulent from other circumstances. If the possession be inconsistent with the conveyance, that is evidence of fraud." But it is manifest, that Judge Buller did not mean that it was only prima facie evidence of fraud; for, that would have been directly contrary to the former decisions to which he himself refers in Edwards v. Harben, and to the unanimous opinion of all the Judges of England as declared in consultation on the case of Bamford v. Baron, 2 Term Reports, 594, (note.) He undoubtedly meant that an inconsistent possession is conclusive evidence of fraud. And there is, in truth, no difference between a transaction being, in law, per se, fraudulent, and its being, in law, conclusive evidence of fraud. The expressions are used, in the books, as synonymous.

The rule, as thus established in England, has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch, 309; and by this Court, in the case of Alexander v. Deneal, 2 Munf. 341; Robertson v. Ewell, 3 Munf. 1; Thomas v. Soaper, 5 Munf. 528; and Williamson v. Farley, Gilmer, 15.

This doctrine of fraud per se, as it is usually called, or of conclusive evidence of fraud, as it is sometimes called, excludes all regard to the actual intention of the parties, in every transaction that comes within its range. Hence it frequently happens, that conveyances are vacated as fraudulent in law, under this rule, when the parties had not, in fact, any fraudulent or covinous intent whatever. The case of Edwards v. Harben, (in which the rule was most emphatically laid down) was, itself, a case of that kind. The parties had, in fact, "no imagination of frauds;" for, the deed was intended merely as a security for a just debt, and the possession was not to remain with the vendor more than 14 days. The case of Williamson 607 v. Farley, *in this Court, (Gilmer, 15,) is, also, a very strong one of the same kind. There, the bill of sale of slaves was absolute on its face, and it was intended by the parties to be what it purported to be, an absolute sale. Valuable and full consideration was actually paid. The slaves were brought into the presence of the parties, at the time of the execution of the bill of sale, and the vendor told the vendee that they were his to do as he pleased with them. But at the same time and place, the vendee hired them to the vendor, for one year, for their food and clothing; and took a bond for returning them at the end of the year. The vendee took them out of the possession of the vendor in less than two months from the execution of the conveyance. Yet, this Court determined it to be a case of fraud per se. Nothing was farther from the minds of the parties in Edwards v. Harben, and in Williamson v. Farley, than an actual intention to delay, hinder or defraud creditors. But, in both cases, they intended and stipulated, that the vendor should remain in the possession and use of the property. In doing so, they did an act which the law, estimating it by its intrinsic nature, declares to be fraudulent per se; and as the law infers intention from acts, it infers conclusively that the intention of the parties was fraudulent; and vacates the transaction accordingly.

Such being the inflexible rigour with which the rule of fraud per se, is applied to all cases coming within its range, I think it very important that the limits of the rule should be most clearly defined; and although I approve of the rule, I do not think it ought to be extended to cases which do not strictly belong to it.

The rule itself, the principle on which it is founded, and the extent of its application, are laid down, with admirable perspicuity and force, by Judge Buller, in Edwards v. Harben. It is applied only to cases where possession does not "follow and accompany the deed;" or as he himself explains it, both in Edwards v. Harben, and in Haselington and Gill, it is applied only to cases where 608 the possession *is inconsistent with the deed. Inconsistency of possession is the principle, the foundation of the rule, and the test of its application. Wherever the possession is inconsistent with the conveyance, the rule applies to and vacates the transaction. Wherever the possession is inconsistent with the conveyance, or, to speak more correctly, wherever the possession is not inconsistent with the conveyance the rule does not apply; and the transaction will be supported, unless it shall appear that the intention of the parties was actually fraudulent. Thus, in Edwards v. Harben; Bamford v. Baron; Hamilton v. Russell; Alexander v. Deneal; Robertson v. Ewell; Thomas v. Soaper, and Williamson v. Farley, (before cited) the transactions were held to be fraudulent per se, because the possession was inconsistent with the conveyance; there being proof either that there was an actual agreement that the vendor should remain in the possession and use of the property, or that he was permitted to remain in the possession without any proof to shew that the possession was not inconsistent with the conveyance. But in Cadogan v. Kennet, Cowper, 432; Jarman v. Woolloton, 3 Term Rep. 618; Haselington v. Gill, (reported in a note to Jarman v. Woolloton,) and in Lady Arundel v. Phipps 10 Ves. 139; the transactions were supported because the possession was not inconsistent with the deed. The cases of Cadogan v. Kennet, and Lady Arundel v. Phipps, shew that although the actual possession remain with the vendor in the same manner as if the deed had never been made, yet the act will not vitiate the deed, provided the transaction be free from actual fraud, and provided such possession be not inconsistent with the deed. In the first of these two cases, a husband before marriage, conveyed certain household goods belonging to him, at his house in town, to trustees for his own use during his life, remainder to his wife for her life, &c. The marriage took place, and the husband remained in possession as if the deed had not been made. It appeared in testimony

609 *was to marry was amply sufficient to pay all the debts he owed at that time, and that he had no idea of disappointing any creditor. It was held that as the possession by the husband was consistent with the deed, and as the transaction was exempt from all suspicion of actual fraud, the deed protected the property from sale, even during the life of the husband, for the satisfaction of a debt due even at the time of the settlement. In Lady Arundel v. Phipps, there was a purchase by a married woman, after marriage, from her husband, through the medium of trustees, for her separate use, of certain family pictures, furniture and other articles belonging to the husband, in and about his different mansion houses. The husband continued in the actual possession of the property, after the execution of the deed, in the same manner as if the deed had not been made; and it appeared, moreover, that the object of the purchase was to preserve from the creditors of the husband, and for the family, the property embraced by the purchase, which was of peculiar value to the family. This transaction was supported, because the evidence shewed it to be fair, and because the possession of the husband (considering his relation to his wife,) was not inconsistent with the deed conveying the property to her separate use. The case of Jarman v. Woolloton, &c., was, like the case at bar, the conveyance by a woman just before her marriage, of her own property, with the consent of her intended husband. By the deed, reciting "that it was agreed between the parties, that the wife's stock in trade, book debts, &c. should be assigned to a trustee, in trust for her separate use and disposal, and to the intent that she might carry on her trade, at her own risk and charges, and for her own separate and exclusive benefit. She assigned, to a trustee, all and singular her stock in trade, and other effects, at, in or about and belonging to, the apartments then in her occupation, being part of a house No. 78, in Welbeck street, &c." For some time after the marriage, the wife carried on her trade in Welbeck street, 610 separately from her husband, *who was a linen-draper in Mary-le-bone street; but afterwards, all her effects were removed to his house, and she carried on her trade in a separate apartment there. The husband becoming a bankrupt, the wife's stock in trade, and her furniture (conveyed by the deed,) were taken possession of by his assignees. The trustee of the wife brought trover against the assignees, and the question was whether the deed protected the property. It appeared on the trial that the husband paid the rent of the house, and had been at the expense of fitting up the shop, but that there was contradictory evidence with respect to the manner of the wife's carrying on her business, whether for her own separate use or not. The jury found that it was not carried on separately, and gave a verdict for the defendant as to the stock in trade, but found a verdict for the plaintiff as to the furniture. The defendant's counsel moved to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial as to the furniture, on the ground that the trust deed did not protect this property. But, the verdict was sustained by the Court. The transaction being exempt from all suspicion of actual fraud, the furniture was held to be protected, notwithstanding it had been removed to the husband's house; for, as to the furniture, the possession of the husband, considering his relation to his wife, was not inconsistent with the deed conveying it to her separate use. But, as to the stock in trade, the deed, by its very terms, required that the wife should carry on the trade separately from her husband, and at her own risk and charges. The fact found by the jury that she did not carry it on separately, was, therefore, in direct opposition to the terms of the deed; and it was on the ground of this inconsistency, that the stock in trade was held to come within the influence of the rule of fraud per se. This is, certainly, a most remarkable case. The different parts of the property belonged to the same person, were conveyed by the same deed, to the same grantee, for the same purposes, and the actual possession, after the deed, was the same as to all the

the possession as to that was consistent with the terms of the deed, and to be fraudulent per se, as to other parts of the property, because the possession as to them, was inconsistent with the terms of the deed. This shews what is very important in the case at bar, that, as to property of the wife conveyed, fairly, before the marriage, the circumstance of possession by the husband, after marriage, will not bring it within the rule of fraud per se; unless the possession by the husband shall be inconsistent with the terms of the deed. And I will here take occasion to observe that as to the doctrine of inconsistency of possession, there is no difference between a conveyance to trustees, and a direct conveyance to the party beneficially interested; particularly in England, where deeds of trust are not required to be recorded.

One word more as to this rule of fraud per se, and I shall have done with the subject. It is never applied to cases of possession by the former owner, after a sale of property by a sheriff under an execution; whether the possession be left by the purchaser with the former owner, merely for his accommodation, or on condition that he will sell the property and pay the proceeds to the purchaser, or on a contract to pay rent or hire for them. Kidd v. Rawlinson, 2 Bos. & Pul. 59; Cole v. Davies, 1 Ld. Raym. 724; Birch v. Alexander, 4 Taunton, 823. Nor is it material in such cases, that the purchaser be or be not a creditor. Nor is the rule of fraud per se, applied to the case of possession by the former owner, after a sale made by trustees under an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Leonard v. Baker, 1 M. & S. 251. Nor is it applied to the possession of the former owner, after a sale by a landlord on a distress for rent. Guthrie v. Wood, 1 Starkie's Cases, 367; 2 Com. Law Reports, 430. In this last case, Lord Ellenborough said, "the doctrine of possession," (meaning this doctrine of fraud per se,) "applies to cases of conveyance from the party himself. *The statute of Elizabeth does not apply to a case like this, where the property is not sold by the party, but under a distress for rent." And how can it apply to any other case than to a conveyance from the party himself? For, how can a possession by the former owner, be inconsistent with a conveyance not from that former owner, but from some other person in whom the property has become legally vested, and who has full right to sell and convey to any fair purchaser. Such a purchaser is, as Lord Ellenborough said, in the case last cited, "quite at liberty to leave it in the possession of the former owner."

The result of the whole doctrine is this, that the mere possession of personal chattels, after an absolute conveyance of them, being only prima facie evidence of fraud, may be explained and rebutted by shewing that it is not inconsistent with the conveyance. But, if the possession be inconsistent with the conveyance, it is per se fraudulent in law, although the parties had not, in fact, any imagination of fraud. This rule, however, is never applied to any case but to one of inconsistent possession.

It remains now to apply these general principles to the case before us.

The deed from Mrs. Birdsong to her brother, was executed but a few hours, perhaps a few minutes, before her marriage; and it conveyed the property to him, absolutely, without any special stipulation, limitation, or reservation whatever. No possession of the property, therefore, embraced by this deed, can be inconsistent with the deed, but the possession of Mrs. Birdsong, or of those claiming under her. As to the possession of Mrs. Birdsong, herself, during the short period that elapsed between the execution of the deed, and the solemnization of the marriage, that is sufficiently explained to be not inconsistent with the deed, by the fact that there was no agreement that she should retain the possession, and by the fact that her brother, the grantee, was absent, and was not informed of the deed until after the marriage.

613 As to the possession of "Jeffries, after the marriage, that cannot, with any semblance of propriety, be said to be a possession under Mrs. Birdsong, the grantor. She had no right whatever, to the possession of the property, at the time of the marriage, nor had she the legal competency after the marriage, to deliver to him any actual possession which she may have held at the moment of the marriage; for, at that moment, she ceased to be sui juris. The possession of Jeffries after the marriage, was not, either as to right, or as to fact, under the grantor in the deed: and consequently, can no more be said to be inconsistent with that deed, than the possession by any other individual in the community. In truth, the possession of Jeffries, after Land's return from the military service, was under Land, the grantee in the deed, by hire from him, and so far from being inconsistent with the deed, was consistent with it. This case is very different from the case of Jarman v. Woolloton, so far as respects the interference of the husband in the wife's stock in trade, mentioned in that case. In Jarman v. Woolloton, there was an express stipulation in the deed, that the wife should carry on the trade separately from the husband. The interference of the husband in the trade, (which was acquiesced in by the wife and by her trustee,) was, therefore, inconsistent with this express stipulation of the deed; and it was on account of this inconsistency, that that case was determined, so far as related to the stock in trade, to come within the influence of the rule of fraud per se; and that also was the reason, and the only reason, why Lord Mansfield said, in the case of Haselington v. Gill, that if "the husband had carried on the trade in his own name, and contracted debts on it, that would have varied the case:" for, in Haselington v. Gill, as in Jarman v. Woolloton, there was an express stipulation in the deed that the trade should be carried on by the wife, separately from the husband. The mere circumstance of possession by the husband, is never regarded as fraudulent per se. It is only inconsistent possession, whether by the husband or any body else, that is regarded as fraudulent per se.

And I pronounce with confidence, that there is no case, where the possession of the husband after marriage, of property conveyed by the wife before marriage, has been held to be inconsistent with the deed of the wife, where that deed, like the deed before us, was absolute on its face, and without any special stipulation, limitation, or reservation. This case, therefore, cannot be brought within the influence of the rule of fraud per se; and can only be assailed on the ground of actual fraud.

Was there any actual fraud in this transaction? This was very faintly urged, if urged at all; and I am decidedly of opinion, that it is not supported by a single circumstance that is calculated to excite even the suspicion of fraud. Mrs. Birdsong, not being indebted herself, had a perfect right to make any disposition of her property that she thought proper; and she was under no obligation, legal or moral, to permit any of it to be applied to the payment of the debts of her intended husband. Nor was Jeffries himself, under any such obligation, to make any arrangement for subjecting to the payment of his debts, the property of his intended wife. Situated as he was, such an effort would have been reprehensible: and even his creditors do not exhibit themselves in a very enviable aspect, when, after imprudently trusting an insolvent, they seek to indemnify themselves by sacrificing the just rights of others. As to the possession of the property by the husband, it was no more calculated to mislead or deceive creditors or purchasers, than the case which occurs daily, of the wealthy father-in-law permitting his son-in-law, to hold on loan, property which appears to the world to belong to the son-in-law, but which may be reclaimed at any time within five years. As to the use to which it was hoped the brother would hold the property, viz: the separate use of Mrs. Birdsong, after the marriage, that was in itself a just and legal object; and no body had a right to complain of its not being expressed in the deed, but Mrs. Birdsong 615 *herself. And the omission is of no consequence, even as to her; since the grantee himself, now declares it.

On the subject of the deed not having been recorded, I have only to say, that as it was absolute on its face, without any reservation of trust whatever, it cannot be regarded as a deed of trust, or marriage settlement; and therefore, that there was no necessity for recording it as to anybody, under the 4th section of our act concerning conveyances. Nor do I think it was necessary to record it under our statute of frauds; because I am of opinion that the possession really and bona fide remained with the donee; for, the possession of Jeffries, was the possession of Land.

I think the decree of the Chancery Court should be reversed, and the injunction be re-instated.

The King v. Ridge.*

May, 1817.

A scire facias having issued against the defendant, as the acceptor of three several bills of exchange, dated 12th April 1813, payable twelve months after date, drawn by the Earl of Moira, whereby he (Ridge,) became indebted to Austen (the holder) in that sum and interest, as found by an inquisition, under a commission on an extent against him, as receiver general for the county of Oxford; the defendant pleaded a general traverse: and the case coming on to be tried before the Lord Chief Baron, at the sittings after Trinity Term, the jury found a verdict for the Crown.

In Michaelmas Term, Clarke obtained a rule to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for the defendant, or a new trial granted.

From the report of the evidence, given on the trial, it appeared to have been proved, that a little before Lord Moira's departure for India, his Lordship had drawn four bills for one thousand pounds each, payable to his own order, *twelve months after date, which were accepted by Ridge, his Lordship's regimental agent.

That they were then handed over, endorsed by Lord Moira, generally, to Major James, his Lordship's confidential friend, and who had been employed in obtaining money for his Lordship, through the medium of such bills, ever since the year 1802, by getting them discounted for that purpose, and often at the house of Austen & Maunde, but more particularly with Austen, who usually furnished cash for them.

That Major James, (having previously had a communication with Maunde on the subject of getting the bills negotiated,) took them himself to the banking house of Austen, Maunde & Co., in Henrietta street; where, after several interviews with Maunde (without seeing Austen on business,) he at length received from Maunde 3600l. 0s. 0d. (three thousand six hundred pounds) for the four bills, which he immediately gave to Lord Moira. Major James was known to Austen & Co. to be the agent of Lord Moira, and to be procuring the money for him.

It was also in evidence, that Lord Moira's bills, so drawn and accepted, had become much depreciated in the market; which was explained to mean, that they were not negotiable for so much in value as they purported to be drawn for, and that fifteen pound, per cent per annum, was commonly required and received for discounting them. Major James had himself no interest in the bills, but was merely the agent of Lord Moira; and had not endorsed them, nor was there any other endorsement on them but that of Lord Moira. On that evidence, the counsel for the defendant objected that the transaction was usurious; for that it was quite clear, that the money given for the bills in question, was in the way of discounting them for Lord Moira, and not as buying them of Major James.

His Lordship left it to the jury to say whether the transaction before them was merely colourable on the part of the house of Austen & Maunde, and was a discounting *of the bills; or whether it was a fair and bona fide purchase of the bills by them. If the former, directing them to find for the defendant; if the latter, for the Crown; when the jury found a verdict for the Crown.

Dauncey and Nolan, shewed cause; contending, that what had been done in respect of the bills, was on the face of the transaction a mere sale, and not a discount; when the Court calling on the counsel who were to support the rule:

Clarke and Peake submitted, that the transaction was a discounting, and not a purchase of the bills, and therefore usurious; that the money given for them was a personal advance to Lord Moira himself alone, on his credit, at a premium of 15l. 0s. 0d. (fifteen pounds) per cent. being considerably above the usual discount. Major James was not a third person holding the bill for his own benefit, as having received it for money due to him from Lord Moira, nor does he endorse it, or make himself liable; if he had, it would have been a loan to him, and therefore, equally usurious; but, he is identified with Lord Moira, who was at the time distressed for money, and was precisely one of the persons meant to be protected by the statute, (12 Anne, chap. 16,) against the mischievous consequences of their necessities, and the language of the act is most general: or, if transactions of this sort may be legalized as a sale, the beneficial provisions of that act will be frustrated. A party selling a bill is released from all responsibility on it.

Not so here. Lord Moira, whose sale it was, if the bill was sold, for it was sold for his benefit, and in fact by himself; for the mere agency of a third person can make no sort of difference in the act itself, which was a discounting of these bills at more than five per cent.

Dauncey and Nolan, contra, contended, that it was a mere question of fact for the jury, whether this was a sale by Major James, or a discounting for Lord Moira; and their finding ought to be conclusive.

620 *It was in evidence that no one would take these bills for their full amount; therefore, they were sent into the market to be sold to any one who would purchase them on speculation. They had in the market a specific value assigned them, and the house of Austen & Co. had given for them all that they were considered to be worth. This is an instrument on which any one, becoming legally possessed of it, might sue, and therefore may be the subject matter of sale. If the issue of the bill was fair at first, subsequent usury does not vitiate it. If Austen & Maunde had endorsed these bills over to a third person, they would have been available in his hands; so also are they in the hands of the Crown.

RICHARDS, Chief Baron.

This is certainly a case of very singular circumstances. (Stating the transaction and the connection between the parties, and observing particularly on the communication between James and Maunde, before the bills were produced.) It is said that this transaction was usurious; and if it were, we are bound here to decide according to law.

Now I confess, on re-consideration, that I think this was an usurious transaction, and that the usury affects the Crown, in the same manner as it would the assignees of Austen & Maunde, if they had become bankrupt. Without entering into all the circumstances, the simple fact is, that Lord Moira and Major James were, as to this transaction, one and the same person. If Lord Moira had gone to Austen & Maunde, and said, "Lend me 3400l. and I will give you bills for 4000l." no doubt that would have invalidated the bills; and I do not see how we can distinguish between the facts of the bills being signed before or after the negotiation, or whether they were taken to Austen & Maunde in an issuable state or not. Major James does not affect to be more than a mere messenger in the business. It was argued, 621 *inception, subsequent usury would not make them bad. I think, however, that it would. Then it was contended, that in the hands of the Crown, as of an innocent holder, the vice of the bills was removed; but, I think that the Crown must stand in the place of an assignee; and I think it is clear, that in case of bankruptcy an assignee could not have recovered on the bills; and I see no difference, for they both become possessed by act of law.

It has been put also, that the question was fairly left to the jury as a question of fact, whether this negotiation was a loan or a sale; they being told that in the one case the bills would be bad; in the other, they would be good. The effect of that direction would be, to leave the question of law to them. Now I think that the person who tried this case ought to have told the jury, that under the circumstances of this case the transaction was usurious. It did not occur to me then, as it does now, that this negotiation was tainted with usury; but, I should certainly now direct, if the case were trying before me, that Lord Moira could not be sued on these bills, because they are bad in point of law; and, therefore, I think there should be a new trial.

GRAHAM, Baron.

The arguments of the defendant's counsel have relieved me from many considerable difficulties; and I think the question was, ultimately, not one of fact. If Major James had received these bills from Lord Moira on his own account, as security for a debt, and had then sold them, the direction would have been right; but James was Lord Moira's confidential agent. (Adverts to the evidence.) This, therefore, being clearly a loan to Lord Moira, and not a purchase in the market, it was not a question for the jury; and the Judge should have told them, that it was a transaction which the law did not allow. Then the bills getting into the hands of the Crown, under this extent against its debtor, does not remove the 622 usurious quality; for, that is *certainly a very different thing from a bill originally good having got into the possession of a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration.

WOOD, Baron, absent.

GARROW, Baron.

The confusion which has got into this case, proceeds from its having been at one time considered, that these bills were sent about the town to be sold for what could be got for them; but the fact is, that this paper was sent by the maker to those who well knew its precise value, to get that value for it, which was done. Nothing had been given by Major James for it; and whether the transaction was originally good, it is not necessary to enquire: but that this transaction, as between Major James, the acknowledged agent of Lord Moira, and Austen & Maunde, was usurious, there can be no doubt.

It was ingeniously argued, that the bills, by getting into the hands of the Crown, made a difference, as between the Crown and the party; but, it would be most unfortunate if that were so; for, then the grossest usurer would have nothing to do but to get his bills seized under an extent, and then all his illegal transactions would be rendered available in the hands of the Crown. That is too monstrous a proposition for serious consideration, and would require to be supported by undoubted authority.

November, 1826.

Criminal Law—Incontinency—Jurisdiction.†—Before the statute of circumspecte agatis, 18 Edw. 1. the Court of King's Bench punished offences of incontinency, but since that statute the cognizance of such offences has been transferred to the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Same—Fornication—Common-Law Offence.‡—The offences of adultery, fornication, and the like, cannot be punished by our Courts of Law, as common law offences, unless they be accompanied with other circumstances, which of themselves constitute a misdemeanor: such as the public commission of the act, or a conspiracy. The statutory offence must be punished according to the statute.

Same—Seduction—Indictment.—The seduction and abduction of a female over sixteen years of age, (being not within the statute,) cannot be punished by indictment. It would have been otherwise, if a conspiracy had been charged.

628 Criminal Jurisdiction—Offences Contra Bonos Mores.§—Although our Courts take cognizance of offences contra bonos mores, yet the adjudicated cases afford a safe rule for fixing the limits of the principle: If they are departed from, the criminal jurisdiction may be extended to cases, which, though grossly immoral, were never yet thought of as indictable offences; such as slander and the like.

This was a writ of error to a judgment of the Superior Court of Law for Chesterfield county, rendered against the plaintiff in error, by which he was sentenced to imprisonment in the jail of the county, without bail or mainprize for the space of two years and six months, and afterwards till he should make his fine with the Governor, by the payment of one thousand dollars, the fine assessed by the jury, or until he be discharged by due course of law.

The indictment against the plaintiff in error, contained two counts, the first of which charged that he, being a married man, on the 22d November, 1825, in the said county of Chesterfield, one Elizabeth F. Hargrove a maiden, and unmarried, and under the age of twenty-one years, that is to say, of the age of sixteen years, two months, and nineteen days, having no father living, and being then and there under the care and custody of Elizabeth Hargrove, a widow, her mother, did entice, inveigle, take and carry away from the care and custody of her said mother, for the purpose of prostituting and carnally knowing her the said Elizabeth F. against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth. The second count in like manner charges him with the enticing, inveigling, taking and carrying away the said infant over the age of sixteen years, and moreover charges that he did, on a subsequent day, deflower, carnally know, and prostitute her the said Elizabeth F. Hargrove, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth.

Our statute, like the statute of Philip and Mary, punishes by imprisonment, without bail or mainprize, the person who unlawfully takes and carries away any maiden, or woman child, being within the age of 629 sixteen years, from *the possession, and against the will of her father, mother, or other person having the custody of such maiden: and the punishment is greatly increased if the maid be deflowered. 1 Revised Code of 1819, chap. 106, sec. 25 and 26. The maiden in this case being more than sixteen, the offence was not within the statute; and the question was, whether it was punishable by indictment at common law.

A writ of error was awarded at the June term, and the Court now proceeded to judgment.

DADE, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question is, whether the offence of which the plaintiff has been convicted, and had judgment, is a misdemeanor, punishable by indictment at the common law?

The class of misdemeanors within which it is insisted this offence is comprehended, is that of offences contra bonos mores, over which the Court of King's Bench in England, and the Superior Courts of Law of this Commonwealth, have always claimed to have jurisdiction. It is admitted, that before the statute of circumspecte agatis, 13 Edward 1, the Court of King's Bench did on this principle punish the offences of incontinency, and that by that statute the jurisdiction was transferred to the Ecclesiastical Courts. It may be well doubted whether the King's Bench before the statute, or the Courts Christian since, looked beyond the simple fact of incontinence, as that offence is at present contemplated and punished by our own acts of Assembly. In other words, whether they looked beyond the mere offence of incontinence, as consisting in the single act of cohabitation between persons of different sexes, without the rites of marriage, not varied by any fraud, deception, or inveiglement which may have been practised by the man. But, after the statute of circumspecte agatis, the Court of King's Bench did not exercise jurisdiction in punishing the mere act of incontinence. It, however, retained its general power of punishing offences contra bonos mores, and it is presumed might have punished an offence of incontinence combined with circumstances, which, beyond the mere criminality of the simple fact, were calculated to make it injurious to society; as, in case of incontinence in a street or highway. But, in such cases the jurisdiction would not spring from the criminal character of the simple fact, but from its publicity; as, there are many cases where an act, which is not criminal in private, becomes penal by the publicity which attends its perpetration. The act of Sir Charles Sedley, in running naked through the streets, derived its whole criminality from its publicity. It is not, therefore, in this case allowable to connect the criminality of the mere act of incontinence, which as such, is punishable in a certain mode prescribed by the statute, with the particular circumstances of fraud and deception, and the special injury to the female, so as to make the supposed common law offence, (as the Courts might entertain it in England, since the statute of circumspecte agatis,) derive support, or even acquire being from the statutory offence. If the statutory misdemeanor of simple incontinence is to be punished, it must be according to the statute. If there be other circumstances in the case which entitle the Common Law Courts to jurisdiction, those circumstances must of themselves constitute a misdemeanor. By these principles, the only two reported cases in the English books are to be tested. The case of The King v. Lord Grey and others, 9 State Trials, (Cobbet's edition,) pa. 127, was that of an information, alleging a conspiracy to take away, and debauch a maiden over the age of sixteen, and under twenty-one, and an accomplishment of the act by those means. This conspiracy is emphatically charged in the information, and as it was to do a wrongful act, for which certainly, if done, an action lay to the father of the maid, the conspiracy, if proved, clearly amounted to a common law misdemeanor. So, in the case of Sir Francis Blake Delaval and others, 3 Burr. 1432, which was "a motion for an information against the defendants for a conspiracy to put a young girl into the hands of a gentleman of rank and fortune, for the purpose of prostitution," although Lord Mansfield, in allowing the motion, intimates an opinion that the Court of King's Bench might have jurisdiction of the case, as one contra bonos mores, yet he decides it on the ground that there was in that case, "a conspiracy, and confederacy;" which, says he, "are clearly and indubitably within the proper jurisdiction of this Court." Without doubt in these cases, the Court having jurisdiction of them, on undeniable common law principles, the punishment in case of conviction, might well be aggravated by the baseness, perfidy, or malignity, which was the motive and end of the conspiracy. In like manner, as in trespass, circumstances may aggravate the damages, which would not of themselves alone support the action. But clearly, neither of these cases does maintain the position, that as a common law misdemeanor, an indictment or information will lie, either for simple incontinence, or for incontinence produced by means of deception, inveiglement, or enticement, in other words, by seduction.

†Criminal Law—Incontinency.—Simple incontinency is not punishable at common law. Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 557, citing the principal case to sustain the point.

‡Same—Fornication—Common-Law Offence.—See principal case cited with approval in Com. v. Isaacs, 5 Rand. 634.

§Criminal Jurisdiction—Offences Contra Bonos Mores.—The principal case is approved in Com. v. Turner, 5 Rand. 679.

It is too late now to assume jurisdiction over a new class of cases, under the idea of their being contra bonos mores. We must consider the practice of the English Courts, from which we derive the principle, as having settled in the course of many centuries, the true limits and proper subjects of this principle. If we are to disregard these land marks, and take up any case which may arise under this principle, as res integra, then might it be extended to cases which none has yet thought of as penal. A case of slander may display as much baseness and malignity of purpose, as much falsehood in its perpetration, as ruinous effects in its consequences, and as pernicious an example in its dissemination, as this case of seduction. And yet none would think of prosecuting it criminally. It is true, that if something peculiar in our situation had given rise to a class of cases contra bonos mores, as in regard to our "slaves, which could not have existed in England, we might be justified in applying the rule in the absence of all precedent. But, in relation to seduction, no such supposition can be made, as we know from the books of reports that many such cases have occurred there. And we even see that in two cases, it was in fact the prominent feature, and yet the jurisdiction in one of them was made to hang on another hinge; and in the other, which was never decided, was certainly fortified by the allegation and proof of a common law misdemeanor.

From these premises, it would seem to be proper to infer that since the statute of circumspecte agatis, in England, the Common Law Courts have never taken jurisdiction of the mere offence of incontinence, nor of any offence of incontinence combined with other reprehensible circumstances, not in themselves importing a common law misdemeanor: that in this country the Legislature has taken up the subject of simple fornication and adultery, and has defined a precise mode of proof, and a fixed and certain punishment: that there is no reason to believe, that these statutes are cumulative; but, that they occupy the whole ground: and that, as in England, the offence being merely spiritual, is not, under any circumstances, allowed to be the foundation of a criminal prosecution in the Courts of Common Law; so here, by parity of reasoning, the offence being entirely statutory, it shall not be converted into the foundation of a common law misdemeanor.

If these premises and deductions be true, we must throw out of this case the statutory criminality of the mere act of incontinence, and then we cannot support the indictment, unless the other circumstances amount to a common law misdemeanor. If they had made out a case of conspiracy, that desideratum would have been supplied. But, it is not found in the artifices and contrivances, which may have been used in alluring the female from the path of virtue, and the home of her parent.

*For these reasons, the Court is of opinion, that the judgment of the Superior Court of Chesterfield be reversed, and this Court proceeding to give such judgment as the said Superior Court ought to have rendered, it is further considered that of the offence of which the said Samuel Anderson hath been indicted, and convicted, he be acquitted and discharged, and that he go thereof without day.

Note by BROCKENBROUGH, J. The statute of circumpecte agatis, may be seen in the original Latin in 2 Coke's Inst. 487, and in its English dress, in 2 Bac. Abr. p. 171, title "Ecclesiastical Courts," D. In his commentary on that statute, LORD COKE says, that "in ancient time, the King's Courts, and specially the Leets, had power to enquire of, and punish fornication and adultery." The authority of the King's Courts over these mere spiritual offences, as they are called, appears to have ceased with the above statute, which forbids the Judges from interfering with the Courts Christian, in punishing them. That statute was enacted about the year 1285, that is, several centuries before the Colonization of Virginia, and consequently, that part of the ancient common law of which LORD COKE speaks, was not brought here by our ancestors. It cannot for a moment be supposed that the act of 1792, which repeals all British statutes, was intended to bring into existence an old law of England, which had never existed here.

But, although that common law power did not prevail, yet our ancestors, at a very early period, enacted several statutes on the subject. In the year 1642, it was enacted, that there should be a yearly meeting of the Ministers, and Church Wardens, before the commander, and commissioners of every County Court, in the nature of a visitation, and that the Church Wardens, on oath, should make presentment (inter alia) of all persons guilty of these high and foul offences. 1 Hen. Stat. at Large, 240. See also, p. 310. And in 1657, it was enacted, that for scandalous living in that way, the person convicted should be severely punished, and be held incapable of being a witness, and of bearing any public office in the Colony. Ib. 433. These acts seem to have been repealed in 1666, and a new enactment was then made on the subject. 3 Hen. Stat. 139. In 1705, it was enacted, that every person committing these offences, and thereof convicted by the oaths of two or more credible witnesses, or confession of the party, should be punished, for fornication, by a fine of 500 pounds of tobacco, and for adultery, by a fine of a thousand pounds of tobacco; to be recovered by the suit or prosecution of the Church Wardens, by bill, plaint, or information, for the benefit of the poor of the parish. Ib. 361. The provisions of the act of 1705, have been continued to this day, except as to the amount of the fine, and that the prosecution is to be carried on by the overseers of the poor. 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 141, sec. 6.

There is no statute, either in England, or in Virginia, against the offence of seduction, except those which relate also to abduction; and these only apply where the female is under sixteen years of age.

And with respect to the punishment of seduction, as being an offence contra bonos mores, there does not appear to be a single authority for such a prosecution in the English Courts, unless where it is accompanied by conspiracy, or the like; but, civil prosecutions for these offences, are known to be very common.

I. ADULTERY.

A. AT COMMON LAW.

1. DEFINITION.—Adultery, at common law, is criminal conversation with a married woman. She must be the wife of another; and whoever, married or single, has illicit intercourse with her becomes guilty of adultery. Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, vol. 1 (2d Ed.) 747.

Unmarried Man and Married Woman.—But it has been held that illicit sexual intercourse between an unmarried man, and a married woman is not adultery in the man. Com. v. Lafferty, 6 Gratt. 672.

2. NOT PUNISHABLE.—The offense of adultery cannot be punished by our courts of law, as a common-law offense, unless it be accompanied with other circumstances, which of themselves constitute a misdemeanor. Anderson v. Com., 5 Rand. 627; Com. v. Isaacs, 5 Rand. 634; Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 555.

B. BY CANON LAW.

1. DEFINITION.—Adultery by the canon or ecclesiastical law was sexual intercourse between a man and a woman, of whom one at least was lawfully married to a third person. Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, vol. 1 (2d Ed.) 747.

2. ECCLESIASTICAL OFFENSES AFTER STAT. 13 EDW. 1.

1.—Before the statute of 13 Edw. 1 the courts of the kings' bench punished offenses of incontinency, but since that statute the cognizance has been transferred to the ecclesiastical courts. Anderson v. Com., 5 Rand. 627.

C. BY STATUTE.

1. WITH A SLAVE.—Adultery committed with a slave is a violation of the act, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 141, § 6. Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 555.

2. PUNISHMENT.—Every person convicted of adultery under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, § 555, which provides, that every person not being a servant or slave, etc., is subject to a fine of twenty dollars. Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 555.

D. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

1. INDICTMENT, PRESENTMENT AND INFORMATION.—

a. May Be Joint or Separate.—In prosecutions for adultery the two participants may be joined in the same indictment or indicted separately. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 767.

b. What It Must Show.—Every indictment must show upon its face that some public law of the state has been violated, and that the offender has been indicted therefor, in the manner and within the time prescribed by the law of the land. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

2. VARIANCE BETWEEN PRESENTMENT AND INFORMATION.

a. When Not Available.—In a prosecution for adultery, where there is a variance between the presentment and information, it is not competent to arrest judgment on that ground, after a plea of not guilty, and trial and conviction on that plea. Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 555.

3. HOW DEFECTS TAKEN ADVANTAGE OF.

a. By Demurrer.—Where a party is indicted he may upon demurrer to the indictment take advantage of all the defects therein to the same extent as by motion in arrest of the judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

Statute of Limitations Fatal on Demurrer.—An indictment found on the eighth day of April, 1884, for adultery and fornication, which charged the defendant with committing the offense on the tenth day of March, 1883, and which offense is barred by the statute of limitations in one year, is fatally defective on demurrer. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

Demurrer Available Also Where Motion in Arrest of Judgment Would Be.—While the motion in arrest of judgment had by § 11, ch. 158 of the Code, been rendered less effectual than it was by the common law, yet a demurrer to the indictment remains unimpaired and may be resorted to in all cases where the defendant is entitled to move in arrest of judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

b. By Motion to Quash, or in Arrest of Judgment.—Where an indictment is so defective that any judgment thereon against the defendant would be erroneous, he may take advantage of the defects by motion to quash, by demurrer, or by motion in arrest of judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

4. CHANGE IN INDICTMENT.—Where an original indictment is brought before the appellate court, and it appears that the date of the year in which the crime was committed has been changed, the court, in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary, will presume that the same was made before the finding of the indictment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

E. EVIDENCE.

Statute Requiring Two Witnesses to Convict Repealed.—The act, 1 Rev. Code, § 555, which makes the oath of two credible witnesses necessary to convict of adultery, is repealed by ch. 27, 2, p. 164, of the Criminal Code, Session Acts 1847-48. Com. v. Cregor, 7 Gratt. 591.

One Credible Witness Sufficient to Convict.—One credible witness is now sufficient to authorize a conviction for adultery. Com. v. Cregor, 7 Gratt. 591.

II. FORNICATION.

A. AT COMMON LAW.

1. DEFINITION.—Fornication is the act of illicit sexual intercourse between either a married or an unmarried man and an unmarried woman, both parties being guilty of the offense. Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, vol. 13 (2d Ed.) 1118.

Intercoarse by Single Man with Married Woman—Fornication in Man.—Illicit sexual intercourse between an unmarried man and a married woman, is fornication in the man. Com. v. Lafferty, 6 Gratt. 672.

2. NOT PUNISHABLE.—The offense of fornication, (or the cohabiting together by a man and a woman in a state of illicit commerce as man and wife, but without marriage,) is not punishable as a common-law offense. Com. v. Isaacs, 5 Rand. 634.

3. PUNISHABLE IF ACCOMPANIED WITH MISDEMEANOR.—The offense of fornication cannot be punished by our courts of law, as a common-law offense, unless they be accompanied with other circumstances which of themselves constitute a misdemeanor. Anderson v. Com., 5 Rand. 627.

B. BY CANON LAW.

1. DEFINITION.—Fornication is the act of illicit sexual intercourse on the part of an unmarried person with the person of the opposite sex, whether married or unmarried, and, if married, whether a man or woman. Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, vol. 13, (2d Ed.) 1118.

2. ECCLESIASTICAL OFFENSES SINCE STAT., 13 EDW. 1.—Before the statute of 13 Edw. 1, the courts of kings' bench punished offenses of incontinency, but since that statute, the cognizance of such offenses has been transferred to the ecclesiastical courts. Anderson v. Com., 5 Rand. 627.

C. BY STATUTE.

Intercoarse with a Slave.—Where a person not being a servant or slave, cohabits with such, he is punishable, for fornication, under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, § 555, which provides, that every person, not being a servant or slave, committing adultery or fornication, and being thereof lawfully convicted, etc. Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 555.

1. PUNISHMENT.—Every person convicted of fornication under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, § 555, which provides, that every person not being a servant or slave, etc., is subject to a fine of ten dollars. Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 555.

D. EVIDENCE.

Statute Requiring Two Credible Witnesses Repealed.—The act 1 Rev. Code, § 555, which makes the oath of two or more credible witnesses necessary to convict of fornication, is repealed by ch. 27, § 2, of the Criminal Code, Session Acts, 1847-48. Com. v. Cregor, 7 Gratt. 591.

One Witness Sufficient.—One credible witness is now sufficient to authorize a conviction for fornication. Com. v. Cregor, 7 Gratt. 591.

III. LEWDNESS.

A. DEFINITIONS.

1. LEWD.—Given to unlawful indulgence of lust; dissolute, lusty, filthy. Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, vol. 18 (2d Ed.) 841.

Lewdness.—That form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity. Bouvier's Law Dict., vol. 2 (Rawle's Rev.) 193.

2. LASCIVIOUS.—Loose, wanton, lewd; tending to produce voluptuous or lewd emotions. Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, vol. 18 (2d Ed.) 842.

3. COHABITATION.—The act or state of dwelling together, or in the same place with another; the state of living together as husband and wife. State v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 215, 24 S. E. Rep. 882; Jones v. Com., 30 Va. 20.

B. WHAT CONSTITUTES LEWD AND LASCIVIOUS COHABITATION BY STATUTE.—To constitute the offense of lewd and lascivious association and cohabitation under § 7, ch. 149, Code 1891, it must be proved that the parties cohabited together, that is, lived together in the same house as man and wife. State v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 215, 24 S. E. Rep. 882.

Occasional Acts of Incontinence.—Proof of occasional acts of incontinence merely is not sufficient to convict of lewd and lascivious cohabitation. Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 18; Pruner v. Com., 82 Va. 115; State v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 215, 24 S. E. Rep. 882.

1. BOTH PARTIES MUST HAVE CRIMINAL INTENT.—To constitute the offense of lewd and lascivious cohabitation it is essential that both parties should lewdly and lasciviously cohabit together, and that they should both have the same common purpose and intent. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 770; State v. Foster, 26 W. Va. 272.

Where One Party Innocent Neither Can Be Convicted.—Where one person who is married, intermarries with another, who is single, and without knowledge of the other party to the marriage, and in good faith, believing their marriage to be valid and binding neither party can be convicted of lewd and lascivious cohabitation. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 771.

2. THE BURDEN OF THE OFFENSE IS PUBLICITY.—The burden of the offense is the open, lewd and lascivious conduct of the parties living together as man and wife. Pruner v. Com., 82 Va. 115.

3. STATUTE MUST BE FOLLOWED STRICTLY.—The offense of lewd and lascivious cohabitation is statutory, and the statute must be conformed to strictly. Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 18; Com. v. Isaacs, 5 Rand. 634.

4. WHAT NECESSARY TO SUSTAIN ACTION.—To sustain a prosecution for lewd and lascivious cohabitation under § 7, ch. 7. Criminal Procedure of 1878, p. 303, the evidence must clearly establish that the parties not being married, lewdly and lasciviously associated and cohabited—that is, lived together in the same house as man and wife. Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 18; Pruner v. Com., 82 Va. 115.

5. "COHABITATION" CONSTRUED.—The term "cohabitation" as used in the statute, is construed to mean, a living together in the same house as married persons live together, or in the manner of husband and wife. Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 20.

C. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

1. BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Certifying Evidence Not Facts.—Where, though the bill of exceptions claims to set forth the facts proved upon trial, it is apparent that the evidence is certified, and not the facts, the court must look only to the evidence of the exceptee. Pruner v. Com., 82 Va. 115; Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 344.

D. EVIDENCE.

Postmaster Competent Witness.—In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious cohabitation, a postmaster is a competent witness against the accused. Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 344.

Sufficiency.—Where it was proved, that S. admitted that J. was his wife, that they lived together, that H. admitted that J.'s daughter was his child, that he carried her mail to her from the postoffice, that he familiarly associated with her and was reported to live with her as man and wife, the court held the evidence sufficient to convict. Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 346.

What Must Appear to Warrant Conviction.—In order to convict of lewd and lascivious cohabitation, it must appear on the face of the indictment, that both parties, lewdly and lasciviously associated and cohabited together or with each other. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 767.

C. Sale.

III. The Indictment.

A. Averments of Knowledge.

1. When Knowledge Material.

I. ABDUCTION.

A. OF FEMALE OVER SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE.—In Anderson v. Com., 5 Rand. 627, the court held that the "abduction of a female over sixteen years of age (being not within the statute), could not be punished by indictment." But, it was added, "it would have been otherwise, if a conspiracy had been charged." See Code, 1887, § 3678.

II. KIDNAPPING.

A. SELLING FREE NEGRO.—The sale of a free negro, by his own consent, as a slave, under a collusive contract between the seller and the person sold (the free negro), that they would divide the proceeds of the sale between them, is not such a sale of a free negro for a slave as is made a felony by the statute. Mercer v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 144. And see Davenport v. Com., 1 Leigh 595, where the above case is distinguished.

B. STEALING FREE NEGRO.—In the case of Davenport v. Com., 1 Leigh 588, on an indictment for stealing a free negro, knowing him to be free—it was held that, the offense of kidnapping was complete, under the statute, without the actual sale of the negro by the kidnapper.

1. KNOWLEDGE OF DEFENDANT.—And stealing a free negro, with felonious intent to appropriate him, is criminal, whether the person stealing him knows him to be free or not. Davenport v. Com., 1 Leigh 588.

C. SALE.—But it is held in Com. v. Nix, 11 Leigh 636, "that the sale of a free negro, to constitute the felony, must be absolute, and not conditional."

1. AFFIRMANCE.—Yet, though sale was conditional, if affirmed, then it became absolute, and the crime was complete. Com. v. Nix, 11 Leigh 636.

a. Proof of Affirmance.—And such affirmance of sale may be proved, either by positive act or lapse of time. Com. v. Nix, 11 Leigh 636.

D. CONSENT.—Where one takes and carries away a free negro boy, not over eight years of age, with the criminal intent to appropriate him, it is not necessary to prove it was done against the boy's consent, he being, by reason of his tender age, incapable of giving consent, and incapable of collusion. Davenport v. Com., 1 Leigh 588. See Mercer v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 144.

III. THE INDICTMENT.

A. AVERMENTS OF KNOWLEDGE.—In an indictment for kidnapping, though the knowledge of the freedom be averred, it need not be proved, but may be regarded as surplusage. Davenport v. Com., 1 Leigh 588.

1. WHEN KNOWLEDGE MATERIAL.—But if one come lawfully into possession of a free negro, not knowing him to be free, and sell him, knowledge of his freedom at the time of the sale is necessary to make the selling criminal. Davenport v. Com., 1 Leigh 588.

634 *The Commonwealth v. David Isaacs and Nancy West.

November, 1826.

Criminal Law—Fornication—Common-Law Offence.*—The offence of fornication, (or the cohabiting together by a man and a woman, in a state of illicit commerce, as man and wife, but without marriage,) is not punishable as a common law offence. The statute, which prescribes a penalty for the offence, must be pursued in such case.

At the Superior Court of Law held for Albemarle, the Grand Jury made the following presentment: "We, on our oath, present David Isaacs, and Nancy West, (a free mulatto woman) for outraging the decency of society, and violating the laws of the land, by cohabiting together in a state of illicit commerce, as man and wife, without being lawfully married," &c. &c.; on the evidence of two persons named. The defendants were summoned to shew cause why an Information should not be filed against them, and that Court adjourned to the General Court the following question of law, viz: "Whether, admitting the facts presented by the Grand Jury to be true, an Information will lie for the said offence, at the suit of the Commonwealth?"

DADE, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case involves the principal question which we have just decided in the case of Anderson v. The Commonwealth, and upon those grounds, it will not, therefore, be now discussed. If the presentment be of a single act of fornication, without other circumstances, then it clearly falls within the statute for the punishment of adultery and fornication, under which there 635 is no doubt an Information might be filed, and there is as little doubt that it could not be prosecuted as a mere common law misdemeanor. But, if by the charge of cohabitation "as man and wife," is intended, as we presume it is, that these people occupied the same chamber, ate at the same board, and discharged towards each other the numerous common offices of husband and wife, then it may be said that a publicity is given to the statutory offence of fornication, which aggravates its malignity, so as to draw it within the scope of a common law prosecution. But, this we apprehend is a mistake in the premises. The act of fornication in public, would be indeed an enormous indecency, and so grossly offensive and shocking to the feelings of society, as to entitle it to severe legal animadversion. But, nothing of that sort is pretended to exist in this case, which in truth presents nothing to the public but a

*Criminal Law—Incontinence—Common-Law Offence.—To the point that incontinence of itself is not punishable at common law, the principal case is cited in Com. v. Jones, 2 Gratt. 557.

Same—Lewd and Lascivious Cohabitation—Indictment.—Under the seventh section of ch. 192 of the Code of Virginia, 1873, p. 1208, an indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation may be either joint or separate. Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 346, citing principal case as authority.

The offence of lewd and lascivious cohabitation is a statutory offence, and the statute must be strictly conformed to. Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 19, citing principal case as its authority.

See further, monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674.

The principal case is also cited in Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 20; Com. v. Turner, 5 Rand. 679; State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 770.

number of facts, in themselves harmless and inoffensive, from which the existence of a statutory offence may be inferred. Do these inoffensive evidences of an unlawful act, in themselves constitute an offence? Surely not. Then it has been already decided that they cannot be connected with the statutory offence, so as to make a new crime out of the combination. And therefore, we are of opinion, that no Information for a misdemeanor at common law, can be maintained on this presentment.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

The Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the presentment of the Grand Jury in this case, is good ground upon which to award a rule to shew cause why an Information should not be filed against the defendants for an act of fornication upon the act of Assembly, intitled "an act for the suppression of vice, and punishing the disturbers of religious worship and sabbath-breakers," but that it does not furnish the grounds of any Information against them as for a common law misdemeanor; which is ordered to be certified.

636 *Cummings E. Jackson v. Lewis Maxwell.†

November, 1836.

Prohibition—Jurisdiction of County Court.‡—The County Courts have no power to grant Writs of Prohibition: if they exceed their jurisdiction by granting them, the Superior Courts of Law may restrain the exercise of such jurisdiction by prohibition.

This was a case adjourned to this Court by the Superior Court of Law for Lewis county. The statement of the case is fully set out in the opinion of the Court, which was delivered by

SUMMERS, J.

The plaintiff Jackson, sued out, from a Justice of the Peace, a warrant for a small debt against the defendant Maxwell. The Justice rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for ten dollars, with interest and costs: from this judgment an appeal was had to the County Court, and on examination there, the appeal was dismissed on the ground that it had been improvidently granted. The defendant Maxwell then filed a petition in the County Court, alleging various grounds why the Justice of the Peace ought not to have rendered judgment against him, (all of which go to the merits of the decision, not to the jurisdiction of the Justice,) and praying for a Writ of Prohibition. The County Court taking cognizance of the questions thus brought before that tribunal, ultimately gave judgment prohibiting the Justice of the Peace from enforcing his judgment rendered against the defendant.

A transcript of those proceedings was presented to the Superior Court of Law by the plaintiff Jackson, together with a suggestion, setting out all the circumstances, and alleging that the County Court had wrongfully usurped a jurisdiction which †For monographic note on Prohibition, see end of case.

‡On the subject of prohibition, the principal case is cited in Mayo v. James, 12 Gratt. 18; Board of Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 496; Hogan v. Guilgon, 20 Gratt. 718.

by law appertains exclusively to another tribunal, and on that ground praying a writ to prohibit the County Court from further proceeding in the matter, or enforcing its order awarding a like writ 637 to the Justice of the Peace. Upon this application, the Superior Court adjourned to this Court the following questions for its decision: 1. Can a Writ of Prohibition be awarded by a County Court in any instance? 2. If the County Court exceeded its jurisdiction in granting the writ set out in the record, ought the Superior Court of Law to award a writ prohibiting the County Court from enforcing its order granting the said Writ of Prohibition? 3. What judgment ought the Superior Court of Law to render on the whole premises?

On examining this subject, we find that the Writ of Prohibition was framed as early as 3 Edw. 1; that its purpose was to preserve the rights of the King's Crown and Courts, and was intended for the ease and quiet of the subject, because the wisdom and policy of the laws supposed that both would be best preserved when everything was restrained to its proper channel, according to the original jurisdiction of every Court. And certainly it cannot be less necessary and proper here, that the several Courts keep within the limits and bounds of the jurisdiction prescribed to each by the laws and statutes of the Commonwealth. The Superior Courts at Westminster, having the superintendency over all Inferior Courts, were accustomed, in all cases of innovation, &c. to award a Prohibition, particularly the Court of King's Bench. Fitz. Nat. Brev. 53, and 4 Inst. 71. But, the exercise of jurisdiction by way of prohibition, has ever been confined in that country to the Superior Common Law Courts.

With us, the Superior Courts of Law are the general depositories of the common law jurisdiction. Their authority extends to all persons and over all causes, matters or things at common law, which were cognizable in the General Court on the 22d of December, 1788. On this ground, Writs of Prohibition were awarded under decisions of this Court, in the cases of Miller v. Marshall, 1 Virg. Cases, 158, and Hutson v. Lowry, 2 Virg. Cases, 42; in both of which cases, the non-existence of such a jurisdiction in the County Courts must be taken to have been decided, be-638 cause *if such power resided in those Courts, these were fit occasions for its exercise, and the jurisdiction of the Superior Courts of Law would have been confined to a superintendence of its application. A reference, however, to the acts giving jurisdiction to the County Courts, proves, that their entire authority is derived from the enumerated powers conferred; among which, this superintendency is not to be found, nor is it ancillary to any of the jurisdiction conferred upon those Courts. From this view of the subject, it follows, that the County Court exceeded its jurisdiction in the case before us, and so far as it transcended its rightful authority, the only remedy known to our laws, is found in the application of the Writ of Prohibition to this unauthorised interposition.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

This Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that a County Court has no jurisdiction by prohibition in any instance, and that when a County Court shall extend its jurisdiction by granting such writ, the Superior Court of Law may, and ought, upon proper application, to award a Writ of Prohibition to such County Court, prohibiting the further exercise of such jurisdiction, or the enforcing any order or judgment made under colour thereof.

VI. Appeals.

I. DEFINITION.

The writ of prohibition is a proceeding between two courts, a superior, and an inferior, and is the means whereby the superior exercises its due superintendence over the inferior and keeps it within the limits and bounds of the jurisdiction prescribed to it by law. Mayo v. James, 12 Gratt. 17.

II. GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS.

A. RIGHT TO WRIT.—It is not a writ of right granted ex debito justitiæ but rather one of sound judicial discretion, to be granted or withheld according to the circumstances of each particular case. And, being a prerogative writ, it is to be used like all other prerogative writs, with great caution and forbearance, for the furtherance of justice, and to secure order and regularity in judicial proceedings, where none of the ordinary remedies provided by law are applicable. Supervisors of Bedford v. Wingfield, 27 Gratt. 333.

But by § 1. ch. 110, Code W. Va. (1891), it is provided that the writ of prohibition shall be no longer a matter of discretion, but a matter of right. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Pinnacle Coal Co., 44 W. Va. 574, 30 S. E. Rep. 196; Wilkinson v. Hoke, 39 W. Va. 408, 19 S. E. Rep. 520.

B. FUNCTION.—The ancient writ of prohibition remains, not only to prevent inferior courts from encroaching upon the jurisdiction of superior courts, but to prevent any inferior tribunal from usurping a jurisdiction with which it is not legally vested, and it is used to keep such courts within the limits and bounds prescribed for them by law; for it is of vital importance to the due administration of justice that every tribunal vested with judicial functions should be confined strictly to the exercise of those powers with which it has been by law intrusted. Ensign Mfg. Co. v. McGinnis, 30 W. Va. 532, 4 S. E. Rep. 782. A writ of prohibition is to prevent the exercise by a tribunal possessing judicial powers, of jurisdiction over matters not within its cognizance, or exceeding its jurisdiction in matters of which it has cognizance. It cannot be made use of as a means of correcting errors in the decision of the lower court where it is shown to have jurisdiction since that is the function of a writ of error. State v. Kyle, 8 W. Va. 711; Cunningham v. Squires, 3 W. Va. 422; Hogan v. Gulgon, 29 Gratt. 705; Buskirk v. Judge, 7 W. Va. 91; Supervisors v. Wingfield, 27 Gratt. 333; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Rep. 747; § 1, ch. 153, Acts 1881; Hassinger v. Holt, 47 W. Va. 348, 34 S. E. Rep. 728; Bloxton v. McWhorter, 46 W. Va. 32, 32 S. E. Rep. 1004; West v. Rawson, 40 W. Va. 480, 21 S. E. Rep. 1019; Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 569, 27 S. E. Rep. 883; McDonald v. Guthrie, 43 W. Va. 565, 27 S. E. Rep. 844.

Especially is this true where the law provides that no writ of error shall lie, but that the lower court shall determine finally. Nelms v. Vaughan, 84 Va. 606, 5 S. E. Rep. 704.

The writ of prohibition may also be issued when, having jurisdiction, the court has attempted to proceed by rules differing from those which ought to have been observed, or when by the exercise of its jurisdiction the inferior court would defeat a legal right. Nelms v. Vaughan, 84 Va. 606, 5 S. E. Rep. 704.

But the mere fact that a writ of error or supersedeas would lie to the judgment of the inferior court does not show that prohibition does not also lie, they may be concurrent remedies, and if the remedy by writ of error is not adequate or as efficacious, a writ of prohibition will issue. Board of Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484.

In McDonald v. Guthrie, 43 W. Va. 565, 27 S. E. Rep. 844, BRANNON, J., was of opinion that the mere fact that the jurisdiction of the lower court depended on the constitutionality of an act of the legislature did not make a case for prohibition, but the rest of the court did not pass upon the question.

It follows necessarily from the doctrine just laid down, that mere errors, irregularities or mistakes in the proceedings of the inferior court, however gross or palpable, are not sufficient warrant for granting a writ of prohibition where such court has jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy. And where such inferior court has general jurisdiction of the subject matter, it must exercise its own judgment of the sufficiency of the process by which it acquires jurisdiction of the special subject or person in any particular case, and an erroneous judgment in that regard is not ground for a writ of prohibition, but is the subject of a writ of error. But this general rule is subject to this modification, that where, the inferior court having a general jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy, it clearly appears that in the conduct of the trial they have exceeded their legitimate power in some matter pertaining thereto, for which there is no adequate remedy in the ordinary course of proceeding, the writ of prohibition will lie under the West Virginia statute and under the general principles of law. McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134; Fleming Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

All the requirements to give the circuit court jurisdiction of an appeal from the county court in a contested election case, which are mandatory, having been substantially complied with, no writ of prohibition will lie to the circuit judge to prevent him from exercising jurisdiction because some merely formal requirement of the statute has not been complied with. Nelms v. Vaughan, 84 Va. 606, 5 S. E. Rep. 704.

C. CHARACTER OF PROCEEDINGS TO WHICH THE WRIT IS APPLICABLE.—Prohibition lies only in case of the unlawful exercise of judicial functions. Acts of a mere ministerial, administrative, or executive character do not fall within its province. Fleming v. Com., 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

The writ of prohibition lies from a superior court not only to inferior judicial tribunals, properly and technically denominated such, but also to inferior ministerial tribunals possessing incidentally judicial powers, or tribunals such as are known in the law as quasi judicial tribunals and even, in extreme cases to purely ministerial bodies when they usurp judicial functions. When these latter abuse or exceed their legitimate powers, by the exercise of a jurisdiction that does not pertain to them, they may be restrained by prohibition. Brazie v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 218; Fleming v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

While many of the acts of commissioners, while sitting as a board of canvassers, after an election, are merely ministerial, they are not all so; and where such tribunal, clothed by the statute with both ministerial and judicial powers, is merely exercising its ministerial functions, to its action in such matters prohibition will not lie; but when it is exercising its judicial functions, and is proceeding in excess of its judicial powers, or is usurping judicial powers which do not belong to it, to such action a writ of prohibition will lie. Fleming v. Com., 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

A mayor in the exercise of his power to supervise and remove the officers in his department is an executive officer and not a court, and is not inferior to the corporation court, hence a writ of prohibition will not lie from the corporation court to the mayor to restrain him from investigating charges against his chief of police. Burch v. Hardwicke, 23 Gratt. 51.

In Hassinger v. Holt, 47 W. Va. 348, 34 S. E. Rep. 728, it was held that a writ of prohibition would not lie from the circuit court to the board of education since its duties are purely ministerial.

D. MUST BE NO OTHER ADEQUATE REMEDY.—Being an extraordinary remedy, however, the writ of prohibition issues only in case of extreme necessity, and, before it can be granted, it must appear that the party aggrieved has applied in vain for redress; and it is never allowed except in cases of usurpation or abuse of power, and not then unless other existing remedies are inadequate to afford relief, or no other remedy exists; for it is a principle of universal application, and one which lies at the very foundation of the law of prohibition, that the jurisdiction is strictly confined to cases where no other remedy exists, and it is always a sufficient reason for withholding it that the party aggrieved has another and complete remedy at law. Supervisors of Bedford v. Wingfield, 27 Gratt. 333; Ensign Mfg. Co. v. McGinnis, 30 W. Va. 532, 4 S. E. Rep. 782; County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. Rep. 747; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134; Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 267.

But while it is true that a writ of prohibition will not lie where there is a complete remedy in some other and more ordinary form, this is only true where there is another adequate remedy, and if the judge or court is proceeding without any jurisdiction, a writ of prohibition ought to issue, although an appeal, writ of error or supersedeas would lie to any judgment he might afterwards render. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

But by § 1, ch. 110, Code W. Va. (1891), the writ of prohibition is declared to lie in all proper cases whether there is any other remedy or not. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Pinnacle Coal Co., 44 W. Va. 574, 30 S. E. Rep. 196.

E. APPLICABLE EQUALLY TO COURTS OF LAW AND CHANCERY.—A writ of prohibition may as well be granted to prohibit proceedings in a court of chancery as in a common-law court. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

III. INSTANCES.

A. WHERE WRIT WAS GRANTED.

To Circuit Court.—A writ of prohibition will lie to the circuit court to prevent it from proceeding on a writ of error and supersedeas, which it has awarded, without jurisdiction, to a judgment of a county court in an election contest. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

A writ of prohibition will lie to prevent a circuit court from entertaining jurisdiction by appeal, writ of error or certiorari on the application of persons who have never appeared in the inferior court, where the remedy by appeal would be wholly inadequate. County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. Rep. 747. See also, County Court v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. Rep. 488.

Where a civil case has been twice tried by a jury before a justice, the circuit court has no power to interfere by injunction to prevent the enforcement of such judgment, in the face of the constitutional inhibition against the granting of more than one new trial in such cases, and against the re-examination of any fact tried by a jury, otherwise than according to the rules of the common law, so a writ of prohibition will lie to the circuit court prohibiting the enforcement of its decree in such a case. Mfg. Co. v. McGinnis, 30 W. Va. 532, 4 S. E. Rep. 782.

The circuit court has no jurisdiction to review the order of a county court, granting a license to retail spirituous liquors, by supersedeas. All proceedings had on such a supersedeas are coram non iudice and void, and a writ of prohibition will be awarded by the supreme court to judge of the circuit court commanding him to proceed no further upon such supersedeas. Hein v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 358.

The statute, § 5, ch. 52 of the Code W. Va., being mandatory and declaring in express and positive terms that a company, in the exercise of eminent domain shall not invade a dwelling house or any space within twenty feet thereof, the circuit court has no discretion, and if it allows such dwelling house to be taken, it is an act in excess of the jurisdiction to which a writ of prohibition will lie. Such an act not being an erroneous exercise of conceded jurisdiction but entirely without authority or jurisdiction. McConaha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134.

In Yates v. County Court, 47 W. Va. 376, 35 S. E. Rep. 24, a writ of prohibition was awarded against a circuit court prohibiting it from ordering or confirming a donation made out of the county treasury without lawful authority.

A circuit court cannot review a judgment of a county court except in the cases and in the mode prescribed by law. If a circuit court, ex mero motu, undertake to review a judgment of a county court, it is an act of usurpation for which prohibition lies; so, if a circuit court undertakes to review such a judgment on the petition of one who is not a party to it, the same remedy lies. The Board of Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484; County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. Rep. 747.

So in Watson v. Blackstone, 98 Va. 618, 38 S. E. Rep. 939, the writ was granted to restrain a circuit court from entertaining an appeal from a corporation court.

A writ of prohibition will lie to the judgment of a circuit court giving costs against a municipal corporation, in a prosecution for the violation of a municipal ordinance. City of Charleston v. Beller, 45 W. Va. 44, 30 S. E. Rep. 152.

Where costs are given in a circuit court, in an action not on contract, where less than $50 damages was recovered, which might have been brought and prosecuted to judgment in a justices' court, and where it is not entered of record that the object of the action was to try a right other than the mere right to recover damages or that the trespass was wilful or malicious, contrary to the statute, § 6, ch. 138, Code W. Va. (1891), a writ of prohibition is the proper proceeding to arrest the execution of the judgment, so far as it was rendered for such costs. Wilkinson v. Hoke, 39 W. Va. 403, 19 S. E. Rep. 520.

The supreme court has no jurisdiction to award a writ of prohibition to a circuit court to prohibit it from proceeding by mandamus to compel the secretary of state to deliver to the speaker of the house of delegates the sealed returns of an election for governor properly transmitted to him where the petitioner does not, by his petition, show such interest or right as would entitle him to interfere in or complain of the said mandamus. Fleming v. Guthrie, 32 W. Va. 1, 9 S. E. Rep. 23.

An injunction having been granted as auxiliary to a writ of error and supersedeas to prevent a contestant from assuming to discharge the duties of the office of clerk, a writ of prohibition will lie to prevent the enforcement of such injunction. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

The fact that a party has disobeyed an injunction order is no reason why a writ of prohibition should not issue to such injunction order, where such order was made without jurisdiction, for it is not contempt to disobey an order which a court had no jurisdiction to make. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

To Corporation Courts.—In Johnson v. Barham, 99 Va. 305, 38 S. E. Rep. 136, the writ was granted to prevent a corporation court from entertaining an appeal from the judgment of the board of police commissioners from which there is no appeal.

The circuit court of Richmond being clothed with exclusive jurisdiction of suits to enjoin executions issued on judgments in favor of the commonwealth, a writ of prohibition will lie to the corporation court of Lynchburg to prevent it from proceeding with such a suit. Com. v. Latham, 85 Va. 632, 8 S. E. Rep. 488.

To County Courts.—Although the jurisdiction of the court is admitted, where the judge of another county court sits in the case and renders judgment without the prerequisites required by statute to authorize him to do so being fulfilled, a writ of prohibition will lie to prevent the enforcement of any judgment rendered by him, he being wholly without jurisdiction. Gresham v. Ewell, 85 Va. 1, 6 S. E. Rep. 700.

The writ of prohibition lies from the circuit court to the commissioners of the county court sitting as canvassers of an election, to prevent them from exceeding their legal powers in undertaking to hear evidence and review the action of the precinct commissioners. Brazie v. Commissioners, 25 W. Va. 218.

The county court having no authority by statute to give a judgment for costs in contested election cases, a writ of prohibition will lie to arrest execution on such judgment. West v. Ferguson, 16 Gratt. 270.

To Justices of the Peace.—A justice of the peace having no jurisdiction to award a new trial more than thirty days after rendition of judgment, a writ of prohibition will lie from the circuit court to restrain him from proceeding with such new trial. Burroughs v. Taylor, 90 Va. 55, 17 S. E. Rep. 745.

A writ of prohibition will lie to prevent a justice of the peace from proceeding in a case, where the creditor has split up his debt, which in the aggregate was too great for the jurisdiction of a justice, induced the debtor to give notes payable at different times and in such amounts as to give a justice jurisdiction, and has brought separate warrants for each sum before the same justice, after they are all due. Hutson v. Lowry, 2 Va. Cas. 42; James v. Stokes, 77 Va. 226; RICHARDSON, J., dissenting. Bodley v. Archibald, 33 W. Va. 229, 10 S. E. Rep. 392.

A writ of prohibition will lie to a justice of the peace, to prevent him from determining the rate of freight charges of a railroad, he having no jurisdiction in such cases. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Pinnacle Coal Co., 44 W. Va. 574, 30 S. E. Rep. 196.

A writ of prohibition will be granted by a district court to prohibit a justice of peace from taking jurisdiction of a suit to recover rent reserved in a deed to the grantor and his heirs forever, the rent being a freehold estate of inheritance in an incorporeal hereditament. Miller v. Marshall, 1 Va. Cas. 158.

In Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Overton, 3 Va. Law Rep. 735, a writ of prohibition was granted to a justice of the peace prohibiting him from proceeding further on a judgment, where, in an action for $10 damages for killing plaintiff's horse, the plaintiff admitted that the horse was worth $50, and that she sued for only $10 damages in order to prevent the case from going to the county court, either by appeal or removal.

No action for money had and received lies against a tax collector for money paid as taxes, even when paid under protest, hence a writ of prohibition lies from the circuit court to a personal judgment rendered by a justice against a city treasurer for money so paid on the refusal of the officer to receive state coupons, to prevent the levy of an execution on such judgment, it being void. Mallan v. Bransford, 86 Va. 675, 10 S. E. Rep. 977.

B. WHERE WRIT WAS REFUSED.—Prohibition is not a proper remedy, where a town council, under § 28, ch. 47, Code W. Va., decides that a "merry-go-round" is a nuisance, where it is not claimed that the statute is unconstitutional, but merely that they erred in applying it to the facts. Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464, 21 S. E. Rep. 906.

A writ of error and not prohibition is the proper remedy where a party, who is entitled to be examined before the county court by the act of April 3, 1873, before the circuit court can try him for the felony for which he is indicted, is tried upon such indictment before such an examination is had, and is convicted. Buskirk v. Judge, 7 W. Va. 91.

In Town of Davis v. Filler, 47 W. Va. 413, 35 S. E. Rep. 6, it was held that a circuit court had no jurisdiction by prohibition to prohibit a town council from removing a superintendent of streets.

MONCRE, J. In Mayo v. James, 12 Gratt. 17, was of opinion, though unnecessary to the decision of the case by his view of it, that the mayor of Richmond having jurisdiction of cases under the laws of the state and cases in which any ordinance of the city was alleged to be violated, no writ of prohibition would lie against him on the ground that a certain ordinance was claimed to be in contravention of an act of assembly.

The circuit courts being invested by statute with a general authority and jurisdiction to condemn real estate for public purposes, although, in order to divest the title of the owner of the land, the mode prescribed by the statute must be strictly followed, nevertheless any informality in such proceedings, e. g. want of proper notice, is not ground for a writ of prohibition, but must be corrected by writ of error or certiorari. Any error in the decision of such a question by the court could not be regarded as an excess of jurisdiction, but merely an error in adjudicating a matter of which it had undoubted jurisdiction. McConiha v. Guthrie, 31 W. Va. 181.

The judge of the county court having jurisdiction to remove a sheriff who has accepted another office, a writ of prohibition will not lie to him from the circuit court in such case, but the proper remedy is by writ of error. Shell v. Cousins, 77 Va. 328.

The judge of a circuit court having authority to control the courthouse in which he administers justice, he has a right to enquire into any interference with such right by the board of supervisors, and no writ of prohibition will lie to his action; if erroneous, a writ of error is the proper remedy. Supervisors v. Wingfield, 27 Gratt. 329.

The corporation court having jurisdiction of contested election cases of city officers under § 160 of the Code Va. 1887, the writ of prohibition is not the proper remedy, merely because the court continues part of the case to a succeeding term. Moss v. Barham, 94 Va. 12, 26 S. E. Rep. 388.

The circuit court having jurisdiction, where a defendant puts in a plea unsupported by affidavit, in an action of assumpsit where the plaintiff put in an affidavit with his declaration, to strike out such plea and refuse to receive another, and to enter judgment, a writ of prohibition will not lie to prevent further proceedings on such judgment. Grigg v. Dalsheimer, 88 Va. 508, 13 S. E. Rep. 993.

A justice of the peace having jurisdiction to hear motions against a constable and his sureties by any person injured by the failure of the constable to pay over money received by him on execution, irrespective of amount or of the fact that the same party is at the same time prosecuting other motions against the same constable and his sureties before the same or any other justice for other similar defaults, no writ of prohibition will lie to the justice to prevent further proceedings on judgments recovered in such motions because such motions were prosecuted under one joint notice, the motions and judgments being separate and distinct. Hendricks v. Shoemaker, 3 Gratt. 197.

The corporation court having authority to remove a judge of elections, no writ of prohibition will lie to the judge of such court to prevent him from exercising such authority. McDougal v. Guilgon, 27 Gratt. 133.

Where commissioners were assembled, under the West Virginia statute, in special session, after an election, to canvass the votes cast, and the question was presented to them whether the precinct commissioners, canvassers, and clerks, at a certain voting place were sworn, such question was a judicial one, within their jurisdiction, and, whether, on the evidence before them, they decided rightly or wrongly, could not be the basis for an application for a writ of prohibition. Fleming v. Com., 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

IV. BY WHAT COURTS ALLOWED.

A. SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Generally.—The power of the supreme court of appeals to award writs of prohibition is conferred by the constitution, and will always be exercised in a proper case; and when the proper case is made by the pleadings and evidence, the power to award the writ is unquestioned. Supervisors of Bedford v. Wingfield, 27 Gratt. 333; Com. v. Latham, 85 Va. 632, 8 S. E. Rep. 488.

The supreme court of appeals has concurrent original jurisdiction with the circuit courts in all cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition. Fleming v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

By a rule adopted by the supreme court of appeals, it will not take such original jurisdiction, unless special reasons appear therefor; but, when such reasons are made to appear, it will, without hesitation, exercise its jurisdiction. Fleming v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267. This rule was intended to prevent the appellate court from being unnecessarily burdened with such cases which might just as well be determined in the circuit court and then, if errors were committed, a writ of error would lie to the appellate court. As in an election case, where it is necessary that the results be declared as soon as possible. Fleming v. Com'rs, 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267; Alderson v. Com'rs, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. Rep. 274.

Sec. 7 of the Act of Jan. 1873, providing that each case shall be heard and determined in its own grand division, has no application to the supreme court of appeals in the exercise of its original jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition, but it may grant those writs at any of its terms in any division. It may grant a conditional writ at one term in one division, returnable to another term in a different division. Buskirk v. Judge, 7 W. Va. 91.

In Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 893, a doubt was raised as to the constitutionality of § 1, ch. 110, Code W. Va. 1891, allowing one judge of the court of appeals to award a rule for a writ of prohibition in vacation, but the court did not decide the question.

Necessity for Declaration.—There is not the same reason, or necessity for a declaration in prohibition in the court of appeals, and where there is no necessity for it and no benefit to be derived from it, it will be dispensed with, e. g. where the facts relied on are matters of record, undenied and undeniable. Board of Supervisors of Culpeper Co. v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484, 521.

To the County Courts.—The court of appeals has no authority to issue a writ of prohibition to the county court. Gresham v. Ewell, 84 Va. 784, 6 S. E. Rep. 134.

B. CIRCUIT COURTS.—The circuit courts, and the judges thereof in vacation, where a state of facts exists which would warrant a writ of prohibition at common law, have authority to issue the rule to show cause as well as the writ itself, to justices, and other inferior tribunals. Sec. 12, art. 8, Constitution of West Virginia, Acts 1882, ch. 153, § 1, ch. 73, § 3. Brazie v. Commissioners, 25 W. Va. 213.

C. COUNTY COURTS.—The county courts have no power to grant writs of prohibition; if they exceed their jurisdiction by granting them the superior courts of law may restrain the exercise of such jurisdiction by prohibition. Jackson v. Maxwell, 5 Rand. 636.

V. PROCEDURE.

A. IN GENERAL.—The following would seem to be the proper course to be pursued on an application for a writ of prohibition to a circuit court, or a judge thereof in vacation: The ground of the application should be set out in a proper suggestion, verified by affidavit, as to such material facts as do not appear on the record; or in affidavits instead of a suggestion, according to the Code, ch. 155, p. 612. If, upon such suggestion or affidavits the court or judge be clearly of opinion that there is no good ground for a prohibition, it ought at once to be denied. But if otherwise, a rule should be made upon the adverse party to show cause why the writ should not be issued. The execution of the rule upon the party and the judge of the inferior court will have the effect of a prohibition quousque, or until the discharge of the rule. Upon the return of the rule executed, the court or judge will make it absolute or discharge it, as may then seem to be proper; and in the former case, may direct the applicant to declare in prohibition before writ issued; and ought to do so, if the defendant require it. If such direction be given, the further proceedings in the case will of course be in pursuance of the Code, ch. 155, p. 612. Mayo v. James, 12 Gratt. 17, Acts W. Va. 1882, ch. 153, § 1. Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 267; Brazie v. Commissioners, 25 W. Va. 213.

To the declaration the defendant may demur or plead such matter as may be proper to show that the writ ought not to issue and conclude by praying that such writ may not issue. In such case, of course, the trial would be referred by the judge to the court where it could be had if the rule was granted in vacation. Brazie v. Commissioners, 25 W. Va. 213.

B. THE PETITION.—The petition for a writ of prohibition must clearly show that the inferior tribunal is about to proceed in a matter over which it has no jurisdiction. Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 324.

Where the petition for a writ of prohibition clearly shows that it is based on alleged usurpation of power, and that the circuit court had acted and was acting without jurisdiction, this is sufficient though it might have been stated more positively and directly. It need not allege in specific terms that the judge had in any manner as yet exceeded his authority or acted without jurisdiction, or that the judge had no jurisdiction in the case. In any case if these objections were valid they should have been made by the defendant's counsel in the argument of the question whether the rule nihi should be awarded. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

It is improper to demur to the petition for a writ of prohibition, but if a demurrer is filed it may be overruled, since that is equivalent to striking it out. Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 324.

C. VARIANCE BETWEEN AFFIDAVIT AND DECLARATION.—Advantage can only be taken of a variance between the affidavit and declaration in prohibition by plea in abatement and not by general demurrer. Warwick v. Mayo, 15 Gratt. 528.

D. PARTIES.—All parties adversely interested should be made parties respondent and be served with notice in prohibition proceedings, e. g. the railroad company in a proceeding to prohibit a county court from lowering the valuation of its property for taxation, and a failure to do so is ground for demurrer. Armstrong v. County Court, 15 W. Va. 190.

E. STAGE OF PROCEEDINGS WHEN APPLICATION MUST BE MADE.—The writ of prohibition is only applicable to a pending proceeding and cannot be used to prevent the institution of an action or proceeding or where the action or proceeding is finished. Haldeman v. Davis, 28 W. Va. 324.

While there is some apparent conflict of authority as to the stage of the cause in the court below in which the application for the writ may be made, as to whether it should be made before or after the decision of the court, the distinction is as to whether the want of jurisdiction in the subordinate court, which is relied on as the foundation of the writ, is apparent upon the proceedings sought to be prohibited; where this want of jurisdiction is thus apparent upon the record, the superior tribunal may interpose the aid of a prohibition at any stage of the proceedings below, even after verdict, sentence or judgment. Ensign Mfg. Co. v. McGinnis, 30 W. Va. 532, 4 S. E. Rep. 782; French v. Noel, 23 Gratt. 454; Hein v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 358.

In Bodley v. Archibald, 33 W. Va. 229, 10 S. E. Rep. 392, it was held, approving Hutson v. Lowry, 3 Va. Cas. 42, that it might be shown by evidence de hors the record of the lower court that the lower court had exceeded its jurisdiction, if such fact appears from the whole record.

In City of Charleston v. Beller, 45 W. Va. 44, 30 S. E. Rep. 152, it was held that prohibition was the proper remedy to prevent the enforcement by execution of an unauthorized judgment for costs.

Though the judgments have been actually rendered, executions levied and the money in the hands of the constable, the writ will still lie, the defendant having given notice to the constable not to pay the money to the plaintiff. Hutson v. Lowry, 3 Va. Cas. 42; James v. Stokes, 77 Va. 225. See Bodley v. Archibald, 33 W. Va. 229, 10 S. E. Rep. 392.

F. RAISING OBJECTION IN LOWER COURT.—Where on the face of the proceedings the inferior court has not jurisdiction and the parties cannot by consent or waiver give the court jurisdiction, it may be prohibited from proceeding, though the record does not show that the party praying for the petition, either by motion or suggestion, in any manner asked the inferior court to dismiss the proceedings. This was the principle upon which the supreme court of Virginia acted in Supervisors of Culpeper v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 495, and upon which this court acted in Hein v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 358. In each of these cases a judge of the circuit court had granted a writ of error and supersedeas to a judgment of the county court, when he had no jurisdiction to grant such a writ; and the supreme court of appeals awarded writs of prohibition, though the petitioners had made no motion in the inferior court to dismiss the writs of error and supersedeas as improvidently awarded. Such a motion, or a motion to dissolve an injunction, cannot therefore be held as essential before application can properly be made for a writ of prohibition. In some cases the court of appeals might decline to act in an application for a writ of prohibition till such a motion was made in the inferior court; for this writ is not granted ex debito iustitie, but is rather to be granted or withheld according to the circumstances of each particular case, and in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

In Com. v. Latham, 85 Va. 632, 8 S. E. Rep. 488, the court said that it was not necessary to raise the question of want of jurisdiction by motion in the lower court before a writ of prohibition could be obtained from the supreme court of appeals, original jurisdiction being given that court in any case, although, in that case a motion was made to transfer the suit to the proper court, which was overruled, and this was intimated to be a sufficient objection to the jurisdiction.

Whether it is necessary to object in the lower court to the assumption of jurisdiction, has been held a controverted question in Virginia and has not been decided. Johnson v. Barham, 99 Va. 305, 38 S. E. Rep. 136.

In Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 267, the court disapproved of the frequency with which the extraordinary writ of prohibition was resorted to, and intimated that, to authorize a writ of prohibition to a lower court for want of jurisdiction, it would be necessary for a plea to the jurisdiction to have been tendered and overruled.

G. PROCEEDINGS IN VACATION.—In West Virginia, the judge of a circuit court is expressly authorized to issue the writ of prohibition in vacation, Acts W. Va., 1882, ch. 73, § 3, and having the power to issue the writ in vacation, it follows of necessity that he has authority to make the rule returnable before him and hear it in vacation. If he thinks it necessary to direct the defendant to declare in prohibition he would refer the trial to the court. Brazie v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 218.

VI. APPEALS.

The right of appeal is given by law in all cases of prohibition, and cannot be denied in a case in which the proceeding complained of is a criminal proceeding. Whether it be civil or criminal, damages and costs may be recovered against the defendant in prohibition; and he should have the same right to reverse the judgment for error therein in the one case as in the other. It is true that where the proceeding is criminal, the effect of the writ of prohibition may be to prevent the further prosecution of an offense by subjecting the judge of the inferior court and the prosecutor to an attachment for proceeding after the delivery of the writ to them. But this mere consequence of the writ is not an acquittal of the offense (which has never in fact been tried); and a supersedeas to the order awarding the writ, or refusing to discharge it, cannot be considered as a writ of error for the commonwealth in a criminal case. Mayo v. James, 12 Gratt. 17.

Supersedeas Bond—Penalty—How Fixed.—The penalty of a Supersedeas bond is to be fixed by the Judge granting it, and is not governed by the law respecting appeals by plaintiffs, or demandants.

Execution—Relief from—How Obtained.—The Audita Querela, to relieve a defendant from an execution where the matter of discharge has been subsequent to the judgment, is an obsolete remedy, and has been substituted in modern practice by the motion.

Same—Same—Motion for—Jury.—If on a motion (to quash an execution, or enter a judgment satisfied,) the relief of the party depends on matters of fact, the Court has a discretion to direct a jury to try the facts.

Attorneys—Powers of.—An Attorney at Law has no right to receive a bond from the debtor in discharge of his client's claim, without the assent of the client. If he does, he is the agent, not of the plaintiff, but the defendant, and the plaintiff may still proceed against the defendant.

The plaintiff sued out of the clerk's office of Orange County Court an execution against the goods and chattels of the defendant, for the sum of $205 44, with interest on the same from 27th October, 1821,

Execution—Relief from—Motion.—See principal case cited on this subject in Steele v. Boyd, 6 Leigh 552; Shuford v. Cain, 22 Fed. Cas. 49. For further information, see monographic note on "Executions" appended to Paine v. Tutwiler, 27 Gratt. 440.

Attorneys—Powers of—Collection of Debts.—It is well settled that an attorney at law has no authority to commute a debt in his hands for collection without the assent of his client. Paxton v. Steele, 86 Va. 313, 10 S. E. Rep. 1, citing principal case as authority.

An attorney at law employed to collect a debt may receive payment in money, but has no right to accept anything else in satisfaction, without express authority. Wiley v. Mahood, 10 W. Va. 221, citing the principal case as authority.

There is no doubt of the authority of an attorney in good faith to receive payment of a judgment due his client. Chalfants v. Martin, 25 W. Va. 398, citing till paid. The execution bore date the 27th July, 1822; was returnable on the fourth Monday in September following, and having come into the hands of the sheriff, was returned by him with this endorsement, "Not executed by order of plaintiff's attorney."

Another execution issued in the name of the same plaintiff, on the same judgment against the goods of the defendant, bearing date the 10th October, 1823. Immediately thereafter, the defendant moved the County Court of Orange to quash the last execution, on the ground that the amount of the judgment on which the execution issued, was paid to the plaintiff's attorney after the rendition of the judgment, and before the emanation of the said execution. In support of his motion, the defendant gave in evidence the first mentioned execution, with the return thereon, and a receipt of Edmund Banks, the attorney for the plaintiff, in the words and figures following: "Received 25th November, 1822, from Col. Laurence T. Dade, one hundred and fifty-four dollars and seventy cents in money; also, the bond of William Quarles, for one hundred and seventy 640 $dollars and thirty-nine cents, payable in four months, and a draft on Anthony Buck, for three hundred dollars, at ten days sight; which, when paid, will be in full of the executions of James Smock, and Peter Smock against him in Orange County Court. Edmund Banks, Attorney." The plaintiff admitted, that the amount of the draft on Anthony Buck had been received by the said Banks, the attorney, but there was no evidence of the payment of Wm. Quarles's bond, either to Banks or Smock, nor had it ever been returned or accounted for to Dade. The defendant also gave in evidence the execution from the same office against the goods and chattels of the defendant, in the name of Peter Smock, (as mentioned in the receipt,) for $354. with interest from 22d December, 1820, till payment, bearing date the 27th July, 1822, and returned, "Not executed by order of the plaintiff's attorney;" for the collection of which last execution, also, the said Banks was attorney. The Court being of opinion, that the said receipt and other facts, were sufficient to sustain the motion, gave judgment that the execution of 10th October, 1823, should be quashed. The plaintiff excepted to the opinion of the Court, and spread all the foregoing facts on his bill of exceptions.

Smock v. Dade, 5 Rand. 639; Wilkinson v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 277; Smith v. Lamberts, 7 Gratt. 148; Wiley v. Mahood, 10 W. Va. 223, to support the statement.

And in Harper v. Harvey, 4 W. Va. 541, it is said: "The payment of a judgment or decree to the attorney of record, who obtained it before his authority is revoked, and due notice of such revocation given to the defendant, is valid and binding on the plaintiff, so far as the defendant is concerned. Yoakum v. Tilden, 3 W. Va. 167. But it must be a payment of money, or if not a payment of money, it must be accepted by the plaintiff in lieu of money, or the attorney must have special authority to receive it. Smock v. Dade, 5 Rand. 639."

To the same effect the principal case is cited in Wilkinson v. Holloway, 7 Leigh 298; Smith v. Lamberts, 7 Gratt. 138, 143, 144, 145, and foot-note; Tuley v. Barton, 79 Va. 388; Wiley v. Mahood, 10 W. Va. 222.

See further, monographic note on "Attorney and Client" appended to Johnson v. Gibbons, 27 Gratt. 632.

The plaintiff obtained from a Judge of this Court a Supersedeas to the judgment, it being allowed on the petitioner's entering into bond with security in the penalty of fifty dollars.

The case came on before the Superior Court of Law for Orange, and the Judge thereof adjourned for decision to this Court the following questions:

1. Ought the Judge in the present case to have directed bond and security to be given in the penalty of $63 33, and does the law respecting an appeal by the plaintiff or defendant, apply to a Writ of Error or Supersedeas?

2. Does the law authorise the County Court to quash an execution upon such evidence as was before it, and did it enter a correct judgment in quashing such execution?

3. All and every question arising out of the record?

641 *The case was argued by Chapman Johnson, for the defendant Dade, and by Stanard, for the plaintiff.

Johnson, on the first point, referred to the 1st Rev. Co. of 1819, ch. 71, sec. 72 and 73, and to ch. 69, sec. 58, 59; and admitted that the Supersedeas bond was right in this case. He contended, that the Writ of Audita Querela, had become obsolete, and that in modern practice the motion had been substituted for it. For the whole doctrine on this subject, he referred to the following authorities: 1 Bac. Abr. 311, Audita Querela, B.; 1 Comyn's, 778, Aud. Quer. D.; 3 Black. Com. 405-6; Lester v. Mundell, 1 Bos. & Pull. 427; Anonymous, 1 Salk. 93; Wicket v. Creamer, Ib. 264, and 1 Ld. Raym. 439; Baker v. The Judges of Ulster, 4 Johns. Rep. 1; Burke v. Hunt, 17 Johns. 484; Bebee v. Bank of N. Y. 1 Johns. 529; Wardell v. Eden, Ib. 522.

He referred to Gordon v. Frazer, 2 Wash. 130, to show that the motion had substituted the Writ of Error Coram Vobis. Also to Hendricks v. Dundas, 2 Wash. 50, 54, to shew the general power exercised by Courts over their executions, upon motion; to Burke v. Levy, 1 Rand. 1, to shew that the Court may have a jury, or not, at their election; and to prove the power of the attorney in receiving the money, and discharging the execution, for his client, he referred to 1 Comyn's, 157, 158, B. 9, B. 10; Hudson v. Johnson, 1 Wash. 10; Branch v. Burnley, 1 Call. 147.

Stanard, for the plaintiff.

I. As the claim to relief is founded on the allegation that the judgment was paid, relief ought to have been sought by Audita Querela, or Injunction, and not by motion. Though the motion is substituted in many cases in the place of the Audita

642 Querela, yet it is not, when it *depends on a contested matter of fact. 1 Salk. 264; Barnes, 204; 1 Johns. Rep. 531; 1 Ld. Raym. 439.

II. When relief depends on matter of law only, it is not granted on motion, unless the case be clear. 1 Johns. Rep. 531, in note. The case of Lester v. Mundell, 1 Bos. & Pull. 427, is not supported by any case previous, or subsequent, and is in direct contravention of the decision of Holt, 1 Salk. 264. The modern practice is not that the motion has superseded the Audita Querela, in all cases, but in many or most cases. 2 Crompt. 416; 5 Taunt. 561.

III. If it is objected, that the Audita Querela has gone entirely out of use, the answer is, that it has not been substituted by motion, where relief depends on matters in pais, as payment, &c. If there be no modern example of a resort to the Audita Querela, there is none of a motion as its substitute. It has been substituted by Injunction.

IV. He contended, that the Court should not have decided the fact of payment, but should have submitted it to a jury. In the only case in which relief, depending on matter of fact or in pais, has been granted on motion, (1 Bos. & Pull. 437,) the fact was ascertained by an issue tried by a jury, and it is not surmised that it is competent to the Court to assume the decision of the fact. The control of the Court over its practice, may give them power to modify the form by which contested questions may be brought to adjudication, but gives no right to transfer to itself the functions of the jury.

It is incongruous, that the Court should try the fact of payment where the debt is evidenced by record, and have no such power when it is founded on a bond, note, or promise. If the Court can endow itself with jurisdiction to try the fact, in such suit, by a change of the manner of bringing the facts in judgment, why not in every other suit?

But, it is objected, that in motions on forthcoming bonds, and other summary remedies, questions of fact *that arise may, in the discretion of the Court, be decided by it, without the intervention of a jury. The answer is, that in those cases, the Courts are endowed by expressed statute law, with the power of deciding the motion, and giving judgment, and the decision sustaining their right to dispense with a jury, is nothing more than an interpretation of the statute, and a determination of the extent of power which such statute communicates. The power claimed and exercised, is derived from the legislative grant, not assumed under color of a change of the mode of bringing questions to adjudication. Suppose the statute law had not provided a remedy by motion, in the case of forthcoming bonds, could the Court assume the trial of the fact? English Judges have not ventured on such an usurpation. If the statutes giving the Court power to grant judgments on forthcoming bonds were repealed, the argument founded on the practice under those statutes, would lose its foundation. Can the right of the Judge to try and decide the question, whether a judgment has been paid or released, depend on the existence, or non-existence, of the statute giving remedy by motion on forthcoming bonds?

The Courts in England entertain motions to vacate judgments entered under warrants of attorney given on an usurious consideration, but they do not assume the power of deciding the fact of usury, but have an issue to try it. Cook v. Jones, Cowp. 727. Would the Courts here assume the power of trying the fact? He presumed not; and yet if the position assumed, that the power to entertain the motion, carries with it the power to try and decide all matters connected with the motion, be correct, the Courts would have that power.

V. The decision on the fact was wrong. The attorney had no right, as such, to make a commutation of the debts, and bind his client by any such arrangement. His sole power was to collect the debt due from Dade to his client, and could bind him by the receipt of the money only. This is the 644 utmost extent which the decision of the Court *of Appeals has given to the authority of the attorney. Suppose he had neglected the collection of Quarles's bond, was Smock chargeable with the consequences? Smock had not confided that agency to him; Dade had; and in the collection of Quarles's bond, he was the agent of Dade only.

VI. Had Smock given the receipt himself, it would not have established the fact of payment. The receipt imports that the bond was taken as a security for the debt, not as a payment. If Smock had sanctioned the act of Banks, he could not have maintained a motion against him on the proofs in the record; he must further have proved that the bond was paid. Could the Court have been warranted in entering a satisfaction of the judgment? If not, the execution ought not to have been quashed. Indeed, the motion ought to have been to enter satisfaction of the judgment; for that would be the result of a successful prosecution of the Audita Querela; and if the motion be an authorised substitute for that writ, and the fact be made out, that should have been the judgment in this case. If the proofs do authorise such judgment, that which was given cannot be vindicated.

SUMMERS, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

It is conceded by the counsel for the defendant, and the Court concur with him in the opinion, that the Writ of Supersedeas was properly allowed, and that the law respecting an appeal by the plaintiff or defendant, has no relation to Writs of Error and Supersedeas.

On examining the question, whether the remedy sought in this case should have been by an Audita Querela, or Injunction, and not by motion, we are satisfied, as well from the uniform practice in Virginia, as from the modern decisions in England, that the more summary, and less expensive mode of proceeding by motion was proper, and that relief may be given in this way in all cases, where 645 by *the ancient practice the party would be entitled to an Audita Querela.

When the claim of the party to relief depends on matters of fact, the Court may, in its discretion, cause them to be submitted to a jury, and such course is particularly proper where the evidence is contradictory, or where it may authorise conflicting inferences, and either of the parties are desirous of referring it to that forum. But, the case before us does not, in our opinion, fall within this rule, nor does the record disclose any objection by the parties to the mode of trial adopted.

The authority of the attorney to receive payment of the debt which he is employed to recover, we think well settled; but, that authority, in our opinion, does not extend to its commutation without the assent of the client. In relation to Quarles's bond, we regard Banks, as the attorney of Dade, not of Smock. On giving an acquittance, or receipt for the money, he must have represented the former, not the latter. It was a new engagement, in which all his authority was derived from Dade: to him he must have looked for compensation, and to him he was accountable. To extend the authority of the attorney beyond this limit, without a general discretionary power from the party employing him, would carry the responsibility of the first client into transactions far beyond the first engagement, and which might be induced solely with a view to the profit of the attorney, or the accommodation of the debtor.

If, however, the receipt set out in the record had been the act of Smock himself, it would not, in our opinion, have authorised the quashing of the execution, without further proof of the receipt of the money; as that paper imports that the bond of Quarles was taken as a security, not as a payment of the debt.

As the money actually paid to Banks by Dade, and by Buck on Dade's order, did not amount to a full satisfaction of the judgments on account of which those payments were made, the execution ought not to have been quashed, although it would have been entirely proper, if such motion had been submitted, for the Court to have entered a satisfaction of the judgments to the extent of those payments.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

1. The law respecting an appeal by the plaintiff, or demandant, does not apply to a Writ of Error, or Supersedeas, and therefore the penalty of the bond was properly directed by the Judge on awarding the Writ of Supersedeas in this case.

2. The law did not authorise the County Court to quash the execution on the evidence before it.

3. The Superior Court of Law ought to reverse the judgment of the County Court, and proceeding to give such judgment as the County Court ought to have rendered, to adjudge that the plaintiff below take nothing by his motion, &c.

The Commonwealth v. Horace Rutherford.

November, 1826.

Felony—Application for Release of Bail—Evidence.—

When a prisoner, who has been remanded for trial by the Examining Court to the Superior Court, on a charge of Felony, and against whom a Bill of Indictment has been found by the Grand Jury, applies to the Superior Court to be let to bail, on the ground that there is only a slight suspicion of guilt against him, that judgment, and the finding of the bill, are not conclusive evidence against the application, but the Court may examine other evidence.

Same—Same—Discretion of Court.—But it is a question for the exercise of the sound discretion of the Court, and if the Court is satisfied that there is material evidence for the Commonwealth that is not before the Court, was not before the Examining Court, or spread on the record, the Court ought not to sustain the motion.

The prisoner was indicted at the Superior Court of Louisa for stealing a grey horse, the property of Elihu Terrell, at the October term, 1826. He pleaded not guilty, and pressed for a trial; but, in consequence of the absence of material witnesses, the Attorney for the Commonwealth 647 *applied for and obtained a continuance of the cause till the ensuing term. The prisoner then applied to the Court to bail him, on the ground, "that at most there was but a slight suspicion of guilt attached to him by the evidence respecting the supposed felony in the indictment mentioned; and to support his motion, desired that the evidence of the witnesses then present should be heard in open Court, or that the testimony as stated in the record of the Examining Court, together with the affidavit of Peter Johnson, who was also examined in the said Court, should be considered by the Court." And he exhibited a copy of the record and depositions of the witnesses in the Examining Court, which it is deemed unnecessary to insert here.

The Superior Court considering, that in this state of the prosecution, it was improper, either to examine the witnesses viva voce, or to consider the written evidence aforesaid, adjourned to the General Court the following questions: First, Should a Judge of the Superior Court of Law, in any case like the present, or in this case, examine witnesses as to the probable guilt, or innocence of the prisoner, and refuse bail, or let to bail accordingly, as he might think there was light, or strong suspicion of guilt? Secondly, Should the Judge examine the evidence contained in the record of the proceedings, before the Examining Court, and refuse bail, or let to bail as such evidence should satisfy his mind, that the suspicion of the prisoner's guilt was light or strong? Thirdly, Is the judgment of the Examining Court, and the finding of the Grand Jury, conclusive of the probable guilt of the prisoner, so as to exclude the examination of testimony by the Judge as to the question of probable guilt, or innocence, upon a motion to be let to bail?

(After stating the case.) In proper order of time, it would seem right to examine, and decide the third question
648 first. Because, if it be true that the judgment of the Examining Court, and finding of the Grand Jury, are conclusive of the question of slight suspicion of guilt, or not, so as absolutely to exclude bail, then the two former questions, which involve mere considerations of discretion, and expediency, could never arise. The Statutes of England, and our own Acts of Assembly,† restraining the letting to bail in certain cases before conviction, have never been construed to extend to the Superior Courts of Law, or to the Judges thereof.* Before conviction, then, in every case, of the imprisonment of a citizen, the Superior Courts and Judges may enquire into the cause of confinement, and let to bail, if under the circumstances it seems right to do so. This general proposition repels the idea that the Court or Judge is concluded by the judgment of any inferior authority. But, without the aid of this general principle, the point is clear upon the Statute regulating criminal proceedings against free persons. 1 Rev. Code, p. 599, sec. 3, by which it is declared, that "any Judge of the General Court, when it is not sitting, may admit to bail a prisoner, when he shall think him or her entitled thereto, and grant a warrant for his deliverance, notwithstanding the Justices, before whom the examination was, shall have been of a different opinion." This act, in direct terms, extinguishes the notion of conclusiveness in the judgment of the Examining Court. And it would seem strange indeed, that while the Legislature should deny this influence to the judgment of a Court hearing the testimony on both sides, and acting directly on the question, on a motion to be let to bail, the Superior Court should attribute more weight to the voice of a tribunal, (the Grand Jury,) which hears nothing but the testimony in support of the accusa-

*3 Edw. 1. ch. 15: 34 Edw. 3. ch. 1: 23 Hen. 6. ch. 10: 1 Rich. 3. ch. 3: 3 Hen. 7. ch. 3: 1 and 2 Ph. & M. ch. 18, and 2 and 3 P. & M. ch. 10.

649 tion. *We therefore think, that the judgment of the Examining Court, and finding of the Grand Jury, did not conclude the Judge of the Superior Court from entering into the enquiry, whether there was but a light suspicion of guilt against the prisoner.

The two other questions admit but of a single answer. From what has been before said, it follows, that the Judge had the power to bail in this case, and of course that he might have heard evidence, either written or parol, in support of the motion. But, it was a matter in his sound legal discretion; and if it is intended to be referred to this Court, how, under the circumstances of this case, that discretion should have been exercised, then we say, we think he ought to have refused to entertain the motion. The power to let to bail, implies the power to hear all legal testimony which may influence the decision of the motion. Therefore, on a petition from one in confinement, under the judgment of an Examining Court, the Judge may hear testimony other than the depositions taken on the prisoner's examination. And there may be a state of things, which would justify, and require such proceeding. In general, it would be wrong to go out of the depositions, because ordinarily in such case, the examination would be ex parte. There is certainly nothing in the statute, or in sound legal construction, which, upon a motion to let to bail in such a case, limits the investigation of the facts to the depositions taken in the Examining Court. If the whole testimony should not have been before the Examining Court, or if the notes of the testimony should be imperfect, or inaccurate, (all of which sometimes happens,) it would be hard to conclude a prisoner thereby, and deny him the right to enlarge, contradict, or explain these depositions in a case in which it might happen that the whole testimony on both sides was within the reach of the Judge; and the principle is the same in regard to the Commonwealth. It is true, such a case will not often occur, but if one such might happen, it negatives the rule of confining

650 *the investigation of the facts to the depositions taken in the Examining Court. The leading objection to the examination of other testimony than that appearing on the record, is, that generally such examination would be ex parte. And for this same reason, we think that the Judge of the Superior Court of Law for the county of Louisa should have refused to enter into the examination of the testimony, either written or parol, which was offered when the motion to let to bail was made in this case. The trial had been already continued on the motion of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, because of the absence of material witnesses. The examination, either upon the depositions, or parol testimony, must then necessarily have been ex parte, and injurious to the Commonwealth, unless we are to presume that the absent witnesses had been examined in the Called Court. But, whatever latitude may be allowable to a jury, or other tribunal examining a matter of fact, to draw any probable inferences, we apprehend that legal presumptions must be necessary, and not barely probable deductions, and we cannot perceive how it must necessarily be presumed that the absent witnesses had been before the Examining Court. The Courts, and officers of the law, are indeed legally presumed to do their duty. But, it cannot be alleged as a breach of duty of the Examining Court, not to have had all the testimony in the cause before them, because they have nothing to do with the preparation of testimony. Nor is it strictly the duty of the Attorney for the Commonwealth to collect the witnesses; his duties in relation to this matter, commence in Court. In truth, the practice is for the Committing Magistrate to recognize such of the witnesses as may be before him, when the mittimus is made out, and for the Attorney for the Commonwealth, or any one else, who may take an interest in the subject, to order subpoenas for witnesses, who may be suggested as knowing something of the affair. And after all, the examination is often very imperfect before the called Court, and nothing is 651 *more common than that important testimony is discovered on either side, after the Examining Court has fulfilled its duties.

Upon the whole, therefore, we conclude, that whenever the motion to be let to bail is made upon the ground, that there is but a light suspicion of guilt against the prisoner, which of course induces an examination and weighing of the whole testimony in the case, the Court or Judge ought not to entertain the motion, when it is apparent that the Commonwealth is unavoidably deprived of some testimony, important in the decision of that question.

*4 Co. Inst. p. 71; 2 Co. Inst. p. 186; 2 Hale's H. P. C. 129.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

The Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the judgment of the Examining Court, and finding of the Grand Jury, were not conclusive of the probable guilt of the prisoner, so as to exclude the examination of testimony by the Judge, as to the question of probable guilt, or innocence, on the prisoner's motion to be let to bail. But, this Court is further of opinion, and doth decide, that under the particular circumstances of this case, the Court ought not to have gone into the examination of witnesses, or the depositions taken in the Examining Court, for the purpose of ascertaining the degree of suspicion of the prisoner's guilt, but ought to have rejected the motion to be let to bail on that ground. Which is ordered to be certified, &c.

652 *The Commonwealth v. William H. Garland and Others.

November, 1826.

Gaming.—What Constitutes*—Case at Bar.—Taking a chance in a raffle, at twenty dollars, or any less sum, although the property raffled for exceeds that sum, (the raffling being at a private house) does not bring the person within the operation of the gaming act.

Same—Same—Same.*—The winner of the thing raffled for (it exceeding $20.) does come within the operation of the law, although neither of the losers (the loss of each being less than $20.) comes within it.

Same—Same—Same.*—If the prize is won by two or more individuals in partnership, but the share of the gain of each is less than $20, neither of them is embraced by the law.

Same—Statute—Construction.*—The taking a chance in a raffle is not the same offence as the purchase of a foreign lottery ticket, and is, therefore, not liable to the penalty prescribed for the latter offence, by the latter part of the 27th section of the gaming act.

The Grand Jury for the Superior Court of Albemarle, made sundry presentments against individuals under the gaming act. The first was against William H. Garland, "for putting up a watch to be unlawfully raffled for, to raise for himself the sum of twenty-five dollars." The second against Charles E. Harrison, "for unlawful gaming, by taking a chance at two dollars in a raffle, and raffling for a watch put up by William H. Garland, to raise for himself the sum of twenty-five dollars, the value of the watch so put up to be raffled for." The third against Charles Downing, "for unlawful gaming, by putting up two horses to be raffled for, to raise for himself the sum of two hundred dollars, at his own house, &c." The fourth against Lyman Peck, "for unlawful gaming, by taking a chance at twenty dollars, in a raffle, and raffling for two horses, put up by Charles Downing, at the price of two hundred dollars, at the house of Charles Downing, &c." The fifth against Charles Downing, "for unlawfully putting up a raffle, to be played for at cards, a parcel of books, of the amount of eighty dollars, and having the same played for at cards, to raise for himself the sum of eighty dollars, at his own house, &c." The sixth against William F. Gordon, "for unlawful gaming with cards, and winning *a parcel of books, of the value of eighty dollars, within twenty four hours, at the house of Charles Downing, &c. said books having been unlawfully put up in a raffle by said Downing, to be played for with cards, to raise for him the sum of eighty dollars, &c." The seventh was against William H. Jones, for putting up a raffle of pictures of the value of eighty dollars, and was of the same description as the fifth. The eighth was against Ebenezer Zane, for taking a chance at three dollars, in the last raffle, and is like the second.

The Superior Court being doubtful whether a portion of the cases thus presented, if established by proof, be punishable by the laws made for the prohibition of unlawful gaming, adjourned the following points to this Court for its decision.

"1. Does the individual who takes a chance in a raffle, at twenty dollars a chance, or any smaller sum, where the property raffled for, exceeds twenty dollars in value, and the raffling takes place in a private house, come within the 'act, to reduce into one the several acts, or parts of acts, to prevent unlawful gaming?'"

"2. Does the individual who takes a chance as aforesaid, and who raffles as aforesaid, and wins the thing raffled for, come within the meaning of the said law?"

"3. Where the whole value of the thing raffled for exceeds $20, but the prize is won by two individuals in the raffle in partnership, and the value to each when divided does not amount to twenty dollars, do both come within the operation of the said law, or without?"

"4. As lotteries and raffles, are both games of chance, and of similar character, prohibited by the Legislature in the same clause of the gaming law, and as by an amendment to that clause, the vendor, or purchaser of a lottery ticket, is subjected to a penalty (viz: $100,) and as by the 29th section of the same law, the Courts are directed to construe the several laws made for the prevention of unlawful gaming, as remedial statutes, and as the purchase of *a chance in a raffle comes within the evil intended to be remedied by the said amendment, can the individual who takes a chance in a raffle, be considered as embraced by the said amendment?"

The General Court, after conferring on the subject, entered the following judgment.

The Court is of opinion, and doth decide:

1. That the class of cases embraced by the first question adjourned to this Court, does not come within the "act to reduce into one the several acts, or parts of acts, made to prevent unlawful gaming."

2. That the class of cases mentioned in the second question, does come within the meaning of the law.

3. That the third class of cases does not come within the operation of the law.

4. That an individual who takes a chance in a raffle, cannot be considered as embraced in the amendment referred to in the fourth question.

Which is ordered to be certified, &c.

Note by BROCKENBROUGH, J. The reasons for the above opinion were not assigned by any member of the Court, but they are believed to be as follows. The 27th section of the act prohibits raffling as an unlawful game. The sixth section declares, that if any person, by playing or betting at any game, or wager whatsoever, at any time within the space of twenty-four hours, shall lose, or win to, or from another, a greater sum, or any thing of greater value than $20, the loser and winner shall be liable to pay one-half of the entire sum above the said sum of twenty dollars, which he shall so win, or lose, upon information, &c., to the use of the Commonwealth, &c. The first class of cases, mentioned by the Court, supposes that the individual stakes twenty dollars only, or less, upon the game: he cannot lose more than twenty dollars, and the case does not suppose that he wins the thing raffled for, but is unsuccessful. He does not, therefore, come within the law. So, as to the third class of cases; neither individual wins as much as twenty dollars, and therefore, does not come within the act.

As to the second class of cases, it is different. The prize is of greater value than twenty dollars, and is won by the defendant. But it is objected, that he does not win from another, but from sundry persons the thing raffled for, and as they do not lose more than $20 each, and therefore, do not come within the law, so neither does the winner. To this it was answered, that although such might be the grammatical, and literal meaning of the clause, it was not the proper construction. This law is to be construed, according to its own provisions, as a remedial law; in other words, so as to advance the remedy, and suppress the mischief. The object of the law is to prevent high gaming, and if an individual wins more than the prescribed sum, his offence is the same, whether he wins it from one, or from several.

As to the fourth class of cases, it does not come within the law, because although raffles and lotteries are similar, yet they are not the same.

Criminal Law—New Trial—Preconceived Opinion of Juror.—An hypothetical declaration (made by a juror before he was impanelled) that "if he (the prisoner) killed the man, he ought to be hanged," is not a sufficient ground on which to grant a new trial: such declaration not being an opinion as to the prisoner's guilt.

*Criminal Law—New Trial—Incompetency of Juror.

In State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 824, it is said: "In Virginia and this state it has been repeatedly held, that a new trial will be granted in a criminal case for matter that is a principal cause of challenge to a juror, which existed before he was elected and sworn as such juror, but which was unknown to the prisoner until after the verdict, and which could not have been discovered before the juror was so sworn by the exercise of ordinary diligence; unless it appears that the prisoner suffered injustice from the fact that such juror served upon the case. Smith's Case, 2 Va. This was an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Halifax. The prisoner was indicted for the murder of Thomas Boyd, and was convicted by the jury of murder in the second degree. On the last day of the Court, he moved the Court to grant him a new trial, on the following facts and statement. On impanelling the jury in this case, Anderson H. Trabue, one of the jury who tried the prisoner, was called and sworn to answer such questions as might be asked him, in order that it might be ascertained whether he was a proper juror, or not; and in answer to questions put to him, stated, that he had not made up, and expressed an opinion upon the guilt, or innocence of the prisoner. After the verdict was rendered, the prisoner introduced James Watson, who being first sworn, stated, that shortly after the alleged murder was committed, he heard the said Trabue say, in conversation in relation to the prisoner, "Damn his (meaning the prisoner) soul; if he took his knife and killed the man, he ought to be hanged without Judge or Jury." Also, Randolph Hambrick, who being also sworn, stated, that he and the said Trabue were conversing about the prisoner's case some short time after the prisoner was committed; and in that conversation, the said Trabue stated to him, that "if he (the prisoner) did kill the man, he ought to be hanged." Both of the above witnesses are men of good character. The above statement having been made, and the Court not having time to give to the prisoner's motion the smallest consideration, by consent of the prisoner, the question whether the Court ought to grant a new trial upon the facts and statement, was adjourned to the General Court, for their opinion and advice.

BOULDIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

Not deciding whether the cause stated be one, on account of which the Superior Court could regularly adjourn a case here for decision, it is the opinion of this Court, that the declaration of the juror was not the expression of an opinion relative to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, but from the words used by him, was a reply to some loose and general statement, of the accuracy of which he had probably not reflected. A new trial ought not to have been granted to the prisoner on such ground.

June, 1827.

Unlawful Marriage—Conviction of—Judgment.—Qu. If a husband be prosecuted and convicted of an unlawful marriage, and the wife is not prosecuted, can a judgment of separation be pronounced on the verdict?

*For monographic note on Statutes, see end of case.

Penal Statutes—Repeal—Effect on Offences Already Committed.—The repeal of a law, prescribing a punishment for an offence, without a proviso, that offences committed before the operation of the new law, shall be punished under the old, excuses offenders under the repealed law. This is again decided, after repeated adjudications to the same effect.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. stated the case, and delivered the opinion of the Court.

An Information was filed (founded on a previous presentment of a Grand Jury) by the Attorney for the Commonwealth, in the Superior Court of Law for the County of Bedford, in April, 1822, against the defendant, charging him with having intermarried with Hulda Hackworth, the sister of Polly Hackworth, his deceased wife, contrary to law. 1 Revised Code, p. 399, sec. 17. The case came on for trial in September, 1823, and the defendant was convicted by the jury. No process was taken out against the female, nor was she in any manner before the Court. The defendant Leftwich moved the Court to arrest the judgment on the ground, that according to the act of Assembly, the judgment of the Court upon the verdict of the jury is a judgment of separation, by which Hulda Hackworth, who was not before the Court, and who had not had the benefit of a trial by jury, would be affected. The Court thereupon adjourned to this Court the question, whether the Court should proceed to render judgment against the defendant in this case, and what judgment?

It has now become unnecessary to decide the question propounded by the Circuit Court; because, by the act of the last session of the General Assembly, ch. 22, the punishment for a man's marrying his deceased wife's sister, is changed. Instead of the separation of the parties, as provided by the former law, it is now enacted, that the parties shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the jury; and all acts and parts of acts coming within the purview of the act, are repealed; nor is there any proviso, that offences under the former law shall still be punished under it. The consequence is, that according to the uniform decisions of this Court,† all offenders under the former law, so far as they were guilty of forming this connection, (that is, of the man's marrying the deceased wife's sister,) are excused from all punishment whatever.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

This Court is unanimously of opinion, and doth decide, that by virtue of the act passed March 2, 1827, entitled, "an act to alter and amend the act, entitled, 'an act to reduce into one, the several acts to regulate the solemnization of marriages;' prohibiting such as are incestuous, or otherwise unlawful; to prevent forcible and stolen marriages, and for the punishment of the crime of bigamy," whereby the punishment prescribed for the offence of a man's marrying his deceased wife's sister by former laws, is changed, and all former acts coming within the purview of the said act, are repealed, there is now no law in force, by which the said Augustine Leftwich can be punished; and that, therefore, no judgment can now be rendered against the defendant in this case; which is ordered to be certified.

I. OBJECT AND SUBJECT.

The "object" of an act is the aim or purpose of the enactment, while the "subject" is the matter to which it relates, and with which it deals. McNeeley v. South Penn Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 616, 44 S. E. Rep. 508.

II. CLASSIFICATION.

A. IN RESPECT TO NATURE AND OBJECT.

1. DECLARATORY.—A declaratory statute is one which is passed in affirmation of a former law. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 148; Bouviere Law Dict. (Rawles Rev., vol. 1) 520.

a. Affirmative.—An affirmative statute is one enacted in affirmative terms. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 148.

b. Negative.—A negative statute is one expressed in negative terms, and which repeals other laws with which it conflicts. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 144; Bouviere Law Dict. (Rawles Rev., vol. 2) 478.

2. REMEDIAL.—A remedial statute is one made to supply some defects or abridge some superfluities of the common law. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 144; Bouviere Law Dict. (Rawles Rev., vol. 2) 870.

3. PENAL.—A penal statute is one that imposes a forfeiture or penalty for transgression of its provisions, or for doing a thing prohibited. Hall v. N. & W. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 36, 28 S. E. Rep. 754.

B. IN RESPECT TO SUBJECT MATTER.

1. PUBLIC.—A public act is one which effects the public, either generally or in some class. Hart v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336.

2. PRIVATE.—A private law is one which does not concern the public at large. Hart v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336; Groves v. Grant County Court, 42 W. Va. 587, 26 S. E. Rep. 460; McEldowney v. Wyatt, 44 W. Va. 711, 30 S. E. Rep. 239.

Relocation of County Seat.—So much of ch. 31 of the Acts of 1895 as provides for the relocation of county seats by a majority vote in cases where the county seat of any county in this state has, since the 1st day of January, 1872, been relocated by a special act of the legislature, is a special law, and as such is prohibited by § 89, art. 6 of the Constitution. Groves v. Grant County Court, 42 W. Va. 587, 26 S. E. Rep. 460.

3. GENERAL.—A statute relating to persons or things as a class is a general law. McEldowney v. Wyatt, 44 W. Va. 711, 30 S. E. Rep. 239; Groves v. Grant County Court, 42 W. Va. 587, 26 S. E. Rep. 460.

4. LOCAL.—A local statute is one which operates in a limited sphere, as a city or county. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 152; Bouviere Law Dict. (Rawles Rev., vol. 2) 1032.

C. IN RESPECT TO COMPLIANCE REQUIRED.

1. MANDATORY.—A statute is mandatory when its provisions are the essence of the thing required to be done. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 153; Bouviere Law Dict. (Rawles Rev., vol. 2) 1033.

2. DIRECTORY.—As a general rule, where a statute directs certain proceedings to be done in a certain way, and the form does not appear essential to the judicial mind, the law will be regarded as directory, and the proceedings under it will be held valid, though the command of the statute as to form has not been strictly obeyed, the manner not being the essence of the thing to be done. Calwell v. Prindle, 19 W. Va. 608.

Failure to State Name of Witness on Indictment, Directory, Not Fatal.—A statute requiring the name of the witness, on whose evidence the indictment was found, to be stated at the foot of the indictment is directory, and the omission to so state the name is not fatal to the indictment. State v. Enoch, 26 W. Va. 254.

D. IN RESPECT TO TIME OF TAKING EFFECT.

1. PROSPECTIVE.—A law is said to be prospective when it is applicable only to cases which arise after its enactment. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 154.

2. RETROSPECTIVE.—A retrospective statute is one which applies to existing cases, as those which destroy or impair vested rights, create new obligations, impose new duties, or attach new disabilities in regard to transactions already passed. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 155.

a. Touching Civil Remedies.—The right to a particular remedy is not a vested right, and retrospective laws touching civil remedies is valid. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1006.

Within Province of Legislature.—Any rule or regulation with regard to the remedy which does not, under pretense of modifying or regulating it, take away or repair the right itself, cannot be regarded as beyond the province of the legislature. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1006.

b. Touching Civil Rights.—No statute, however positive is to be construed as designed to interfere with existing contracts, rights of action, or suits, and especially vested rights, unless the intention that it shall so operate is expressly declared; and the courts will apply new statutes only to future cases unless there is something in the very nature of the case or in the language of the new revision which shows they were intended to have a retroactive operation. Rogers v. Lynch, 44 W. Va. 94, 29 S. E. Rep. 507.

c. Touching Crimes.

(1) Ex Post Facto Laws.—Ex post facto laws relate to crimes and punishment, and not to civil proceedings, which affect private rights. Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1; Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 663, 10 S. E. Rep. 1005.

(a) Definition.—An ex post facto law within the meaning of the United States constitution is one which makes an act done before the passing of the law, which was innocent when done, criminal; or makes a crime greater than when committed; or inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed; or alters the legal rules of evidence, and requires less or a different testimony than the law required at the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 663, 10 S. E. Rep. 1006; Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1.

(b) Prohibited.—The constitutional provision forbidding ex post facto laws, relates to crimes and punishments, and not to criminal proceedings. Perry v. Com., 3 Gratt. 682.

III. ENACTMENT.

A. THE LEGISLATURE.

1. CO-ORDINATE BRANCH OF GOVERNMENT.—The legislature is a co-ordinate branch of the government, whose exclusive province is to make laws. Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 562.

2. EXTRA SESSIONS.—Where the constitution provides that the governor may call an extra session of the legislature, but when so convened it shall enter upon no business except that stated in the proclamation by which it was called together, under which authority the governor calls an extra session for the purpose, among other things, of "protecting the public treasury against unnecessary expenditures by regulating the cost charges, and proceedings in criminal cases before justices of the peace and circuit courts," and a bill was enacted allowing the accused to strike off six jurors and the prosecuting attorney two, was held to be constitutional. State v. Shores, 81 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 418.

3. POWERS AND LIMITATIONS.—The legislative power in a state possesses the absolute and uncontrolled power of legislation, except, first, as it may be limited by the constitution of the United States, and second, as it has been clearly limited by the constitution of the state. It possesses all the legislative power which the people themselves could confer, except so far as it is clearly restricted by constitutional provisions, or a declaration of rights, or both. Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 574; Prison Association of Va. v. Ashby, 93 Va. 637, 25 S. E. Rep. 893.

a. To Delegate Authority.—The legislature has authority to delegate the performance of many duties which it may provide for by law to other officers. Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 562.

And it may delegate its authority to other bodies for the purpose of taxation for specified objects. Bull v. Read, 13 Gratt. 78.

b. To Make New Counties.—Not only does the power of making new counties belong to legislature, but to no other department of the government. Lusher v. Scites, 4 W. Va. 11.

c. Provisions of Constitution Must Be Followed.—It is necessary that a bill be passed according to the constitutional requirements, in regard to the members of each house, in order to be valid. Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85; Boyers v. Crane, 1 W. Va. 178.

d. Presumption as to Requirements.—The presumption is that constitutional requirements have been followed and the omission of matters not required to be entered therein will not effect the validity of a statute. Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269; Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85.

Requires Consent of Both Branches.—Every resolution requires the consent of both branches of the general assembly before it can become a law. Field v. Auditor, 83 Va. 882, 3 S. E. Rep. 707.

4. RULES—PAIRS—LEAVE OF ABSENCE.—Each house of the general assembly is vested with the power of making rules for its own government, and necessarily the power to grant members leave of absence, excuse them from voting when proper, and recognize what are called pairs. Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269.

5. PASSAGE.—The constitution of West Virginia provides that no act shall take effect, except the ones passed at the first session under this constitution, until the expiration of ninety days after its passage, unless the legislature, etc., and the word "passage" in this connection was construed to mean from the passage by both houses of the legislature, and not from the approval by the governor. State v. Mounts, 86 W. Va. 179, 14 S. E. Rep. 407.

Resolutions.—A resolution passed by one branch, only, of the general assembly, authorizing the governor to employ counsel to consider a claim against the state, confers no authority on him to bind the state. Field v. Auditor, 83 Va. 882, 3 S. E. Rep. 707.

a. Yeas and Nays on Final Passage.—Where the constitution requires the yeas and nays on the final passage of a bill, and that they shall be entered on the journal, a conformity to such requirement is necessary in order that the bill should be valid. Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85.

6. POWER OF RECALL BY LEGISLATURE.—When a bill is once before the governor it is beyond the control of the general assembly. Wolfe v. McCaull, 76 Va. 889.

7. EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS.—The governor has no legislative functions to perform, and while his approval of a bill passed by the legislature gives vitality to the law, yet the legislature may pass the law over his veto, which amounts to nothing more than an appeal for a reconsideration of a bill. State v. Mounts, 86 W. Va. 179, 14 S. E. Rep. 407.

And a bill passed by both houses of the general assembly, and presented to the governor, who at the request of the legislature, by a joint resolution, returns it to the legislature without his veto and objections, is not a good law; the legislature having no right to recall the bill, nor the governor to return it without his objections. Wolfe v. McCaull, 76 Va. 889.

8. LEGISLATIVE JOURNAL.

a. In General.—For a court to inquire into or dispute the veracity of the journals kept by the two branches of the legislature would be to violate both the letter and the spirit of the constitution, to invade a co-ordinate and independent department of the government and to interfere with separate and legitimate power and functions of the legislature. Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269.

And a mere clerical omission in the journal of either house will not vitiate an act of the legislature, if there is sufficient on the face of the journal to show substantial compliance with constitutional requirements. Price v. City of Moundsville, 48 W. Va. 523, 27 S. E. Rep. 218.

Evidence as to Requirements.—Where the constitution requires each branch of the legislature to keep a journal, and that on the passage of every bill the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays and be entered in the journal, and that no bill shall be passed by either branch without an affirmative vote of all members elected thereto, the courts can look to the journal to ascertain if the bill was passed by the required number of votes. Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85.

b. Conclusiveness.—The evidence furnished in the journal proceedings of the senate import an absolute verity and cannot be disputed by the courts. Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269.

9. THE ENROLLED BILL.

a. Prima Facie Validity.—A bill duly enrolled, authenticated and approved is presumed to have been passed by the legislature in conformity with the requirements of the constitution, unless the contrary is made to affirmatively appear. Price v. City of Moundsville, 43 W. Va. 523, 27 S. E. Rep. 218.

b. Evidence to Impeach.

Parol Evidence.—The testimony of the draftsman of the amendatory act, showing that the omission of words was inadvertent is not admissible, being forbidden by law, reason and public policy. Combined Saw, etc., Co. v. Flournoy, 88 Va. 1090, 14 S. E. Rep. 976. See Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269.

c. Conflict between Enrolled Bill and Published Act.—In the case of conflict between the enrolled bill and the published act, the enrolled bill is the best and controlling evidence of the legislative intent. Johnson v. Barham, 99 Va. 305, 38 S. E. Rep. 136.

IV. TIME OF TAKING EFFECT.

A. FROM A FUTURE DAY.—The legislature may provide that an act shall not take effect until some future day. Bull v. Read, 13 Gratt. 78.

1. DAY OF PASSAGE EXCLUDED.—The day of passage is excluded in considering when a statute will take effect. The King v. Moore, Jeff. 8.

2. DAY OF PASSAGE OR DAY OF TAKING EFFECT MAY BE EXCLUDED.—In computing the ninety days required by art. 6, § 80 of the West Virginia Constitution, it is immaterial whether we count the day of the passage, and reject the ninetieth day, or whether we include the ninetieth and exclude the day of the passage of the act. An act passed on the 27th day of Feb., 1891, will under the constitutional provisions, take effect on the 28th day of May, 1891. State v. Mounts, 86 W. Va. 179, 14 S. E. Rep. 407.

3. WHEN DAY FALLS ON SUNDAY—APPLICABLE TO CRIMINAL CASES.—The statute—Code, ch. 13, § 12, which declares that, the time within which an act is to be done shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last; or, if the last be Sunday, it shall also be excluded, applies to the construction of statutes in criminal as well as civil cases. State v. Beasley, 21 W. Va. 778.

B. UPON A CONTINGENCY.—The legislature may provide that an act shall not take effect until the happening of some particular event, or upon some contingency thereafter to arise, or upon the performance of some specified condition. Bull v. Read, 13 Gratt. 78.

C. PROOF AS TO TIME OF TAKING EFFECT.—Whenever a question arises in a court of law, as to the existence, time of taking effect, or of the precise terms of a statute, the court in the absence of any positive law to the contrary has a right to resort to any information, which from its nature is capable of conveying to the judicial mind a clear and satisfactory answer. Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 92.

D. ACTS UNDER STATUTE BEFORE TAKING EFFECT VOID.—Where by an act of the general assembly a vote was to be taken on the fourth Thursday of May, 1866, before the proclamation of the president of the United States, declaring that the insurrection was at an end, and that peace and tranquillity reigned throughout the whole of the country, (issued on the 20th day of August, 1866) such a vote is a nullity, being taken before the act had validity. Conley v. Supervisors, 2 W. Va. 416.

V. VALIDITY AND EFFECT.

Whenever the legislature is expressly prohibited by the constitution from doing any particular act, and it clearly appears that the same has been done in violation of such prohibition, it is the duty of the courts upon a proper case presented before them, to declare such act null and void. Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 575.

Invalidity Must Be Clear.—The courts should sustain legislative action when not clearly satisfied of its invalidity; and unless it clearly appears that it is contrariant to the constitution then there is reasonable doubt of its invalidity, and it should be sustained and enforced. Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 574; Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1; Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85; South Morgantown v. City of Morgantown (W. Va.), 40 S. E. Rep. 15.

A. STATUTES VOID IN PART.—A law may be good in part and unconstitutional in part and the valid part remains in force. Lacey v. Palmer, 93 Va. 159, 24 S. E. Rep. 930.

1. WHERE VALID PART DEPENDENT ON VOID PART.—Where a statute is valid in part, and the valid part is so connected with and dependent on that which is void, so that the parts are not distinctly separable, the whole must fall. Black v. Trower, 79 Va. 123; The Homestead Cases, 23 Gratt. 266.

2. WHERE THE PARTS ARE SEPARABLE.—When any part of a statute is indicated by the title, and such part is capable of being separated from the part not so indicated, and is left complete in its self, and capable of being executed as the will of the legislature, the part so indicated is valid. Board of Supervisors v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 6 S. E. Rep. 232.

VI. TITLES AND SUBJECTS UNDER CONSTITUTION.

A. CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.—The constitutional provision, that "no act shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title," is not merely directory, but mandatory. Board of Supervisors of Henrico Co. v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 6 S. E. Rep. 232.

Provisions Merely Directory.—Where the constitution provides that an act shall not embrace more than one object,—such provisions are merely directory,—and that, though an act embraces several objects, if any or all of them be expressed in the title, the act, otherwise properly passed shall be valid as to the object expressed. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74. Contra, see preceding paragraph.

a. Objects of Provisions.—First, to prevent log-rolling legislation.

Second, to prevent surprise or fraud upon the legislature by means of provisions in bills of which the title gives no intimation, and which may therefore be overlooked and carelessly and unintentionally adopted.

Third, to fairly apprise the people of the subjects of legislation that are being considered in order that they may be heard by petition or otherwise. Board of Supervisors of Henrico Co. v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 6 S. E. Rep. 232; Cooley's Const. Lim., 149; Powell v. Supervisors, 88 Va. 707, 14 S. E. Rep. 543.

b. How Failure to Comply Determined.—The question whether the object of an act is expressed in the title, is determined by a comparison of the act and title and is not influenced by any former law which the later act, if valid, expressly or by implication, repeals. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 80.

Effect of Failure to Comply.—Where the title of an act is so framed as to include only certain matters, other legislation beyond the matters named is inoperative. Supervisors of Alexandria Co. v. City Council of Alexandria, 96 Va. 469, 28 S. E. Rep. 882; Lacey v. Palmer, 93 Va. 159, 24 S. E. Rep. 930.

B. STATUTE BROADER THAN TITLE.—When any part of the act is indicated by the title, and such part is capable of being separated from the part not so indicated, and is left complete in itself, and capable of being executed as the will of the legislature, the part so indicated is valid. Board of Supervisors v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 6 S. E. Rep. 232; Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74.

C. GENERAL RULES.

1. WHERE TITLE AFFORDS NO CLUE WHATEVER.—Where the title affords no clue whatever to the contents, the statute is wholly inoperative and void. Board of Supervisors v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 6 S. E. Rep. 232.

2. MATTERS IN FURTHERANCE OF OBJECT.—Although an act or statute authorizes many things of a diverse nature to be done, the title will be sufficient if the things authorized may be fairly regarded as in furtherance of the object expressed in the title. Com. v. Brown, 91 Va. 772, 21 S. E. Rep. 357; Ingles v. Straus, 91 Va. 217, 21 S. E. Rep. 490; Prison Asso. of Va. v. Ashby, 98 Va. 667, 25 S. E. Rep. 893.

3. INCIDENTAL OR AUXILIARY OBJECTS.—When a principal object of an act of the legislature is expressed in the title, and the act embraces along with such principal object, other incidental or auxiliary objects, germane to the principal object, the act is not repugnant to § 80, art. 6 of the Constitution of West Virginia. State v. Mines, 88 W. Va. 126, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; State v. Brookover, 88 W. Va. 141, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

4. TITLE NEED NOT BE AN INDEX.—The title of an act need not be a detail or index of the contents of the act, but it must reasonably and fairly indicate its object and subject. State v. Mines, 88 W. Va. 126, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; McNeeley v. South Penn. Oil Co., 63 W. Va. 616, 44 S. E. Rep. 608; McEldowney v. Wyatt, 44 W. Va. 711, 30 S. E. Rep. 239.

5. MATTERS COGNATE OR GERMANE.—If the subjects embraced in the statute, but not specified in the title, have congruity or natural connection with the subject stated in the title, or are cognate or germane thereto, the requirement of the constitution, as to title is satisfied. Ingles v. Straus, 91 Va. 216, 21 S. E. Rep. 490; Lacey v. Palmer, 98 Va. 150, 24 S. E. Rep. 930; Prison Asso. of Va. v. Ashby, 98 Va. 667, 25 S. E. Rep. 893; Bosang v. Building Asso., 96 Va. 119, 30 S. E. Rep. 440.

6. MATTERS OF A PROPER OR NECESSARY CONNECTION.—The title of an act may embrace all matters which are not incongruous with each other, and which by fair intentment, can be considered as having a necessary or proper connection. C. & O. R. R. Co. v. Patton, 9 W. Va. 648.

7. GENERALITY OF TITLE.—The generality of a title is no objection to it, so long as it is not made a cover for legislation incongruous in itself, and which, by no fair intentment, can be considered as having a necessary or proper connection. Powell v. Supervisors, 88 Va. 707, 14 S. E. Rep. 543.

8. WHERE ORIGINAL TITLE IS SUFFICIENT.—If the original title of a bill is sufficient, the legislature does not vitiate the legislation by rendering such title more definite and specific during the progress of enactment, if the object of the bill is not thereby essentially changed. Price v. City of Moundsville, 48 W. Va. 523, 27 S. E. Rep. 218.

9. WHEN PRINCIPAL OBJECT IS EXPRESSED IN TITLE.—When the principal object of an act is expressed in the title, and the act embraces with such principal object, other auxiliary objects, the act if otherwise unobjectionable, is valid, not only as to the principal, but also as to the auxiliary objects. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74.

D. MISCELLANEOUS INSTANCES.

Resolutions Cannot Have Force of Law under Provision.—Where the constitution provides that the style of the acts shall be, "be it enacted by the legislature of West Virginia," the legislature cannot give a matter the force and effect of law by the passage of a joint resolution in relation thereto, when such matter is properly the subject of enactment. Boyers v. Crane, 1 W. Va. 176.

Removal of Seat of Government.—The title, "an act to remove the seat of the government temporarily to Wheeling," is sufficient to sustain a provision accepting the offer of certain citizens to effect, without cost to the government, such removal. Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.—An act entitled, "an act to incorporate the town of Iron Gate, Virginia," is not sufficient under art. 5, § 15 of the Constitution of Virginia, which declares that no law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, to sustain a provision in the act that the whole town shall be in Alleghany county, while in fact a portion of which is in Botetourt county, and thereby change the boundary lines of the two counties. Cahoon v. Iron Gate L. & I. Co., 92 Va. 307, 23 S. E. Rep. 767.

Municipal Corporation—Courts.—Chapter 47 of the Code, in relation to the incorporation of cities, towns and villages, in so far as it confers on the circuit court functions in their nature judicial and administrative, although in furtherance of the power of the legislative department of the state government, is constitutional and valid. Elder v. Central City, 40 W. Va. 223, 21 S. E. Rep. 738.

2. COUNTIES.

a. Location of County Seat.—An act entitled, "an act locating the county seat of Calhoun county," which embraced a provision, authorizing the board of supervisors to sell the county property, at Arnoldsburg, is repugnant to art. 4, § 38 of the Constitution, which provides that no law shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title. Cutlip v. Sheriff of Calhoun Co., 8 W. Va. 596.

b. Election to Remove County Seat.—An act entitled, "an act to authorize the qualified voters of Alexandria county to vote on the question of the removal of the courthouse from Alexandria city to some point within Alexandria county," is not sufficiently broad to sustain provisions in the act for the partition or sale of the courthouse and jail properties held for the use of the county and city, it being in conflict with art. 5, § 15 of the Constitution of Virginia which provides that no law shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title. Supervisors of Alexandria Co. v. City Council of Alexandria, 95 Va. 409, 28 S. E. Rep. 882.

Two Elections to Remove County Seat.—An act entitled, "an act to authorize and provide for a special election in the county of Pulaski as to the removal of the courthouse of said county," is sufficient, under art. 5, § 15 of the Constitution of Virginia to sustain a provision in the act for a second election, upon failure of the first to decide the issue. Ingles v. Straus, 91 Va. 209, 21 S. E. Rep. 490.

c. County Officers.

Sheriff and Commissioner.—An act treating of both the sheriff and commissioner, who having certain duties in common is not repugnant to the Constitution of Virginia, art. 4, § 16. Com. v. Drewry, 15 Gratt. 1.

Treasurer.—The title, "an act to allow further time for the treasurer of Henrico county to make returns of delinquent taxes," will not sustain a provision for the treasurer of Henrico county to make supplementary returns of delinquent taxes for the years, etc. Board of Supervisors of Henrico Co. v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 6 S. E. Rep. 232.

An Act Regulating Salary.—An act which defines what duties are to be performed by an officer, in consideration of a salary given to him by the act, and which imposes upon him duties therefore discharged by another officer, and provides that the latter shall no longer do the work or receive the compensation therefor, is sufficiently embraced within a title to "regulate the salary" of such officer. Trehy v. Marye, 100 Va. 40, 40 S. E. Rep. 136.

d. Railroad Companies.—The title, "an act to incorporate the Atlantic and Danville Narrow Gauge Railroad Company" will sustain a provision authorizing counties to aid by their subscriptions, in its construction. Powell v. Supervisors, 88 Va. 707, 14 S. E. Rep. 548.

Lien for Wages.—An act entitled, "an act to secure payment of wages and salaries of certain employees of railway and other transportation companies," is not sufficient to sustain a provision giving a lien on the property for cars, supplies and engines; being repugnant to § 15, art. 5 of the Virginia Constitution, which provides that no law shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title. Fidelity Insurance, etc., Co. v. Shenandoah, etc., R. Co., 86 Va. 1, 9 S. E. Rep. 769.

e. Navigation Companies.—An act entitled, "an act to incorporate the Little Kanawha Navigation Company," is sufficient to embrace a provision in the body of the act, allowing counties benefited thereby to subscribe to the stock. State v. Wirt County Ct., 87 W. Va. 808, 17 S. E. Rep. 879.

f. Building and Loan Association.—An act entitled, "an act to provide a new charter for the Iron Belt Building and Loan Association," is sufficient under art. 5, § 15 of the Virginia Constitution to sustain a provision in the act validating certain transactions previously made by the association, which were usurious when made. Bosang v. Building Association, 96 Va. 119, 30 S. E. Rep. 440.

g. Taxation.—The act approved March 5, 1900, entitled "an act to provide for the appointment of commissioners of valuation, and defining their duties," carries with it an appropriation of public money, and not having been passed by an "aye and no" vote, duly recorded as required by art. 10, § 11 of the Constitution, is null and void. The valid portion of the act cannot be separated from the invalid portion so as to give effect to the former, and hence the whole act is invalid. Lambert v. Smith, 98 Va. 268, 38 S. E. Sep. 988.

Sufficiency of Original Title.—An amendatory act which merely continues a tax, which has been imposed by a previous act, without stating the object to which the tax is to be applied, is not repugnant to § 16, art. 10 of the Constitution if the original act, which imposed the tax states the object to which it was to be applied. Com. v. Brown, 91 Va. 762, 21 S. E. Rep. 357.

To "Obtain Revenue" Sufficient.—The title of an act which imposes a tax sufficiently defines the object to which the tax is to be applied, within the meaning of § 16, art. 10 of the Constitution of Virginia, when it declares it to be to "obtain revenue." Com. v. Brown, 91 Va. 762, 21 S. E. Rep. 357.

Within the Constitutional Provisions.—Art. 10, § 19 of the Constitution provides that "every law which imposes, continues or revises a tax shall distinctly state the tax and the object to which it is to be applied, and it shall not be sufficient to refer to any other law to fix the tax or object." The act of March 8, 1898, (Acts 1897-8, p. 864.) provided that "the money collected for license taxes shall be paid over to the auditor of public accounts and accounted for in the general oyster fund of the state, but shall in nowise be considered a part thereof, or in any way used to defray the expenses of said oyster commission." Held, that act sufficiently stated the object for which the tax was imposed. Morgan v. Com., 96 Va. 812, 35 S. E. Rep. 448.

3. CORPORATIONS.

Unpaid Subscriptions.—An act entitled, "an act to prescribe a mode by which unpaid subscriptions to joint stock companies may be recovered by said companies, their receivers or assignees," does not authorize any legislation as to the mode by which creditors may recover such unpaid stock subscriptions. Martin v. South Salem Land Co., 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. Rep. 591.

Lien for Supplies Furnished.—Under a statute giving a lien to "all persons furnishing fuel and all other supplies necessary to the operation of any manufacturing company," it was held that pig iron was necessary to the operation of a rolling mill whose business it is to manufacture among other things, iron, steel and other metals. Va. Devel. Co. v. Crozer Iron Co., 90 Va. 126, 17 S. E. Rep. 806.

4. CRIMES.—An act entitled, "an act to prevent and punish gambling, and the making, writing or selling of books or pools or mutuels on the result of any trotting race of horses, or race of any kind, or on any election, or any contest of any kind, or game of baseball," is sufficient to embrace in the body of the act a provision to prevent the keeping a house for such betting therein. Lescallett v. Com., 89 Va. 878, 17 S. E. Rep. 546.

Allowing Judge to Fix Penalty.—Where the bill of rights contains the following clause, "that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without a due process of law and the judgment of his peers," a bill enacted allowing the judge to fix the penalty after the jury has found a verdict of guilty is constitutional. State v. Davis, 81 W. Va. 390, 7 S. E. Rep. 24.

Appeal in Felony Cases Not Included.—Acts 1898-4, 494, providing that "no judgment shall be reversed for the failure of the record to show that there was a venire facias unless made a ground of exception in the trial court before the jury is sworn," does not control an appeal in a felony case, pending when the act was passed. Myers v. Com., 90 Va. 785, 20 S. E. Rep. 153.

5. COURTS.—The title, "an act to enlarge the jurisdiction of the hustings court" is sufficient to embrace in the body of the act, a provision, that the judge may, in certain cases act as the judge of the chancery court. Morriss v. Va. Ins. Co., 85 Va. 588, 8 S. E. Rep. 383.

E. AMENDATORY AND REPEALING ACTS.

Sufficiency of Original Title.—In the case of a statute amendatory of a prior one, where the question is whether the object is sufficiently expressed in the title, it is unnecessary to inquire whether the title of the amendatory statute be in itself sufficiently expressive of such object, if the title of the first act be sufficient to embrace the matters contained in the amendatory act. Roby v. Sheppard, 42 W. Va. 286, 26 S. E. Rep. 278; Com. v. Brown, 91 Va. 762, 21 S. E. Rep. 357.

1. AMENDMENT BY IMPLICATION.—A statute amending another merely by implication is not within § 30, art. 6 of the Constitution, and need not refer to the statute it so amends, either in its title or body, so its title be sufficient to cover its own matters. Roby v. Sheppard, 42 W. Va. 286, 26 S. E. Rep. 278.

F. ONE OR MORE SUBJECTS.

Location and Sale of County Seat.—An act entitled, "an act locating the county seat of Calhoun county," which embraced a provision authorizing the board of supervisors to sell the county property, at Arnoldsburg, is repugnant to art. 4, § 36 of the Constitution which provides, that no law shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title. Cutlip v. Sheriff of Calhoun Co., 8 W. Va. 596.

Incorporation of Railroad—Subscription to Stock by Counties.—The title, "an act to incorporate the Atlantic and Danville Narrow Gauge Railroad Company" will sustain a provision authorizing counties to aid, by their subscriptions, in its constructions. Powell v. Supervisors, 88 Va. 707, 14 S. E. Rep. 543.

Security for Wages and Salaries.

Lien for Engines, Cars, etc.—An act entitled, "an act to secure payment of wages and salaries of certain employees of railway and other transportation companies," is not sufficient to sustain a provision giving a lien on the property for cars, supplies and engines; being repugnant to § 15, art. 5 of the Virginia Constitution, which provides that no law shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title. Fidelity Insurance, etc., Co. v. Shenandoah, etc., R. Co., 86 Va. 1, 9 S. E. Rep. 759.

Incorporation of Navigation Company—Subscription to Stock by Counties.—An act entitled, "an act to incorporate the Little Kanawha Navigation Company," is sufficient to embrace a provision in the body of the act, allowing counties benefited thereby to subscribe to the stock. State v. Wirt County Court, 37 W. Va. 808, 17 S. E. Rep. 379.

Corporation and Creditors Collecting Unpaid Subscriptions.—An act entitled, "an act to prescribe, the mode by which unpaid subscriptions to joint stock companies may be recovered by said companies, their receivers or assignees," does not authorize any legislation as to the mode by which creditors may recover such unpaid stock subscriptions. Martin v. South Salem Land Co., 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. Rep. 591.

Prevention of Gambling and Keeping House for Same.—An act entitled, "an act to prevent and punish gambling, and the making, writing or selling of books or pools, or mutuels on the result of any trotting race of horses, or race of any kind, or game of baseball," is sufficient to embrace in the body of the act a provision to prevent the keeping of a house for such betting therein. Lescallett v. Com., 89 Va. 878, 17 S. E. Rep. 546.

Enlarging Jurisdiction of Court.—The title, "an act to enlarge the jurisdiction of the hustings court" is sufficient to embrace in the body of the act, a provision that the judge, may in certain cases act as judge of the chancery court. Morriss v. Va. Ins. Co., 85 Va. 588, 8 S. E. Rep. 383.

Allowing Further Time for Treasurer to Make Returns and Supplementary Returns of Delinquent Taxes.—The title, "an act to allow further time for the treasurer of Henrico county to make returns of delinquent taxes" will not sustain a provision for the treasurer of Henrico county to make supplementary returns of delinquent taxes for the years, etc. Supervisors of Henrico Co. v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 6 S. E. Rep. 232.

Two Elections on Removal of County Seat.—An act entitled, "an act to authorize the qualified voters of Alexandria county to vote on the question of the removal of the courthouse from Alexandria city to some point within Alexandria county" is not sufficiently broad to sustain provisions in the act for the partition or sale of the courthouse and jail properties held for the use of the county and city; it being in conflict with art. 5, § 15 of the Constitution of Virginia which provides that no law shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title. Supervisors of Alexandria Co. v. City Council of Alexandria, 95 Va. 469, 28 S. E. Rep. 882.

Sheriff and Commissioner.—An act treating of both sheriff and commissioner, who having certain duties in common, is not repugnant to the constitution of Virginia, art. 5, § 15. Com. v. Drewry, 15 Gratt. 1.

Removal of Seat of Government at Expense of Another.—The title, "an act to remove the seat of the government temporarily to Wheeling" is sufficient to sustain a provision accepting the offer of certain citizens to effect, without cost to the government, such removal. Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612.

VII. AMENDMENTS.

A. BY IMPLICATION.

Need Not Refer to Act Amended.—Statutes may amend others by implication, and it is not essential that they even refer to the acts, or section, which by implication they amend. State v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 720; Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74; Forqueran v. Donnelly, 7 W. Va. 114; Hogan v. Guilgon, 20 Gratt. 705; Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 1; Roby v. Sheppard, 42 W. Va. 286, 26 S. E. Rep. 278.

B. BY RESOLUTION.—A resolution of the legislature appointing members of an electoral board for a single county, thereby supplying an omission under a previous act, amending a section of the Code, but leaving the general law intact is not an amendment of the previous law in the sense that it must be re-enacted and published at length as required by art. 5, § 15 of the Constitution. Sinclair v. Young, 100 Va. 284, 40 S. E. Rep. 907.

C. REFERENCE TO SECTION AMENDED.—When the title of an original act of the legislature sufficiently expresses its object in the manner required by the constitution, an act amendatory thereof may, by its title, simply refer to the section of the original act, which it is intended to amend, and this will be a sufficient compliance with § 30, art. 6 of the Constitution of West Virginia. Heath v. Johnson, 36 W. Va. 728, 15 S. E. Rep. 980.

D. STATUTES PROVIDING REMEDY.—If a statute providing a remedy is amended instead of repealed, the judgment pronounced in such proceeding must be according to the law as it then stands. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1005; Ewing's Case, 5 Gratt. 701.

Amended Acts, How Read.—Where sections of the Code are amended and re-enacted, the sections as amended must be read in the room instead of the original section. Christian v. Taylor, 96 Va. 508, 31 S. E. Rep. 904.

Laws in Force at Time of Trial Prevail.—Every state may control the remedies furnished in her courts, and may at any time change the forms of procedure therein, and the laws in force in that respect at the time of trial must prevail. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 661, 10 S. E. Rep. 1005; Wilson v. Com., 86 Va. 666, 10 S. E. Rep. 1007.

VIII. PROOF.

A. PUBLIC.—The courts take judicial notice of all public acts of the legislature, and they need not be proven. Hart v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336.

1. FOREIGN.—The usual and better, if not the only manner, of proving laws of a foreign state, when they are statutory, is by introducing in evidence a properly authenticated copy of the statute, or so much as is necessary to show the foreign law on the point or points in controversy. Union Central Life Ins. Co. v. Pollard, 94 Va. 146, 26 S. E. Rep. 421; Warner v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 66.

B. PRIVATE.—This court takes judicial notice of all such acts and resolutions of the legislature, though local and private, as appear to have been relied on in the court below. Groves v. Grant County, 42 W. Va. 587, 26 S. E. Rep. 460; Somerville v. Wimblish, 7 Gratt. 205.

1. MUST BE PROVEN WHEN IN ISSUE.—Private laws or acts of the legislature, it seems, must be proven when in issue. Hart v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336.

IX. INTERPRETATION AND CONSTRUCTION.

A. IN GENERAL.—Conflict and repugnance in statutes should always be avoided by construction if possible. Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 207, 12 S. E. Rep. 484; State v. Scott, 36 W. Va. 704, 15 S. E. Rep. 405.

But the best rule to arrive at the meaning of a statute is to abide by the words the lawmaker has used, so that no clause, sentence or word shall be superfluous, void or insignificant. Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. Rep. 409; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 40 S. E. Rep. 633.

General Rules Applicable to Criminals as Well as Civil.—In the construction of statutes whether they are penal or beneficial, restricting or enlarging the common law, four things are to be considered: 1. What was the common law before the making of the act? 2. What was the mischief and defect against which the common law did not provide? 3. What remedy the legislature hath resolved and appointed to cure the disease of the commonwealth? 4. The true reason of the remedy. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Prindle, 82 Va. 130.

Where Statute Admits of Two Constructions.—When a statute admits of two constructions, the one destructive of the foundation of society, and inimical to the peace, welfare and good order of a people, and the other conducive to their welfare, and adding durability to the foundations of society, the latter should be adopted. Offield v. Davis, 100 Va. 253, 40 S. E. Rep. 910.

When the Meaning of the Constitution is Clear.—Where the meaning of the constitution is clear, the court, if possible, must give the statute such a construction as will enable it to have effect. Charleston, etc., Co. v. Kanawha County, 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. Rep. 1003.

May Be Restricted or Extended.—Statutes are sometimes extended to cases not within the letter of them, and cases are sometimes excluded from the operation of statutes, though within the letter. Brown v. Gates, 15 W. Va. 165.

Subject, Context, Effects and Consequences to Be Considered.—The nature of the subject, the character of the statute, the context, and the effect and consequences must be regarded. Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. Rep. 409.

No Part to Be Rejected.—Courts are justified in rejecting any part of a statute as unnecessary and irrelevant only as the last resort when it has been found impossible to give effect to all the language used, and reach a rational conclusion. Postal Telegraph Co. v. Farmville, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 661, 82 S. E. Rep. 468.

Both Acts to Stand If Possible.—Where there are two acts on the same subject, the rule is to give effect to both if possible. State v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 734; Harrison v. Allen, Wythe 291; Pitman v. Com., 2 Rob. 800; Warder v. Arell, 3 Wash. 283; Fulkerson v. Bristol, 95 Va. 1, 27 S. E. Rep. 815; Somers v. Com., 97 Va. 759, 33 S. E. Rep. 381.

Particular Intention to Prevail.—A statute ought to be construed as a whole, and each section should be so construed that, if possible, no clause, sentence or word should be superfluous, void or insignificant, and where a general intention is expressed, and the act also expresses a particular intention, it will be regarded as an exception, and will prevail. Baxter v. Wade, 39 W. Va. 281, 19 S. E. Rep. 404; Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 207, 12 S. E. Rep. 484.

No Part to Be Superfluous or Insignificant.—In interpreting a statute, it should be so construed, that if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence or word shall be superfluous or insignificant, and in construing a proviso or exception contained in the statute, the same rule should be applied. Argand Ref. Co. v. Quinn, 39 W. Va. 585, 20 S. E. Rep.

576; Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 207, 12 S. E. Rep. 484; Baxter v. Wade, 39 W. Va. 281, 19 S. E. Rep. 404; Bank v. County Court, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. Rep. 78; Elliot v. Lyell, 3 Call 269.

One Word Not to Be Substituted for Another.—In construing a statute we are not at liberty, where the language is free from ambiguity, to substitute one word for another, and thereby change and reverse the express language of the act; yet it is a settled rule of construction to construe words used by the legislature in such manner as will advance the intention, prevent inconvenience, and avoid conflict with settled policy. State v. Scott, 36 W. Va. 704, 15 S. E. Rep. 405.

Rule in Construing Code.—In construing the Code, the rule of construction is that the old law is not intended to be altered unless such intention plainly appears. Parramore v. Taylor, 11 Gratt. 220; Davis v. Com., 17 Gratt. 617; Com. v. Maclin, 3 Leigh 809; Owners of Steamboat Wenonah v. Braddon, 21 Gratt. 685.

Intent Paramount to Letter.—Statutes must be interpreted according to the intent and meaning, and not always according to the letter. Bank v. Mercer County, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. Rep. 78.

And the real intention of the legislature is the thing to be ascertained. Railroad Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

Popular Import.—The popular received import of words furnishes the general rule for the interpretation of public as well as private laws. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 88 Va. 925, 14 S. E. Rep. 803; Daniel v. Sims, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. Rep. 690; N. & W. R. R. v. Prindle, 83 Va. 130; Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 613; Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. Rep. 409.

But where the language is free from ambiguity, and the intention plainly manifested by it, there is no room for construction. Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 118.

Where Validity is the Question.—Whenever an act of the legislature can be so construed as to avoid conflict with the constitution, and give it force of law, such construction will be adopted by the courts. State v. Workman, 35 W. Va. 367, 14 S. E. Rep. 10; Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State, 36 W. Va. 842, 15 S. E. Rep. 1004; Charleston, etc., Co. v. Kanawha County, 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. Rep. 1003; Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 574; Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85; Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612.

May Be Applicable to Cases Arising in the Future.—Although words of a statute are broad enough in their literal intent to comprehend existing cases they must be construed as applicable to cases arising thereafter unless a contrary intention appear. Campbell v. Nonpareil, etc., Co., 75 Va. 292.

Construction Should Be Favorable to Validity.—It is the duty of the court to uphold a statute when the conflict between it and the constitution is not clear, and the implication which must always exist that no violation has been intended by the legislature may require, in some cases, where the meaning of the constitution is in doubt, to lean in favor of such a construction of the statute as might not at first view seem most obvious and natural. Where the meaning of the constitution is clear, the court if possible, must give the statute such a construction as will enable it to have effect. Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612; Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State, 36 W. Va. 802, 15 S. E. Rep. 1004; Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 422; Sharpe v. Robertson, 5 Gratt. 518; Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85.

Official Terms.—Where a statute fixing the duration of an official term is ambiguous, it must be construed so as to limit the term to the shortest period. Smith v. Bryan, 100 Va. 206, 40 S. E. Rep. 652.

Expediency Not a Question for the Court.—The expediency or in expediency of an act is a question for the legislature and not for courts. Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 613; Prison Asso. of Va. v. Ashby, 93 Va. 667, 25 S. E. Rep. 893; Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State, 36 W. Va. 802, 15 S. E. Rep. 1004; Charleston, etc., Co. v. Kanawha County, 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. 1006; Lusher v. Scites, 4 W. Va. 11.

Province of Court and Legislature.—It is the province of courts to decide what the law is, and determine its application to particular facts in the decision of causes; the province of the legislature is to declare what the law shall be in the future. Shepherd v. Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. Rep. 635.

Intent to Be Substantially Followed.—When the legislative intent can be discovered it should be followed with reason and discretion, though such construction seem contrary to the letter when the words are obscure. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 89 Va. 925, 14 S. E. Rep. 803.

Extension and Restriction as to Letter.—Statutes are sometimes extended to cases not within the letter of them; and cases are sometimes excluded from the operation of statutes, though within the letter; on the principal that what is within the intention of the makers of the statute is within the statute, though not within the letter; and that what is not within the intention of the maker is not within the statute; it being an acknowledged rule in the construction of statutes, that the intention of the makers ought to be regarded. Brown v. Gates, 15 W. Va. 181; Chalmers v. Funk, 76 Va. 722; Brown v. Gates, 15 W. Va. 165.

Some Degree of Implication May Be Used.—The spirit as well as the letter of a statute must be respected, and when the whole context of the law demonstrates a particular intent in the legislature to effect a certain purpose, some degree of implication may be called to aid the intent. Gas Co. v. Wheeling, 8 W. Va. 320.

B. OBJECT.—In the interpretation of statutes, the primary object is to ascertain the intention of the lawmakers, and to give that intention effect, although the construction may not be in conformity with the letter of the law. Chalmers v. Funk, 76 Va. 721; Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 114; Smith v. Bryan, 100 Va. 199, 40 S. E. Rep. 652.

And no law will be construed to defeat the legislative intention but to carry it out. Phillips v. Com., 19 Gratt. 485.

C. WHERE MEANING IS AMBIGUOUS.—When the words of a statute are not explicit, the intention is to be collected from the context, from the occasion and necessity of the law, from the mischief felt and the remedy in view; and the intention is to be taken or presumed according to what is consonant with reason and good discretion. Offield v. Davis, 100 Va. 257, 40 S. E. Rep. 910.

D. MEANS OF LEARNING INTENT.

1. CONTEXT.—A safe and established rule in the construction of statutes is, that the intention of the law giver and the meaning of the law are to be discovered and deduced from a view of the whole, and of every part taken and compared together. Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 10; Postal Telegraph Co. v. Farmville, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 661, 32 S. E. Rep. 468; Gas Co. v. Wheeling, 8 W. Va. 320; Offield v. Davis, 100 Va. 257, 40 S. E. Rep. 910.

Words, Subject Matter and Purpose.—In the construction of statutes, regard should be had not only to the literal sense of the words, but also to the context in which they stand, the subject matter, and the purpose and reason of the law. Railroad Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

2. STATUTES IN PARI MATERIA.—The intention of the legislature may be found from the act itself, from other acts in pari materia, and sometimes from the cause or necessity of the statute; and, whenever the intent can be discovered, it should be followed with reason and discretion, though such construction seem contrary to the letter of the statute. This is the rule where the words of the statute are obscure. Bank v. Mercer Co., 36 W. Va. 841, 15 S. E. Rep. 78; Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 88 Va. 925, 14 S. E. Rep. 803; Offield v. Davis, 100 Va. 257, 40 S. E. Rep. 910; Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208; Anable v. Com., 24 Gratt. 563; Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 551, 39 S. E. Rep. 690; Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 114.

Statutes Re-Enacted May Be Considered.—Where an act of the legislature is repealed and is re-enacted with some changes at the same time, both statutes may properly be taken into consideration in giving a construction to the latter; but the act repealed has no force whatever, only so far as it is continued in force by saving clauses and exceptions. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 230.

3. PURPOSE AND OBJECT.

Suppress Mischief and Advance Remedy.—It is the duty of the court at all times to so construe the law as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Prindle, 82 Va. 130; State v. Scott, 36 W. Va. 704, 15 S. E. Rep. 405.

Effects and Consequences.—The nature of the subject, the character of the statute, the context and the effects and consequences must be regarded. Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. Rep. 409.

Moving Cause.—The cause which moved the legislature in the enactment of a statute should always be considered in the construction of it. Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. Rep. 409; Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 10.

4. SUBJECT MATTER.—The nature of the subject, the character of the statute, the context, and the effects and consequences must be regarded. Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. Rep. 409.

a. Technical Words.—Words of known legal import are to be considered as having been used in their technical sense, or according to their strict acceptation, unless there appear a manifest intention of using them in their popular sense. Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 118.

b. Popular Meaning.—The popular or received import of words furnished the general rule for the interpretation of public laws, as well as of private and social transactions. Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. Rep. 690; Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 88 Va. 925, 14 S. E. Rep. 803; N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Prindle, 82 Va. 130; Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 613; Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. Rep. 409; Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 118.

Relying on Plain Words Safer.—There is always danger in giving effect to what is called the equity of a statute; it is much safer and better to rely on and abide by the plain words, although the legislature might have provided for other cases, had their attention been directed to them. Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 118.

(i) May Be Restricted.—The real purpose and intention of the legislature is the thing to be ascertained in the construction of statutes, and to effect this the general meaning of the word may be restricted. O. & A. R. Co. v. City Council of Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

E. AIDS TO CONSTRUCTION.

1. PREAMBLE.—The preamble may be consulted in some cases to ascertain the intentions of the legislature. But it is chiefly from the main body the purview of the act, that the will of the legislature is to be learned; when this is clear and express, the preamble will not avail to contradict it. Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 613.

But a preamble cannot enlarge the scope of a statute. Com. v. Smith, 76 Va. 477.

2. PRIOR CONSTRUCTIONS.—When words in a statute have acquired, through judicial interpretation a well-understood legislative meaning, it is to be presumed, they were used in that sense in a subsequent statute on the same subject, unless the contrary appears. Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. Rep. 690.

Ancient Statutes.—Constructions of ancient statutes which have been regarded as precedents should not be disturbed. Com. v. Posey, 4 Call 109.

Effects of Lapse of Time.—Where a statute is of doubtful import a court will consider the construction put upon the act when it first came into operation, and that construction, after an elapse of time, without change either by the legislature or judicial decision, will be regarded as the correct construction. Smith v. Bryan, 100 Va. 204, 40 S. E. Rep. 652.

a. By Those Charged with Execution.—The construction given to a statute by those charged with the duty of executing it ought not to be overruled without cogent reasons. Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. Rep. 690; Smith v. Bryan, 100 Va. 204, 40 S. E. Rep. 652.

3. FOREIGN CONSTRUCTIONS.—That in the interpretation of the statutes of another state, this court will adopt the construction given to such statutes by the highest judicial tribunal of such state, unless the same be in contravention of the constitution of the United States. Nimick v. Mingo Iron Works, 25 W. Va. 186.

English Constructions.—Whenever the legislature uses a term without defining it, which is well known in the English law, and these have a definite appropriate meaning affixed to it, they must be supposed to use it in the sense in which it is used in the English law. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Prindle, 82 Va. 130.

4. USAGE AND CONTEMPORANEOUS CONSTRUCTIONS.—Contemporaneous construction and official usage for a long period by persons charged with the administration of the law have always been regarded as legitimate aids in the construction of statutes. Smith v. Bryan, 100 Va. 204, 40 S. E. Rep. 652.

In Absence of Ambiguity.—Although a custom or usage may be invoked to interpret a statute, yet where there is no doubt or ambiguity it cannot be resorted to, to contradict what is plain, or to control, vary or add to, or diminish what is expressed in formal and deliberate terms. Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. 457.

Declarations of Draftsman Inadmissible.—The meaning of a statute should be arrived at from its own language and not from the declaration of the draftsman. City of Richmond v. Supervisors, 83 Va. 204, 2 S. E. Rep. 26; Walker v. Boggess, 41 W. Va. 588, 23 S. E. Rep. 550.

5. FORMER STATUTES.—All former statutes on the same subject, whether repealed or unrepealed, may be considered in construing provisions that remain in force; and a repealed section which defines a term does not change the meaning of the term when found elsewhere in the original connection, and the section repealed may be referred to, to determine the meaning of such terms. Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. Rep. 690.

6. COMMON LAW.—It has been held that statutes are to be interpreted with reference to the common law in force at the time of their passage except where the statute itself, or the courts have otherwise determined. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Prindle, 82 Va. 130.

F. PRESUMPTIONS.

1. AGAINST UNDUE EXERCISE OF POWER.—Where two constructions may be put on a statute, one of which is clearly within the legislative power and the other beyond it, the legislature will be held to have intended to do what it had a right to do, and not that which was beyond its power. Martin v. South Salem Land Co., 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. Rep. 591.

a. In Favor of Validity.—The presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of a statute, and the courts should give the statute effect, unless it is clearly unconstitutional. Charleston, etc., Co. v. Kanawha County, 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. Rep. 1002; Bridges v. Shallicross, 6 W. Va. 562; Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85.

2. AGAINST FRAUDULENT INTENT ON PART OF LEGISLATURE.—Courts will not presume fraudulent intent and corrupt purpose on the part of the legislature, but will presume the contrary. Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 613.

3. AGAINST CHANGE.

a. Common Law.—The common law is not presumed to be changed unless the intention to do so clearly appears in the statute. Davis v. Com., 17 Gratt. 617; Com. v. Maclin, 3 Leigh 809.

b. Statutes.—Where the law antecedently to the revision was settled, either by clear expressions in the statutes, or adjudications on them, the mere change of phraseology shall not be deemed or construed a change of the law, unless such phraseology evidently purports an intention in the legislature to work a change. Parramore v. Taylor, 11 Gratt. 243; Brown v. Randolph County Court, 45 W. Va. 827, 32 S. E. Rep. 165.

Must Be in Express Words.—Whatever apparent inconsistencies may appear in the declarations of legislative will, yet it is not decent to presume that they would change their mind on the subject, without saying so in express terms. Warder v. Arell, 2 Wash. 283.

Protection of Life, Liberty and Character.—The courts should not impute to the legislature an intention to change a rule of common law which has received a great many solemn sanctions, without the clearest evidence of such intention; especially when it was established for the protection of life, liberty and character. Matthews v. Com., 18 Gratt. 989.

4. IN FAVOR OF SANCTION OF FORMER CONSTRUCTION BY LEGISLATURE.—Where a statute has been construed by the courts, and is then re-enacted by the legislature, the construction given to it is presumed to be sanctioned by the legislature, and thenceforth becomes obligatory upon the courts. Mangus v. McClelland, 93 Va. 786, 23 S. E. Rep. 364; Anable's Case, 24 Gratt. 563.

5. AGAINST SUPERFLUOUS WORDS.—It is not presumed that the legislature intends any part of a statute to be without meaning, and all statutes in pari materia are to be read and construed together as if they form a part of the same statute, and were enacted at the same time. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 88 Va. 926, 14 S. E. Rep. 803.

6. IN FAVOR OF ORDINARY ACCEPTATION.—When a law is plain and unambiguous, whether expressed in general or limited terms, the legislature shall be presumed to mean what they have plainly expressed, and no room is left for construction. Johnson v. Mann, 77 Va. 265.

7. IN FAVOR OF STATUTE HAVING SOME, RATHER THAN NO EFFECT.—It is always to be presumed that the legislature designed the statute to take effect, and not be a nullity. Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State, 36 W. Va. 802, 15 S. E. Rep. 1000; Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612.

8. AGAINST INJUSTICE.—Where there is no express indication of legislative intention, it is not to be presumed that it was intended by any new enactment to arrest the regular prosecution of process essentially remedial, and take away the right acquired under it. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

9. AGAINST DISCHARGE OF PUBLIC RIGHTS.—It is a settled rule of construction that the state is not to be presumed to have discharged the public rights without express declaration or manifest intention to that effect. Bennett v. McWhorter, 2 W. Va. 441.

G. STRICT CONSTRUCTION.

1. STATUTES, PENAL.—Penal statutes must be construed strictly. Hall v. N. & W. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 86, 28 S. E. Rep. 754; Davis v. Com., 17 Gratt. 617; Com. v. Maclin, 3 Leigh 809; State v. Beasley, 21 W. Va. 777.

Revenue Laws.—Revenue laws are neither remedial statutes nor laws founded on any public policy and are not liberally construed. Combined Saw, etc., Co. v. Flournoy, 88 Va. 1029, 14 S. E. Rep. 976; Harris v. Com., 81 Va. 240; Lescallett v. Com., 89 Va. 878, 17 S. E. Rep. 546.

2. OF LIMITATIONS AS APPLIED TO CRIMES.—The statute of limitations as applied to crimes comes within the general rule of strict construction. State v. Beasley, 21 W. Va. 777.

3. IN DEROGATION OF COMMON RIGHT.—Powers in derogation of common right are to be strictly construed. Richmond v. Daniel, 14 Gratt. 385; Harrison v. Leach, 4 W. Va. 383; Harrison v. Smith, 4 W. Va. 97; Pendleton v. Barton, 4 W. Va. 496; Richardson v. N. & W. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 641, 17 S. E. Rep. 195; McGugin v. Ohio River R. Co., 33 W. Va. 63, 10 S. E. Rep. 36; State v. Elk Island Boom Co., 41 W. Va. 796, 24 S. E. Rep. 590; Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. 457.

Naked Powers in Derogation of Rights of Individuals.—Where a naked power is conferred by statute to an officer or other person, that power must be strictly pursued, especially, if by the exercise of such power the estates or rights of others may be forfeited or lost. Holly River Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. Rep. 914.

Where Ambiguity Exists.—In statutes imposing a burden on the public where there is ambiguity, the law should be construed strictly and in their favor. Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 11; Com. v. R. & P. R. Co., 81 Va. 355.

4. IN DEROGATION OF COMMON LAW.—Statutes in derogation of common law should not be enlarged in its operation by construction beyond its express terms. Harrison v. Leach, 4 W. Va. 383; Davis v. Com., 17 Gratt. 617.

5. DELEGATING POWERS.—Statutes delegating powers, as the right of condemnation are to be strictly construed in every particular. Adams v. Clarksburg, 23 W. Va. 208.

Implied When Necessarily Incident.—Authority delegated by the legislature must be in terms, and is to be construed strictly, and is never to be implied unless necessarily incident to the powers expressly delegated. Peters v. Lynchburg, 76 Va. 927.

Eminent Domain.—All grants of power by legislature are to be strictly construed, and this is especially true with respect to the power of eminent domain. C. & O. R. R. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 40 S. E. Rep. 633.

6. GIVING EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS.—Exclusive rights to public franchises are not favored, and whenever they are granted they will be construed strictly and in favor of the public. Parkersburg Gas Co. v. Parkersburg, 30 W. Va. 435, 4 S. E. Rep. 650.

7. EXEMPTING FROM LIABILITY.—Though it is true that laws conferring the power of taxation upon municipal corporations are to be construed strictly, it is also true that exemptions from taxation are to be construed strictly; and where the power has once been conferred, it is not to be crippled or destroyed by strained interpretations of subsequent laws. O. & A. R. R. Co. v. City Council of Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

8. CREATING LIABILITIES.—It is a well-settled rule of law, that every charge upon the citizen must be imposed by clear and unambiguous language. Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 10.

9. IMPOSING TAXES.—Statutes levying duties or taxes upon subjects or citizens to be construed most strongly against the government, and their provisions are not to be extended, by implication, beyond the clear import of the language used. Combined Saw, etc., Co. v. Flournoy, 88 Va. 1029, 14 S. E. Rep. 976; Schofield v. Lynchburg, 78 Va. 366; City of Richmond v. Daniel, 14 Gratt. 385; Railroad Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

10. IMPOSING RESTRICTIONS ON TRADE.—Statutes which impose restrictions upon trade or common occupation, or which levy an excise or tax upon them, must be construed strictly. Combined Saw, etc., Co. v. Flournoy, 88 Va. 1029, 14 S. E. Rep. 976.

11. CHARTERS.—The general rule is that charters should be strictly construed. City of Richmond v. Daniel, 14 Gratt. 385.

H. LIBERAL CONSTRUCTION.

1. REMEDIAL STATUTES.—Remedial statutes must under the rule for construing such statutes be construed largely and beneficially, so as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy. State v. Beasley, 21 W. Va. 777; Price v. Harrison, 81 Gratt. 114.

a. General Rules.—1. The laws against gaming are to be construed as remedial laws. 2. Such construction shall be made as will give effect to the legislative intent and not defeat it. 3. The construction shall be, as nearly as possible, in conformity with the principles of the common law. 4. If it be possible a reasonable construction shall be made, and a reasonable and lawful intent imputed, rather than one unreasonable and unlawful. 5. All laws are, or ought to be, prospective in their action. Retrospective laws are odious, and never presumed to be intended, unless by inevitable construction. And ex post facto laws are void. All laws in pari materia should be considered together. Pitman v. Commonwealth, 2 Rob. 803.

b. Registration Statutes, as Regards Writings.—Registration statutes, as regards writings, are remedial laws and should be construed liberally. Janesville, etc., Co. v. Boyd, 35 W. Va. 240, 18 S. E. Rep. 381.

c. Statutes of Jeofails.—The statute of jeofails as regards clerical errors is remedial and should be construed liberally. Davis v. Com., 16 Gratt. 134.

2. TITLE OF STATUTES.—The language in the title of a statute should be construed in its most comprehensive sense. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470.

3. ALLOWING REDEMPTIONS.—Statutes allowing redemption of lands sold for taxes must be liberally construed in favor of persons entitled to redeem. Poling v. Parsons, 38 W. Va. 80, 18 S. E. Rep. 379.

4. AGAINST FRAUD.—Statutes enacted for the suppression of fraud should receive a liberal construction. Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 Hen. & M. 289.

I. EXCEPTIONAL CONSTRUCTIONS.

1. CORRECTION OF ERRORS.—When one word has been erroneously used for another, or a word omitted, and the context affords the means of correction, the proper word will be deemed substituted or supplied. Hutchings v. Commercial Bank, 91 Va. 68, 20 S. E. Rep. 950.

Mistake Leading to Different Conclusion.—A statute will be construed according to its obvious intention, though the collocation of the different branches of the provision are so arranged, by mistake, as to lead to a different conclusion. Matthews v. Com., 18 Gratt. 989.

a. Error in Arrangement.—Where by mistake, words of a statute are arranged out of their regular order, the court may construe them as if the arrangement was correct. Matthews v. Com., 18 Gratt. 989.

b. Erroneous Reference.—Where a statute amending a section of a given chapter of the Code refers to the section by the wrong number, and it is manifest from the title and body of the statute that another section was intended to be amended, the error as to the number of the section will be disregarded, and the statute will be applied to amend the proper section. State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 527.

2. INTERPOLATIONS.—In order to enable a court to insert in a statute omitted words, the intent thus to have it read must be plainly deducible from other parts of the statute. Hutchings v. Commercial Bank, 91 Va. 74, S. E. Rep. 950.

a. Must Be Necessary.—Courts cannot, by construction, interpolate into statutes, words which do not appear there, when such interpolation is not plainly deducible from the context or other portions of the act, and when the omission would not render the act incongruous or unintelligible, nor lead to absurd results. Johnson v. Barham, 99 Va. 305, 88 S. E. Rep. 136.

b. Intention Prevails.—In the interpretation of a statute the intention of the lawmaker will prevail over the literal sense of the terms. Offield v. Davis, 100 Va. 257, 40 S. E. Rep. 910.

J. SPECIAL CLASSES.

I. PRIVATE AND SPECIAL.

a. General and Particular Statutes and Clauses.—A general statute without negative words will not repeal the particular provisions of a former one, unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent. Conley v. Supervisors, 2 W. Va. 416; Sturm v. Fleming, 81 W. Va. 701, 8 S. E. Rep. 263; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Hoard, 16 W. Va. 270; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 149; Mason v. Harpers Ferry, etc., Co., 17 W. Va. 396.

General Prohibitions Not Applicable to Special Acts.—Where a prior statute is general in its terms and prohibits the taking of certain property in any case whatever, and the subsequent statute is special in its terms and authorizes the taking of such property in certain described localities only, the latter will be held to be a limitation on or qualification of the former, and the prohibition will continue in all cases except in localities specified in the subsequent statute. McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 149.

Particular Intention Will Prevail.—Where a general intention is expressed, and the act also expresses a particular intention incompatible with the general intention, the particular intention will be regarded as an exception and will prevail. Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 207, 12 S. E. Rep. 484; Baxter v. Wade, 39 W. Va. 281, 19 S. E. Rep. 404.

(i) Enactment—Effect on Prior Statutes.—The passage of a local statute expressly applicable to only one county of a state in no way repeals, supersedes or effects an existing general law in the same words as the local law, unless it is applicable to all the counties of the state. Poindexter v. May, 96 Va. 143, 34 S. E. Rep. 971.

(2) Repeal of Special Statute.—The repeal of a special statute must be either express, or the manifestation of the legislature must be so clear, as to amount to an express direction. Com. v. R. & P. R. R. Co., 81 Va. 355; Trehy v. Marye, 100 Va. 40, 40 S. E. Rep. 126.

2. ADOPTED STATUTES—PRESUMPTION.—When the legislature adopts the statute of another country or state it is presumed to adopt the construction of such other state or country. Doswell v. Buchanan, 8 Leigh 365; Danville v. Pace, 26 Gratt. 1.

a. Construction of Foreign Statutes.—In the interpretation of the statutes of another state the court will adopt the construction given to such statutes by the highest judicial tribunal of such state, unless the same be in contravention of the constitution of the United States. Nimick v. Iron Works, 26 W. Va. 186.

3. RE-ENACTED STATUTES.—Where a statute has been construed by the courts and is then re-enacted by the legislature, the construction given it will be presumed to be sanctioned by the legislature, and thenceforth becomes obligatory upon the courts. Mangus v. McClelland, 93 Va. 786, 22 S. E. Rep. 364; Anable's Case, 24 Gratt. 563.

4. ENGLISH WORDS.—Whenever the legislature uses a term without defining it which is well known in the English law, and there, has a definite appropriate meaning affixed to it, they must be supposed to use it in the sense in which it is used in the English law. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Prindle, 82 Va. 130.

5. CONSTRUED WORDS.—When words in a statute have acquired, through judicial interpretation, a well understood legislative meaning, it is to be presumed they were used in that sense in a subsequent statute on the same subject, unless the contrary appears. Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. Rep. 690.

6. PROVISOS, EXCEPTIONS AND SAVING CLAUSES.

a. Provisos.—A proviso to one section of an act cannot be applied to another section, unless it manifestly appears, by reference to the whole act, that it was the intention of the legislature that such proviso should limit the operation of other sections, than that to which it is appended. Callaway v. Harding, 23 Gratt. 542.

b. Saving Clauses.—Where an offense is made a felony by statute, and the statute is afterwards repealed, no proceeding after the repeal can be had for an offense committed under it unless the repealing statute has a proviso enabling the proceeding for offenses committed before. Scutt v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 54; Com. v. Leftwich, 5 Rand. 657; Attoo v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 382; White v. Freeman, 79 Va. 597.

c. Jurisdiction.—Where a statute confers jurisdiction on a court, and which is repealed without any reservation or exception, the jurisdiction to such court is taken away, and cannot be exercised. State v. Brookover, 22 W. Va. 214.

K. ASSOCIATED WORDS.

1. WHEN USED IN SEVERAL PLACES.—Where a word is used in several places in a statute with a clear and unambiguous meaning in one instance, it will be given the same in other places unless a contrary intention clearly appear. Postal Telegraph Co. v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 88 Va. 999, 14 S. E. Rep. 661; Postal Telegraph Co. v. Farmville, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 661, 32 S. E. Rep. 468.

2. WORDS CONFERRING AUTHORITY.—Words giving authority to three or more persons confer it upon a majority. Gas Co. v. Wheeling, 8 W. Va. 330; Booker v. Young, 13 Gratt. 303.

3. GENERAL WORDS FOLLOWING PARTICULAR ONES.

—When a particular class of persons or things is spoken of in a statute, and general words follow, the class first mentioned must be taken as the most comprehensive, and the general words treated as referring to matters of the same kind with such class, the effect of general words when they follow particular words being thus restricted. Lynchburg v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 80 Va. 237; American Mang. Co. v. Va. Mang. Co., 91 Va. 272, 21 S. E. Rep. 466.

Where Court to Be Held on a Particular Day.—Where a court directed to be held on a particular day of the month and that day falls on Sunday, the court shall be held or the proceeding take place on the next day. Va. Code, 1887, § 5, subsec. 10; Read v. Com., 22 Gratt. 924; Michie v. Michie, 17 Gratt. 109.

L. RETROSPECTIVE LAWS.

1. DEFINITION.—A retrospective law is one which operates upon matters which occurred or rights or obligations which existed, before the time of enactment. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 447.

May Substitute Oral for Written Evidence.—The legislature has power at its pleasure to alter the existing form of remedy, or the rules of evidence, and to substitute, in any class of cases, oral for written testimony. Crawford v. Halsted & Putnam, 20 Gratt. 211.

Laws Which Do Not Impair Rights.—Any rule or regulation with regard to the remedy which does not, under pretense of modifying or regulating it, take away or impair the right itself, cannot be regarded as beyond the proper province of the legislature. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1006; Ewing's Case, 5 Gratt. 701.

May Change Form of Remedy but Not Impair Contracts.—It is competent for the states to change the form of the remedy, or to modify it otherwise as they may see fit, provided that no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired. The Homestead Cases, 22 Gratt. 266.

2. RULES OF CONSTRUCTION.—A cardinal rule in interpreting statutes is to construe them as prospective in operation in every instance, except where the intent that they shall act retrospectively is expressed in clear and unambiguous terms, or such intent is necessarily implied from the language of the statute, which would be inoperative otherwise than retrospectively. In doubt it should be resolved against rather than in favor of retrospective operation. Casto v. Greer, 44 W. Va. 332, 30 S. E. Rep. 101; Stewart v. Vandervort, 34 W. Va. 524, 12 S. E. Rep. 736; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447; Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 120; Murdock v. Franklin Ins. Co., 33 W. Va. 407, 18 S. E. Rep. 777; Duval v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 24; Tennant v. Brookover, 12 W. Va. 337; Phillips v. Com., 19 Gratt. 485; Walker v. Boggess, 41 W. Va. 588, 23 S. E. Rep. 559; City of Richmond v. Supervisors, 83 Va. 204, 2 S. E. Rep. 26; McCance v. Taylor, 10 Gratt. 580; Ryan v. Com., 80 Va. 385; Ex parte Quarrier, 4 W. Va. 210; Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

a. Statutes of Limitation No Exception.—Statutes of limitations are no exceptions to the rule that statutes are prima facie to be given only prospective operation. Burns v. Hays, 44 W. Va. 503, 30 S. E. Rep. 101; Duval v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 24; Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 104; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470.

b. Prima Facie Construction.—Statutes are prima facie to have no retrospective effect. Elliot v. Lyell, 3 Call 269; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 124, 18 S. E. Rep. 473; Stewart v. Vandervort, 34 W. Va. 524, 12 S. E. Rep. 736; Warders v. Arell, 2 Wash. 382; Com. v.

Hewitt, 2 Hen. & M. 181; Day v. Pickett, 4 Munf. 109; Williams v. Lewis, 5 Leigh 686; McCance v. Taylor, 10 Gratt. 580; Duval v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 24; Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 114; Crigler v. Alexander, 33 Gratt. 674; Ryan's Case, 80 Va. 385; Campbell v. Nonpareil Fire Brick Co., 75 Va. 291; Robertson v. Gillenwaters, 85 Va. 116, 7 S. E. Rep. 371; Tennant v. Brookover, 12 W. Va. 337; Hoge v. Brookover, 28 W. Va. 304; Thornburg v. Thornburg, 18 W. Va. 522.

Time of Taking Effect.—No statute is to have a retrospect beyond the time of its commencement. Crigler v. Alexander, 33 Gratt. 674; Campbell v. Nonpareil, etc., Co., 75 Va. 291.

Construction Interfering with Rights.—A statute which undertakes to give a retrospective effect to an invalid recordation, and thus divert or interfere with the rights of creditors, is to say the least, of doubtful policy. Campbell v. Nonpareil, etc., Co., 75 Va. 298; Forqueran v. Donnelly, 7 W. Va. 114; Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1.

When within Proper Sphere.—Retrospective acts of legislation, when limited within the appropriate sphere, may undoubtedly be within the legislative power, and such acts have received judicial sanction. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1006.

Where Doubt Exists.—In cases of doubt it should be resolved against rather than in favor of retroactive operation. Walker v. Boggess, 41 W. Va. 588, 23 S. E. Rep. 550.

Laws Relating to Remedy.—Laws though relating to remedy, are presumed to operate in future unless plainly intended to act retrospectively. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

Effect after Judgment.—The act of March 1st, 1871, entitled "an act to protect persons who aided in the late rebellion between the government of the United States and a part of the people thereof," does not operate to furnish immunity for acts done or committed by persons engaged on either side of the late rebellion, when judgment for such acts has been obtained prior to its passage. Arnold v. Kelley, 5 W. Va. 446.

Constitutions Have Prospective Operations.—Constitutions are deemed as intended to have a prospective operation unless a contrary intention appear. Douglass v. Harrisville, 9 W. Va. 162.

3. REMEDIAL STATUTES.—All statutes, remedial included, shall be construed to apply to future transactions, unless a contrary intention is inevitable. Burns v. Hays, 44 W. Va. 503, 30 S. E. Rep. 101; Maslin v. Hiett, 37 W. Va. 15, 16 S. E. Rep. 437; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; City of Richmond v. Supervisors, 83 Va. 204, 2 S. E. Rep. 26; Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447; Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1006.

M. WORDS, PHRASES, ETC.

1. "HELD."—The word "held" as used in ch. 36, § 4, Acts 1891 relative to the separate assessment of lands and coal interest when owned by different persons, was construed as if the word "owned" had been used in its place. Harrison v. Brewster, 38 W. Va. 294, 18 S. E. Rep. 568.

2. "MAY."—The word "may" when used in statutes means must or shall only in cases where the public rights are concerned, or where the public or third persons have a claim de jure, that the power shall be exercised. Bolling v. Mayor, 3 Rand. 580.

3. "PERSONS."—When the word "person" is used in a statute, corporations as well as natural persons, are included for civil purposes. Balt. & Ohio R. Co. v. Gallahue, 13 Gratt. 655; W. U. Telegraph Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Gratt. 1; Miller v. Com., 27 Gratt. 110; Lynchburg v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 80 Va. 237.

4. "PRACTICE."—The word "practice" as used in Code, ch. 32, § 2, relative to the business of a broker does not include one sale, but is used in the sense of exercising or following a profession or calling as one's usual business to gain a livelihood. Jackson v. Hough, 38 W. Va. 236, 18 S. E. Rep. 575.

5. "PASSAGE."—The constitution of West Virginia provides that no act shall take effect, except those passed at the first session under this constitution, until the expiration of ninety days after its passage, unless the legislature, etc., and the word "passage" in this connection was construed to mean from the passage by both houses of the legislature, and not from the approval by the governor. State v. Mounts, 36 W. Va. 179, 14 S. E. Rep. 407.

6. "REGISTERED."—The word "registered" when used in our statutes relative to elections, refer to the persons whose names are placed upon the registration books provided by law as the sole record or memorial of the duly-qualified voters of the state. Chalmers v. Funk, 76 Va. 719.

7. "SHALL."—The West Virginia Constitution, art. 1, § 5 provides that indictments shall conclude "against the peace and dignity of the state of West Virginia." In a prosecution for stealing a horse the indictment concluded, against the peace and dignity of the state of West Virginia the court construed the word "shall" as mandatory, held that the indictment must conclude in the exact words provided by the constitution. Lemons v. State, 4 W. Va. 755.

8. "VACANCY."—The word "vacancy" where used in a statute, does not necessarily presuppose a former incumbent of an office. It fitly and aptly describes the condition of an office newly created, and never filled by any previous incumbent. State v. Scott, 36 W. Va. 704, 15 S. E. Rep. 405.

9. "PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE."—The words "personal representative" are construed to include an executor of a will or the administrator of an estate of a decedent, an administrator c. t. a., or an administrator b. d. n., whether there be a will or not, a sheriff or sergeant qualifying and administering on the estate of a decedent and every committee or curator of a decedent's estate. Va. Code 1887, § 5, subsec. 4; Brown v. Lambert, 33 Gratt. 256; Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 114.

10. "OTHER ACCIDENTAL CAUSES."—The words "other accidental causes" used in § 4386, revised statutes of the United States, means "other unavoidable accidental causes." C. & O. Ry. Co. v. American Exchange Bank, 92 Va. 495, 23 S. E. Rep. 985.

11. "CATTLE, SHEEP, SWINE AND OTHER ANIMALS."—Section 4386 of the revised statutes, which forbids any railroad company which carries "cattle, sheep, swine or other animals" from keeping the same confined in its cars for a longer period than twenty-eight hours, etc., embraces horses, mules and all animals which may suffer for want of food, water or rest during such transportation. C. & O. Ry. Co. v. American Exchange Bank, 92 Va. 495, 23 S. E. Rep. 985.

12. "DURING GOOD BEHAVIOR."—An official tenure "during good behavior" is for life unless sooner determined for cause. But a tenure "during good behavior or until removed by the mayor" is a tenure at the will of the mayor. Smith v. Bryan, 100 Va. 199, 40 S. E. Rep. 653.

13. "BAY OR RIVER CRAFT OR OTHER BOAT."—The words "bay or river craft or other boat," in § 17, ch. 95 of the Code, edition of 1890, embraces steamboats of five hundred tons burden. Owners of Steamboat Wenonah v. Bragdon, 21 Gratt. 665.

14. "AND SO FORTH."—The words "and so forth" express nothing and mean nothing as a compliance with art. 5, § 15 of the Constitution of Virginia which provides that no law shall embrace more than one object which shall be expressed in its title. Lacey v. Palmer, 98 Va. 159, 24 S. E. Rep. 930.

15. "MEMBERS ELECTED."—Upon a bill filed to declare a statute void, on the ground that it was not passed by a majority of the members elected, the words "members elected" was construed to mean the members entitled to vote at the time the bill was passed. Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85.

16. "ADJOURNED FROM DAY TO DAY."—Where a law authorizes a court, or the proceedings of an officer, to be "adjourned from day to day," an adjournment from Saturday to Monday is legal. Va. Code 1887, § 5, subsec. 10; Michie v. Michie, 17 Gratt. 109; Read v. Com., 23 Gratt. 924.

17. "OFFICE WITHIN THE GIFT OF THE PEOPLE."—As applied to officers, art. 3, § 2, Virginia Constitution containing the words "office within the gift of the people" was construed to include officers appointed by the legislature as well as those elected by popular vote. Black v. Trower, 79 Va. 123.

X. REPEAL.

A. IN GENERAL.—A repealing statute is such an express enactment, as necessarily diverts all inchoate rights which have arisen under the statute, and fall with it, unless saved by express words in the repealing clause. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

New Provisions Overruling Former Effect.—Where a new provision is made, imposing a liability as to which the original act is silent and the new provision operates to overrule the legal effect of the former law, but changes none of its terms, it does not "amend" in the sense of the constitution. Art. 4, § 16; Anderson v. Com., 18 Gratt. 296.

Effect of Custom.—Although a custom otherwise good may override and displace the common-law rule, yet a statute introducing a new principal, with a negative either express or necessarily implied, must be strictly pursued and no custom can be set up against it. Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. 457.

Latest Act Prevails.—Two statutory provisions in pari materia are passed at different times, but both are incorporated in several statutes enacted at a general revision of the statute laws: if there be any difference between them, the court will look to the dates of the original enactments, and give effect to the last passed. Winn v. Jones, 6 Leigh 74.

1. POWER NOT GIVEN TO COURTS.—The legislature cannot confer upon the courts the power to supersede, revoke or annul a city ordinance upon the petition of taxpayers, for such power is legislative and cannot be exercised by the courts. Shephard v. Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. Rep. 635.

2. POWER TO REVOKE EQUIVALENT TO POWER TO REPEAL.—The power to revoke or annul a statute or ordinance is equivalent to the power to repeal it: and in either case the power is legislative, and not judicial, in its character. Shephard v. Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. Rep. 635.

3. COURT TO DETERMINE.—The question whether a statute has been repealed, is one to be determined by the courts. Shephard v. Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. Rep. 635.

4. PRESUMPTION.—The presumption is always against the intention to repeal where express terms are not used. Fulkerson v. Bristol, 95 Va. 1, 27 S. E. Rep. 815; Somers v. Com., 97 Va. 759, 23 S. E. Rep. 381.

a. What Necessary to Justify.—To justify the presumption of an intention to repeal one statute by another, the two statutes must be irreconcilable. Fulkerson v. Bristol, 95 Va. 1, 27 S. E. Rep. 815; Somers v. Com., 95 Va. 759, 23 S. E. Rep. 381.

B. EXPRESS.

Constitutional Provisions Not Applicable.—The provision of the constitution that no law shall be reviewed or amended by its title, etc., does not relate to the repeal of a law either by express words, or by the enactment of a subsequent law with which the former is inconsistent, and by which it is necessarily displaced. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74.

Constitutional Authority.—Authority delegated to the legislature by the constitution, which is prospective in its operation, does not operate a repeal of a law in force at the time of its adoption. Douglass v. Harrisville, 9 W. Va. 162.

1. PRESUMPTION WHERE NOT EXPRESS.—The presumption is always against the intention to repeal where express terms are not used. Davies v. Creighton, 33 Gratt. 696.

C. IMPLIED.

1. INGENERAL.—The established doctrine undoubtedly is, that repeal by implication are not favored, but when there are two acts on the same subject that are irreconcilable, the latter act prevails, and the first is repealed to the extent of the repugnancy. Justice v. Com., 81 Va. 209; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Hoard, 16 W. Va. 370; State v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 732; Conley v. Calhoun Co., 3 W. Va. 416; Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 114.

2. CONSTRUCTION FAVORED.—To repeal a statute by implication it must appear, that the latter provision is certainly and clearly hostile to the former. If by any reasonable construction the two statutes can stand together, they must so stand. State v. Enoch, 26 W. Va. 254.

3. BY REPUGNANCY.—Two inconsistent laws cannot regulate the same subject, the former ceases to be a law, while the latter prevails. Shields v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74; Conley v. Supervisors, 2 W. Va. 416.

a. Must Be Plain and Visible.—Statutes are not considered to be repealed by implication, unless the repugnancy between the new provisions and former statutes be plain and visible. Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 114; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 148; Davies v. Creighton, 33 Gratt. 696; Ryan v. Com., 80 Va. 385; Hogan v. Guigon, 29 Gratt. 706.

b. Not to Be Presumed.—A repeal by implication ought not to be presumed unless from the repugnance of the provisions the inference be necessary and unavoidable. Davies v. Creighton, 33 Gratt. 696.

c. Affirmative Statutes.—Where there are two affirmative statutes, and they do not conflict with each other, the latter does not repeal the former. Wardner v. Arell, 2 Wash. 282.

d. Repeal May Be Partial or Total.—A subsequent statute may be inconsistent with a part of a former one, and so operate as a repeal of that part by implication; or it may be wholly inconsistent with any part of the former one, so as not to repeal it but may operate to modify the construction and effect of the former law. Anderson v. Com., 18 Gratt. 295.

e. General and Special Statutes.—It is well settled that a statute, general in its terms and without negative words, will not be construed to repeal by implication the particular provisions of a former one, which is special in its application, to a particular case or class of cases unless the repugnancy be so glaring and irreconcilable as to indicate legislative intention to repeal. Chesapeake, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hoard, 16 W. Va. 370; Mason v. Harper's Ferry, etc., Co., 17 W. Va. 396; Powell v. Parkersburg, 28 W. Va. 698; Sturm v. Fleming, 31 W. Va. 701, 8 S. E. Rep. 363; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 149.

Local Statute—Effect of Enactment.—The passage of a local statute, expressly applicable to only one county of the state, in no way repeals, supersedes or affects an existing general law in the same words as the local law, unless it is applicable to all the counties of the state. Poindexter v. May, 98 Va. 143, 34 S. E. Rep. 971.

Must Be Express, or Intent Clear.—The repeal of a special statute must be either express, or the manifestation of the legislative intent, to repeal, must be so clear, as to amount to an express direction. Com. v. R. & P. R. Co., 81 Va. 355; Trehy v. Marye, 100 Va. 40, 40 S. E. Rep. 126.

f. Prescribing Exclusive Rules.—Although a subsequent statute be not repugnant, to a former one in all its provisions, yet if the latter was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule that should govern in the case provided for, it repeals the original act. Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 11.

4. BY ACT COVERING ENTIRE SUBJECT.

a. General Rule.—Where a later statute embraces the whole subject of the former, and is plainly substituted for all former laws on the subject, the former will be deemed repealed. Somers v. Com., 97 Va. 759, 33 S. E. Rep. 381; State v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 734.

b. Revisions.—A statute is repealed by implication when there is a subsequent one revising the whole subject matter of the first. Conley v. Supervisors, 2 W. Va. 416.

c. By Amendments.—When a statute is revised and a provision contained in it is omitted in the new statute, the inference to be drawn from such course of legislation is that a change in the law was intended to be made. Combined Saw, etc., Co. v. Flournoy, 88 Va. 1029, 14 S. E. Rep. 976.

Criminality of Offense Repealed.—Acts 1897-8, 745 expressly refers to act of March 5, 1888, amending it and the Code, §2148, "So as to read as follows," substituting the words of the amending act. The act of 1888, prohibited dredging on private grounds, even though it be by the owner, and prescribes a penalty; the act of 1898 prohibits dredging without attaching a penalty or making it a crime. Held, that the criminality of the offense is repealed by implication. Somers v. Com., 97 Va. 759, 33 S. E. Rep. 381.

Where Intention Is Manifest.—A subsequent statute revising the whole subject matter of a former one, and evidently intended as a substitute for it, although it contains no express words to that effect, must, on the principles of law, as well as reason and common sense, operate to repeal the former. State v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 733; Hogan v. Guigon, 29 Gratt. 705; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 126, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; Herron v. Carson, 26 W. Va. 62.

5. IMPLIED REPEAL NOT FAVORED.—The repeal of statutes by implication is not favored by the courts. Fulkerson v. Bristol, 95 Va. 1, 27 S. E. Rep. 815; Somers v. Com., 97 Va. 759, 33 S. E. Rep. 381; Augusta Nat. Bank v. Beard, 100 Va. 687, 42 S. E. Rep. 694; Davies v. Creighton, 33 Gratt. 696; Sinclair v. Young, 100 Va. 284, 40 S. E. Rep. 907; Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 1; Justice v. Com., 81 Va. 209; Warders v. Arell, 2 Wash. 282.

a. Presumption.—The repeal of statutes by implication is not favored, and the presumption is always against the intention to repeal where express terms are not used. Augusta Nat. Bank v. Beard, 100 Va. 687, 42 S. E. Rep. 694; Davies v. Creighton, 33 Gratt. 696; Sinclair v. Young, 100 Va. 284, 40 S. E. Rep. 907.

b. Repugnance Must Be Plain.—The law does not favor a repeal by implication unless the repugnance be quite plain, and then only to the extent of such repugnance. Holladay, Judge v. The Auditor, 77 Va. 429; Hogan v. Guigon, 29 Gratt. 705; Fox v. Com., 16 Gratt. 1; Justice v. Com., 81 Va. 209.

D. EFFECT.

1. GENERAL RULE.—The general rule is, that a repealed statute cannot be acted upon, after it is repealed, but as to all matters that have taken place under it, they remain valid and cannot be questioned. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 308; White v. Freeman, 79 Va. 597.

Intention to Be Manifest.—Courts will not readily intend, where the legislature enacts a general law upon a given subject and repeals an existing, general law, of like character upon the same subject, that it was the intention of the legislative, by the repeal, to deprive the parties who acquired just rights or interests under the old law of all remedy, or to extinguish their rights or interests, unless such intention is manifest. Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 114.

Continuous Operation.—Where a statute which confers either a right or remedy is repealed by a subsequent statute which substantially re-enacts the provisions of the repealed statute, so that there is no moment of time when the repealed statute was not the law, the two statutes will be regarded as one continuous law, uninterrupted in its operation. Tennant v. Divine, 24 W. Va. 387.

2. ON INTEREST UNDER REPEALED STATUTE.

a. Inchoate Rights.—Inchoate rights derived under a statute, are lost by a repeal of the statute before they are perfected, unless they are saved by express words in the repealing statute. Crawford v. Halsted, 20 Gratt. 211.

b. Past or Closed Rights.—Acts done under a statute while in force, remains valid, though the statute may afterwards be repealed, but the rule goes no farther than to render valid, things actually done. Crawford v. Halsted, 20 Gratt. 211.

3. ON PENDING INTEREST.

a. Remedies.—If the repealing act does not substantially re-enact a section of the law repealed, which gave the right of action, and there is no saving clause as to pending suits and no general law on the subject, the legislative intent is clear that all suits brought upon the repealed act fall, unless carried into judgment. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

What Constructions Not Favored.—A construction which repeals former statutes or laws by implication and divests long approved remedies, is not favored in any case. Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 114.

Proceedings Determined.—Where a statute providing a remedy is repealed while the proceedings are pending, such proceedings are thereby determined unless the legislature shall otherwise provide. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 664, 10 S. E. Rep. 1005.

And a right of action, which does not exist at common law but depends solely upon statute, falls with the repeal of the statute without a saving clause or a general law saving pending suits, unless that right has been carried into judgment. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

b. Contracts.

Re-Enactment Validates.—Where one has lost a remedy, given or permitted to him, by statute, after which loss the right is again extended, it is valid, and does not impair the obligation of the contract. Caperton v. Martin, 4 W. Va. 138.

c. Jurisdiction.—Where a statute confers jurisdiction on a court, and which is repealed without any reservation or exception, the jurisdiction to such court is taken away and cannot be exercised. State v. Brookover, 22 W. Va. 214.

d. Penalties and Forfeitures.—No penalty can be enforced after the repeal of the law imposing it, unless saved by express words in the repealing act. White v. Freeman, 79 Va. 597.

Different Penalty—Failure to Repeal.—A statute passed in the session of assembly of 1827-8 prescribing a new punishment for an offense committed after the first of May 1828, does not repeal former statutes, defining the offense, and prescribing other punishment for the same, as to such offense committed before May 1st, 1828. Com. v. Pegram, 1 Leigh 569.

Right to Penalty Extinguished.—Where a statute repeals a former one which imposed a penalty, the right to the penalty is extinguished even though a prosecution for it has been previously commenced. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

Repeal after Conviction Arrests Judgment.—Where there is a criminal prosecution under a statute, which is repealed after conviction, the judgment is thereby arrested. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

Applicable to Civil Cases.—Code 1873, ch. 15, § 13, providing that if by a new law repealing a former law, any penalty, forfeiture or punishment be mitigated by any provision of the new law, such provision may, with the consent of the parties affected, be applied to any judgment pronounced after the new law takes effect, applies to forfeitures in civil as well as criminal cases. White v. Freeman, 79 Va. 597.

Offender Released.—Where an offense is made a felony by statute, and the statute is afterwards repealed, no proceeding after the repeal can be had for an offense committed under it unless the repealing statute has a proviso enabling the proceeding for offenses committed before. Scutt v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 54; Com. v. Leftwich, 5 Rand. 657; Attoo v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 388.

4. OF REPEAL AND RE-ENACTMENT.

Similar Remedy.—When a statutory remedy for a right created by that statute is repealed, but the repealing statute provides a substantially similar remedy, the right may be prosecuted under the repealing statute. Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208.

Continuous Operation.—Where a statute repeals and re-enacts the provisions of the former law such provisions re-enacted, are considered, as never ceasing to operate. Burns v. Hays, 44 W. Va. 503, 30 S. E. Rep. 101; Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 208; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470; State v. Brookover, 38 W. Va. 141, 18 S. E. Rep. 476.

Code Provisions Applicable.—Code 1887, § 4202, which provides for the repeal of all acts of a general nature upon the adoption of the Code, repealed the act of March 9, 1880, relating to the action of ejectment in certain counties, which act is a general law. Carter v. Edwards, 88 Va. 205, 13 S. E. Rep. 353.

5. OF REPEAL OF REPEALING ACT.

Repeal Not to Revive Former Law.—When a law which has repealed another shall itself be repealed, the previous law shall not be revived without express words to that effect, unless the law repealing it be passed during the same session. Va. Code, 1887, § 7; Proudfitt v. Murry, 1 Call 394; Booth v. Com., 16 Gratt. 519; Crawford v. Halsted, 20 Gratt. 211.

Omissions Not Revived.—When a statute is revised, or one act framed from another and some parts are omitted, the omitted parts are not revived by construction, but are annulled. Combined Saw etc., Co. v. Flournoy, 88 Va. 1029, 14 S. E. Rep. 976.

Qualifying Statute.—An express repeal of a subsequent qualifying statute will restore the prohibition in the former general statute to its original force, and it will then operate as though the qualifying statute had never existed. McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134.

a. Common Law Revived.—When a statute is repealed which itself repealed the common law, the common law is thereby revived. Insurance Co. of Valley of Va. v. Barley, 16 Gratt. 363; Booth v. Com., 16 Gratt. 519; Nickels v. Kane, 82 Va. 312; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 142; Moseley v. Brown, 76 Va. 419; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470.

(1) Code Provisions Not Applicable.—If an act repealing a provision of the common law is itself repealed, the common law is revived, but the act, Va. Code, ch. 16, § 19, p. 102, applies to statutes and not to the common law. Booth v. Com., 16 Gratt. 519; Insurance Co. of Valley of Va. v. Barley, 16 Gratt. 363; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. Rep. 470.

Thomas Pollard v. The Commonwealth.

June, 1827.

Criminal Law—Competency of Jurors—Opinion Formed*

—Case at Bar.—A juror, who having heard the testimony of a witness in the cause, and then formed an opinion on it, and was doubtful whether he had expressed the opinion or not, though he thought it most probable he had expressed it, but declared that at the time of the trial he had no prejudice against the prisoner or his cause, and that he could, as he believed, give the prisoner as fair a trial as if he had not any thing on the subject, is an impartial juror, and a challenge against him for cause ought to be overruled.

This was an application for a Writ of Error to a judgment of the Superior Court of Law for the county of Cumberland, whereby the petitioner was sentenced to confinement in the Penitentiary-house for the term of five years, having been convicted of murder in the second degree. The application was founded on an alleged error in the Court's refusal to sustain the prisoner's challenge for cause of John H. Parker, a juror summoned to try him, and for putting him to his peremptory challenge. The prisoner filed a bill of exceptions, which stated that in the progress of the cause, John H. Parker was called as a juror, and upon being sworn to answer questions, said "that he heard one of the witnesses testify in the case

660 "of the prisoner in the Called Court: that he did not know that he heard all the evidence given by that witness: that upon the evidence of the said witness, he formed an opinion at the time: that he did not know that he expressed it, or that he did not, but thinks it most probable that he did express it: that he had no prejudice against the prisoner, or his cause at this time, (that is, at the time of the trial,) and that he believed he could give the prisoner as fair a trial as if he had never heard any thing on the subject, and that if he was capable of giving him a fair and impartial trial before he heard any thing of his case, he could do the like now."

Under the above circumstances, the Court ruled and determined that the said Parker was a good juror, and that the prisoner must take him as such, or peremptorily challenge him. He did peremptorily challenge him, and excepted to the opinion of the Court.

The General Court, after conferring on the subject, decided that the said Parker was an impartial juror, and could not be challenged for cause, and overruled the application for a Writ of Error.

The Commonwealth v. William Carver.

June, 1827.

Superior Court Judgment—Effect of General Court—Judgment on.—In general, the judgment of a Superior Court, although in favor of a prisoner, ought to yield to that of the General Court, expressed in an analogous case.

Criminal Law—Competency of Jurors—Opinion Formed.—See on this subject, foot-note to Com. v. Hallstock, 2 Gratt. 564; foot-note to Jackson v. Com., 23 Gratt. 920; monographic note on "Juries" appended to Chahoon v. Com., 20 Gratt. 733.

The principal case is cited on the subject in Brown v. Com., 2 Leigh 778; Jackson v. Com., 23 Gratt. 930, 933; State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 324, 10 S. E. Rep. 641; foot-note to Com. v. Hughes, 5 Rand. 655 (containing an excerpt from State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 324, 10 S. E. Rep. 641).

Unlawful Shooting—Statutes—Application of.—A negro slave is a person on whom a free person may commit the offence of malicious or unlawful shooting, stabbing, &c. under the act against those of fences, passed 9th February, 1819.

This was an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Cumberland. The prisoner was indicted for feloniously, maliciously, and unlawfully shooting, with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill, a negro man slave of the name 661 "of Armistead, the property of Andrew Houston. The indictment was framed on the act against shooting, stabbing, maiming and disfiguring, passed 9th February, 1819. He was convicted by the jury, and on being brought up to receive his sentence, he moved the Court to arrest the judgment, on the ground that the act of Assembly "does not make it a felony for a free white man to shoot a negro slave, the property of any free man." The Judge of the Court "being inclined to the opinion that a negro slave is not a subject, or person on which the offence created, and the penalties prescribed by the first and second sections of the act, can be committed or incurred, and feeling some doubt as to the obligation imposed upon him by the decision of the General Court in Dolly Chapple's Case, doth, with the consent of the prisoner, adjourn to the General Court for its decision, the following questions: 1. In a criminal prosecution, wherein the judgment of the presiding Judge, if given in favor of the prisoner, would acquit him of the offence of which he was indicted, should such Judge pronounce judgment according to his own opinion, or is it the duty of such Judge in such case to suffer his opinion to be overruled by the previous opinion and judgment of the General Court, in any analogous case? If the first branch of this question be decided in the affirmative, and the second in the negative, no further question is adjourned; but if otherwise, then is adjourned, 2dly, Should judgment be arrested in the present case? And is a negro slave a subject or person on whom a free person can commit the offence created by the 1st and 2d sections of the act against Mayhem?"

BROCKENBROUGH, J. delivered the opinion of the General Court. He stated the case, and then said:

In answer to the first question, it may be remarked, that the whole system of our judicial polity is founded on the idea that the Inferior Tribunals are bound by 662 the decisions "of the Supreme Appellate Tribunal. There should be an uniformity of construction of the same law throughout the State, and this cannot be attained, without giving to the Appellate Court a superintending and controlling influence over the judgments of the Inferior Courts. It is not denied, that if the decision of the Highest Tribunal has been made by a divided Court, or upon a first impression, or it becomes doubtful whether the decision will be adhered to, upon a re-consideration of it, the Inferior Judge, †See principal case cited in State v. Harr, 38 W. Va. 64, 17 S. E. Rep. 796; foot-note to Com. v. Lester, 2 Va. Cas. 198, containing an extract from State v. Harr, 38 W. Va. 64, 17 S. E. Rep. 799. See also, Com. v. Chapple, 1 Va. Cas. 184.

if he thinks it erroneous, may adjourn the question again, or may give a judgment contrary to it, for the purpose of having it re-viewed by the Supreme Tribunal. But, in general, the decision ought to be respected and obeyed. The same rule ought to prevail in Criminal as in Civil cases. If a construction of a law favorable to the accused, has been given by the General Court, there can be no doubt that the Judge of the Circuit Court ought not to disturb it; and if one unfavorable to him has been rendered, there is, perhaps, a stronger reason why the Circuit Court should yield its own opinion. In the former case, if the Circuit Judge refuses to carry into effect the decision of the General Court, the prisoner may except to his opinion, and his judgment may be re-viewed, and another opportunity will thereby be afforded to the Appellate Tribunal to re-consider its own opinion, but in the latter case, if the former decision of the General Court is disregarded, the case is at an end, because the Commonwealth's Attorney cannot except to any opinion of the Court; nor will a Writ of Error lie in behalf of the Commonwealth to an erroneous judgment of a Court given in favor of a prisoner.

This brings us to the second question, namely: Whether, under our present act against Mayhems, a free person shall be deemed guilty of felony, who maliciously or unlawfully shoots a slave?

Dolly Chapple's Case, 1 Virg. Cases, 184, was decided by the unanimous judgment of the seven Judges who were present, after an argument from the counsel for the 663 prisoner, "and the Commonwealth. That decision was founded on the act of 1803, which declared, that "whosoever shall wilfully, maliciously, and of purpose stab, or shoot another," with intention, &c. such offender shall be sentenced to a confinement in the Penitentiary, &c. The Court decided that a slave was a person on whom the offence of stabbing and shooting might be committed, and that the act was intended to protect slaves as well as free persons from such outrages. The same language is used in the act of 1819; and as the Legislature had the decision in Dolly Chapple's Case before them when they revised all the laws on the subject of Mayhem, and did not think proper to use plain words by which to exclude slaves from the protection of the act, we are of opinion that the same construction should now be adhered to, as in that case.

It has been supposed, however, that the words "being free," in the present act, do shew an intention in the Legislature to exclude slaves from the operation of the act. To give it this effect, however, it is necessary to dislodge the words "being free," from their present place in the section, and place them immediately after the word "whosoever," in the beginning. Thus transposed, the act would read thus: "Whosoever being free, shall shoot or stab another;" and it is supposed that the word another, has relation to the words "being free," so as to declare that whosoever being free shall shoot or stab another. being free, such offender shall be punished in the way provided for by the act. We do not see the necessity for such a violent transposition of the words of the section. Placed as they are by the Legislature, they seem to be as plain as language can be made. There are in this country two classes of offenders, as to whom, the Legislature, from motives of public policy, have thought proper to prescribe different punishments for the same offence: these are the free man, and the slave. The former may be sent to the Penitentiary, the latter may not. The Legislature, therefore, thought it necessary in the revival of 1819, to make a distinction

664 *between these two classes of offenders, and in the act under discussion. they have appropriated the two first sections to a specification of the acts declared felonious, and to a denunciation of a certain punishment on free persons who commit those offences; and the third section provides a different punishment for the slave who shall commit either of the offences in the two first sections mentioned. The language of the act then is plainly this: that "whosoever" that is, whatever person "shall shoot, or stab another," that is, another person, "every such offender being free, his or her counsellors, aiders and abettors, being free," shall be a felon, and punished by confinement in the Penitentiary; but, if any slave shall commit any of the said offences, he is declared a felon, and shall suffer as in case of felony.

It has also been supposed, that the proviso in the first and second sections proves, that the Legislature did not intend that a free person shall be punished for maiming a slave. This objection, or a similar one, was made in Dolly Chapple's Case, and overruled. The giving an action to the party grieved, as in case of trespass, was intended as a benefit to him; but, the incapacity of a slave to bring an action, and his consequent inability to receive the benefit, should not exempt the guilty person from the punishment provided by law for the offence. An alien enemy is entitled to protection, whilst he is permitted to remain in the country, yet he cannot maintain an action during the war: it cannot for a moment be supposed that he may be shot, stabbed, disfigured or disabled, without subjecting the offender to the other pains and penalties of the act.

The other proviso is, that the party grieved shall be a competent witness. The case before mentioned explains why this provision was made in the act of 1803. It appears to have been copied into the act of 1819, without any necessity, because the law which gave a part of the fine to the person grieved, being changed, there could not be any interest in him which would render him an incompetent

665 *witness: but, the carelessness of the draftsman of the bill, in retaining an unnecessary proviso, affords no reason for believing that the Legislature intended to exclude the persons of slaves from the protection of the act. If such had been their intention, it would have been easy to have made the exclusion by a direct provision, instead of leaving it to a far-fetched inference.

The distinction between free persons and slaves, was present to the legislative mind: they provided a different punishment for the two classes, when they were offenders. If they had intended to make the same distinction as to the persons offended against, they would have employed the same clear language.

It may further be remarked, that there appears no reason, arising from the relative situation of master and slave, why a free person should not be punished as a felon for maiming a slave. Whatever power our laws may give to a master over his slave, it is as important for the interest of the former, as for the safety of the latter, that a stranger should not be permitted to exercise an unrestrained and lawless authority over him. It is for the benefit of the master, and consoling to his feelings, that a third person should be restrained under the pains and penalties of felony, from maiming and disabling his slave.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

This Court is of opinion, and doth decide, 1. That it is true as a general proposition, that in a criminal prosecution, wherein the judgment of the presiding Judge, if given in favor of the prisoner, would acquit him of the offence for which he is indicted, the Judge of the Circuit Court ought to suffer his individual opinion to be overruled by the previous opinion and judgment of the General Court in an analogous case; and particularly, that the decision of the General Court in Dolly Chapple's Case, ought to have such controlling influence in this case.

666 *2. That the judgment ought not to be arrested in the present case; and that a negro slave is a subject or person, on whom a free person can commit the offence created by the first and second sections of the act, intituled "an act to reduce into one act, the several acts against malicious and unlawful shooting, stabbing, maiming and disfiguring," passed February 9th, 1819; which is ordered to be certified to the Superior Court of Law for Cumberland county.

Richard B. Courtney v. The Commonwealth.
June, 1837.

Evidence—Bank Teller's Book—Effect.—The book of a teller in a bank is not per se evidence to establish the facts appearing in that book, but may be given in evidence in connection with the evidence of the teller himself, if the said teller's evidence make it proper to refer to it, to prove that a particular entry was made. [This was in a prosecution for forgery.]

Bill of Exceptions—What It Must Show.—The bill of exceptions ought to shew clearly, that such book was offered in evidence in connection with the teller's evidence; otherwise, it will not be so presumed.

This was a Writ of Error to a judgment of the Superior Court of Henrico. The plaintiff in error was tried on an indictment *Evidence.—See generally, monographic note on "Evidence" appended to Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276.

*Bill of Exceptions—What It Must Show.—In Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 679, 10 S. E. Rep. 840, the court held that nothing that transpired during the trial in the court below would be considered a part of the record unless made so by a bill of exceptions ment for the forgery of a check for ten dollars, purporting to be drawn by one John Allen, jr. on the Cashier of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia; he was convicted and sentenced. At the trial, six exceptions were taken to the opinion of the Court, on questions arising therein; all of these were embodied in one bill: it is deemed proper to state two of those points only, on one of which the judgment was reversed, there being no error in the others. The bill stated, that "on the trial a witness was introduced, who stated, that he was paying-teller of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, and was such teller on 667 the day *on which the offence charged in the indictment was alleged to have been committed, and for some years before, and ever since, and as such, in the constant practice of paying checks drawn on the said Bank; and proved that the check, on which the indictment was founded, was paid at the said Bank; to the admission of which evidence the counsel for the prisoner excepted, there being no other proof than the statement of the said witness, that he the said witness was what he represented himself, and no evidence except his own that he was properly authorised to pay checks on the said Bank, which objection was overruled."

"On the same trial, a book, said by the last mentioned witness to be in his own hand-writing, and to be the book in which he the said witness daily entered the names of the persons, whose orders or checks were paid at the said Bank, and the amount of such checks was offered in evidence by the Attorney for the Commonwealth, to the admission of which evidence the accused also objected, which objection, however, was overruled by the Court, who permitted it to go to the jury."

In discussing this subject in conference, the Judges were of opinion, that it did not sufficiently appear from the bill of exceptions, that the teller's book was offered in evidence in connection with the evidence of the teller himself, and that therein there was error. From this opinion, the Judge who had sat in the Court below dissented, being of opinion that, taking both exceptions together, that fact did sufficiently appear.

The following was entered as the opinion of the Court.

It seems to the Court here, that there was error in so much of the judgment of the Superior Court as is set forth by the following words in the bill of exceptions, to wit: "On the same trial, a book, &c." the Court being of opinion that the said book was not per se evidence, and it not appearing that the said book was offered in evidence in connection with the evi-or order of the court; and that the mere statement in the record that certain pleas were rejected and that parties excepted to various rulings of the court is not sufficient. The principal case, Row v. Kille, 1 Leigh 216; White v. Toncray, 9 Leigh 347; Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591; Bowyer v. Hewitt, 2 Gratt. 198; Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Gratt. 1; Fitzhugh v. dence of the teller, for the purpose 668 *of proving that the check in the said bill of exceptions mentioned was entered as paid in that book by the said teller. It is, therefore, considered by the Court, that the judgment aforesaid be reversed and annulled, and this Court proceeding to give such judgment as the said Superior Court ought to have given, it is further considered that the verdict of the jury be set aside, and that a Venire Facias de novo be awarded, and a new trial granted to the prisoner, on which new trial the said book is not to be offered in evidence per se, to establish the facts appearing in that book, but may be given in evidence in connection with the evidence of the teller, if the evidence of the teller make it proper that the said book should be referred to, to establish the fact that any particular entry is therein made.

Charles Wortham v. The Commonwealth.*

November, 1827.

Criminal Law—Trespass—Indictment—Sufficiency of.

—In an Indictment for a trespass or misdemeanor, it is not necessary to insert the name or surname of a prosecutor at the foot of the Indictment, if it appears that the Indictment was found true on the evidence of a witness sent to the Grand Jury either at their own request, or by direction of the Court, and this whether there was a previous presentment or not.

Same—Prosecutor.—A volunteer informer ought to be made a prosecutor, and liable for costs in case of failure; but one who is compelled to be an informer, cannot be considered a prosecutor.

Same—Gaming—Indictment—Sufficiency of.—An Indictment, which charges that unlawful gaming is carried on at a house of public resort, is good.

Same—Dismissal of Presentment—Effect.—The dismissal of a presentment by the Court, at the instance of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, is not an acquittal. It is an informal Nolle Prosequi.

Same—Felon—How Acquitted.—There are only three ways by which even a felon can be acquitted: they are, the judgment of the Examining Court, the verdict of the jury, or the failure to indict after three terms of the Superior Court have passed.

Same—Retraxit.—A dismissal of a presentment is not a retraxit, nor is a retraxit known to the criminal law, where the prosecution is carried on by the commonwealth.

Same—Plea of Autrefois Acquit—Sufficiency of.—A plea of Autrefois acquit, which does not set forth the Court, nor the time, nor other circumstances of the trial or acquittal, nor vouch the record, nor shew it, if of another Court, should be rejected on motion. The Attorney ought not to be required, either to plead or demur to it.

At the Hustings Court for the City of Richmond, in May, 1827, an indictment was preferred to the Grand Jury by the Attorney for the Commonwealth

670 against Charles *Wortham, for unlawful gaming at faro, and was found “a true bill.” It charged that he, on the 10th February, 1827, unlawfully did game by playing at a game called faro, a game played with cards, at a house of public resort, called the Chocolate House, on Twelfth street in the said City of Richmond, and within the jurisdiction aforesaid, contrary to the form of the act, &c. At the foot of the Indictment was written as follows:

“Wm. H. Allen, the witness called on, sworn and sent to the Grand Jury by the Court, on the motion of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, and certified by order of Court. (Signed) Th: C. Howard, Clk.”
The defendant having been summoned, appeared and moved the Court to quash the Indictment. The ground of this motion was, that there was no prosecutor's name and surname written at the foot of the Indictment, it not appearing from the records in the Court that the said bill of Indictment was sent to the Grand Jury, who found the same in consequence of a previous presentment by a Grand Jury, made on the information of any two of their own body, or the testimony of a witness, called on either by the Court, or the Grand Jury.
The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted to the opinion of the Court.

He moved the Court to quash the Indictment on another ground: that the Indictment has not followed the words of the statute. This was also overruled, and the defendant against excepted.

The defendant then pleaded, that a presentment was made against him on the 26th February, 1827, at the Court of Hustings for the City of Richmond, for the same identical offence charged in the Indictment; and that, on the 25th May, 1827, on the motion of the Attorney for the Commonwealth in this Court, it was ordered, that the said presentment be dismissed;
and thereupon, the said defendant was discharged, and he vouched the record, and so, he concludes, that he has been heretofore wholly acquitted of the said offence, &c. To this plea, the Attorney for 671 *the Commonwealth, after craving oyer of the record in the plea mentioned, demurred, and the defendant joined in demurrer, and the Court sustained the demurrer, and overruled the plea.

The defendant also tendered two other pleas, in the first of which he set forth that on the 26th February, 1827, a certain presentment was made against him by the Grand Jury in the said Court for the same identical offence charged in the said Indictment, and that afterwards, the defendant having appeared to answer the same, the Attorney for the Commonwealth withdrew the prosecution of the said presentment, and he vouched the record. The second plea was, that the general one that he had been heretofore acquitted, and discharged of the same offence now charged against him, without vouching the record. The Attorney for the Commonwealth, moved the Court to exclude both of these pleas, which was done, and the defendant excepted. The defendant then pleaded not guilty, and issue being joined on it, a verdict was rendered for the Commonwealth, and judgment pronounced against the defendant.

The defendant then applied for, and obtained a Writ of Error to the judgment of the Hastings Court, from the Superior Court of Henrico, and an issue having been made up on the said Writ of Error, that Court adjourned to this Court the following questions: "Ought the judgment of the said Hastings Court against the plaintiff (in error) to be reversed by this Court for any of the reasons set forth in the petition, or appearing on the record?"

The case was argued by Nicholas and Williams, for the plaintiff in error, and by the Attorney General and Mayo, for the Commonwealth.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

1. In this case, an Indictment was found against the plaintiff in error, and at the foot of it were written these words: "Wm. H. Allen, the witness called on, sworn and sent to the Grand Jury by the Court, on the motion of the Attorney for the Commonwealth. Th: C. Howard, Clk." The person indicted moved the Court to quash the Indictment, because there is no prosecutor's name and surname written at the foot of the Indictment, it not appearing from the records of the Court that the said bill of Indictment was sent to the Grand Jury, who found the same in consequence of a previous presentment by a Grand Jury, made on the information of any two of their own body, or the testimony of a witness, called on either by the Court, or the Grand Jury, which motion the Court overruled, although there was no such presentment, and an exception was taken to that opinion of the Court. Whether it was right or wrong, depends on the construction of the 45th, 46th and 47th sections of the act concerning criminal proceedings. 1 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 611. The first remark to be made is, that this law cannot properly be denominated a penal statute; it neither defines, nor creates any criminal offence, nor prescribes a punishment for one. It merely directs how certain proceedings shall be carried on in trespasses and misdemeanors, preparatory to their introduction into Court. There is no reason why, in construing such an act, we should stick to the letter, nor why we should not carry into effect the obvious intention of the Legislature.

The 45th section provides, that the name and surname of the prosecutor, and the town or county in which he shall reside, with his title or profession, shall be written at the foot of every bill of Indictment for any trespass, or misdemeanor, before it be presented to the Grand Jury; and the 46th section provides, that where the defendant is acquitted, &c. the prosecutor shall be liable for the costs. It seems sufficiently clear, that these two sections apply to the case of a volunteer witness, who, believing that he himself, or some person connected with him has been injured, undertakes of his own accord to invoke the justice of his country. But, as the motives of men are various, and it is difficult to decide whether a voluntary informer be influenced by a sense of justice, or swayed by a malicious design to oppress, or harass his neighbour, the Legislature thought it proper to guard against the prevalence of this wicked motive, and to prevent vexatious prosecutions, by requiring that the volunteer should be named as prosecutor, and that in case of his defeat he should pay to his adversary his costs. But, there are many offences injurious to public morals and to the public peace, in the punishment of which no individual feels sufficient interest to bring them before the proper tribunals, and unless the functionaries of justice notice them, no restraint will be imposed on their commission. Courts and Grand Juries are conservators of the peace, and guardians of the public morals. Grand Juries are especially required by the sanction of an oath, to present all offences, and presentments are directed to be made on the knowledge of any two of their body; they are thus compelled to be informers, but if for this information they are to be subjected to the payment of costs (in case of the failure of the prosecution,) then there may be reason to fear that they will be induced, contrary to their duty and their oaths, to withhold their information. So, too, the Court or Grand Jury may have good reason to believe that an individual can prove the commission of an offence which ought to be enquired into: he is unwilling to give evidence, but he is commanded by the process of the Court to become a witness: he cannot be called a prosecutor, nor ought he to be subjected to a penalty for doing that which he is compelled to do by the constituted authorities of his country. It was to protect these two classes of involuntary witnesses, that the 47th section was enacted. The first proviso of that section declares, that when a presentment shall be made by the Grand Jury on the knowledge of two of their own body, or when a presentment shall be made on the testimony of a witness called on either by the Court, or by the Grand Jury, then neither the informing Grand Jurors, nor the witness so called on, shall be liable to costs.

A presentment in a large sense is an Indictment, for every Indictment is a presentment; the very words of the proviso then include an Indictment made on the testimony of a witness called on by the Court, or by the Grand Jury: and does not the reason of the enactment, include the case of an Indictment? Can any reason be assigned why the involuntary witness, on whose compulsory evidence an informal presentment is made, should not be deemed a prosecutor, nor liable to costs, while he, on whose compulsory evidence, a formal and regular presentment is made, is to be deemed a prosecutor, and liable to those penalties? Or, could the Legislature have intended to make a difference between the liability of such witness, because in the one case the Grand Jury themselves prepare the charge from his evidence, and in the other case they adopt the charge already prepared for them, and sent to them with the witness? The Grand Jury may undoubtedly make a presentment in all respects as full and formal as an Indictment preferred by the regular officer of the Court, and the only difference between them in such case is, that the former is signed by the foreman, the latter is endorsed by the foreman, under the words "a true bill." Such a minute difference in form cannot make so great a difference in the character and liability of the witness. It has, however, been argued, that as the Legislature used the word presentment in the second proviso of this section, in the restricted sense of a charge prepared by themselves, they ought to be considered as having used it in the same restricted sense in the first proviso, and it is admitted that there is plausibility in the argument: but, as we know that it is legally and technically used in both senses, and as the consequence of so restricting it would defeat the intention of the Legislature, we cannot hesitate in giving it the enlarged meaning.

675 *It cannot be doubted, that it is within the power of every conservator of the peace, to recognize a person who has committed an outrage on the peace of society, to appear before the next Court to answer an Indictment to be preferred against him, and to recognize the witnesses also to appear and testify. If the construction contended for, by the plaintiff in error, be given to this clause, then if no person is willing to become the prosecutor, one of these two results must happen; either the Indictment cannot be sent to the Grand Jury at all, or the witnesses must first be sent to the Grand Jury to enable them to make a presentment, and then the Indictment being preferred in consequence of the previous presentment, the witnesses must be a second time sent to the Grand Jury to enable them to find the bill. The first would defeat public justice, and render abortive the admitted and useful power belonging to the conservators of the peace; the second would procrastinate the proceedings of the Court, and harass the Grand Jury with a double examination, which is totally unnecessary. The Legislature could not have designed that this circuitous route should be taken, when the direct path lay before them. We are of opinion, that the Court were right in refusing to quash the Indictment on this ground. In this opinion, however, two of our brethren (Bouldin and Field) do not concur.

2. The Indictment, which is under the gaming act, charged the defendant with playing at a game called faro, at a house of public resort. &c. The plaintiff in error moved the Court to quash the Indictment, because it has not followed the words of the statute. The variance alleged is, that the 5th section of the act prohibits the playing in an ordinary, race-field, or any other public place, which last are not the exact words of the Indictment. The act undoubtedly prohibits the playing at a tavern, which is both an ordinary, and a public place. The 16th section declares, that every house of public resort shall be deemed and taken to be a tavern, 676 within the true intent and meaning *of the act. If the Indictment had charged the playing to be at a tavern, it would have been good, because a tavern is ex vi termini a public place, nor has any authority been shewn to prove, that it would be necessary to lay it under a scilicet. But, a house of public resort is by the law a tavern, and therefore, a public place. The charge is laid in the very words of the 16th section, and is as correct as if laid in the words of the 5th. The Court properly refused to quash on this ground.

3. The defendant then pleaded Auterfois acquit, and in his plea he set forth, that he had been presented for the same offence in the same Court, on a day certain, and that on another day certain, at the instance of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, it was ordered, for reasons appearing to the Court, that the said presentment be dismissed; and thereupon, (the plea alleged,) that the said defendant was discharged, and thereof went thence without day, and he vouched the record. The Attorney for the Commonwealth cravedoyer of the record, (which is set out, and shews that the presentment was dismissed by the Court at the instance of the Attorney,) and demurred to the plea. This demurrer brings on the question, whether the dismissal of the presentment be an acquittal. In this order for a dismissal, there is no judgment that he be thereof acquitted, and go hence without day, nor is it believed that there is any mode by which a prisoner, even in case of felony, can be acquitted of the offence with which he stands indicted, unless by the judgment of the Examining Court, or by the verdict of a jury, or the failure to indict him after three terms of the Superior Court have passed. This dismissal is an informal Nolle Prosequi, which is never considered in England as an acquittal, (1 Chitty's Cr. Law, p. 480,) and was so decided here in Lindsay's Case, 2 Virg. Cas. p. 345. The demurrer was properly sustained.

4. The defendant then pleaded, that he had been presented for the same identical offence in the same Court, and that on a day certain afterwards, the Attorney 677 for the *Commonwealth withdrew the prosecution of the presentment, and he vouched the record. The Court, on the motion of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, rejected the plea. This Court is of opinion, that the decision was correct for two reasons. 1. Because the record which was vouched, shewed there was no retraxit, but a simple dismissal, or Nolle Prosequi. 2. Because a retraxit is believed to be unknown to the criminal law, at least as far as it regards a prosecution at the suit of the Commonwealth, although it is used in England in cases of appeal, which is a prosecution carried on at the suit of an individual. As was well observed at the bar, this power of a retraxit is a dispensing power, and the law has not entrusted it to a prosecuting attorney.

5. The defendant also pleaded, that he had been theretofore acquitted of the same offence. This plea is general; does not set forth the Court in which, nor the time when, nor any other circumstance of the prosecution, trial, or acquittal: nor did he vouch the record of the same Court, nor shew the record of acquittal, if of another Court. This was necessary to be done according to the decision in Myers's Case, 1 Virg. Cas. p. 230. The attorney could do nothing else than when he has done. He could not plead nul tiel record, because no record was vouched or shewn; and it would not have been proper to demur, since he might thereby have admitted the truth of the plea. The Court, according to Myers's Case, pa. 232, did right to overrule the plea.

For these reasons, the following judgment is to be entered.

This Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the judgment of the Hustings Court in the record mentioned, ought not to be reversed for any of the reasons set forth in the petition, or appearing in the record; which is ordered to be certified to the Superior Court of Law for Henrico county.

I. DEFINITIONS.

A. AT COMMON LAW.—The common-law offense of robbery is, "the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value, by violence or putting in fear." Houston v. Com., 87 Va. 257, 12 S. E. Rep. 385.

B. ROBBERY OF CROP BY EMPLOYEE.—Where landowner contracts with one to crop his land and give him part of crop, after paying all advances, and crop has not been divided, the cropper is a mere employee: the ownership of the entire crop is in the landowner, and if cropper forcibly, or against consent of landowner, takes the crop from possession of latter, such taking is larceny, robbery or other offense, according to the circumstances of the case. Parrish v. Com., 81 Va. 1.

II. DISTINCTION.

A. ROBBERY DISTINGUISHED FROM SIMPLE LARCENY.—In this state the distinction between simple larceny and larceny from the person, except where it is accompanied with such force and fear as will raise the crime to robbery, does not exist, and all larceny, not amounting to robbery, is simple larceny. State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 789.

III. WHAT CONSTITUTES ROBBERY.

A. INTENT.—To constitute a robbery it is not necessary that the prisoner should intend to appropriate the property to his own use. If he intended to deprive the prosecutor of his property that is sufficient. Jordan v. Com., 25 Gratt. 948.

B. EXISTENCE OF INTENT AT TIME OF TAKING.—The prisoner is prosecuted for the robbery of a pistol. If he snatched the pistol from the hands of the prosecutor simply to prevent the prosecutor from using it against his assailants, without at the time intending to appropriate it, though he afterwards take it away and sell it, this is not robbery of the pistol; though he and others went together to the house of the prosecutor for the purpose of committing a robbery. But, in such case, if the accused when he snatched the pistol, had the intention to deprive the owner of it, though he may have also had the purpose to prevent the use of it by him, this is robbery. Jordan v. Com., 25 Gratt. 948.

IV. ATTEMPTS.

A. MURDER IN ATTEMPTING ROBBERY.—On an indictment for murder, simply, one may be convicted of murder in the commission of, or attempt to commit, robbery. Robertson v. Com., 1 Va. Dec. 851.

1. GRADE OF THE CRIME.—And one who kills another in the attempt to commit or commission of robbery, is guilty of murder in the first degree. Robertson v. Com., 1 Va. Dec. 851.

V. THE INDICTMENT.

A. GOOD AT COMMON LAW, GOOD UNDER STATUTE.—The Virginia statute, § 3874, does not define the offense of robbery, but only regulates its punishment; and an indictment good at common law is good under the statute. Houston v. Com., 87 Va. 257, 12 S. E. Rep. 385.

1. SUFFICIENT AT COMMON LAW.—So, an indictment alleging the felonious and forcible taking by the accused from the person of another, of goods and money of a named value, by violence and putting him in fear, and that such goods and money were the property of such other persons, is a sufficient charge of robbery at common law. Houston v. Commonwealth, 87 Va. 257, 12 S. E. Rep. 385.

B. BAD FOR ROBBERY, GOOD FOR ASSAULT.—An indictment may be fatally defective as an indictment for robbery, but good for assault. Hence, if such indictment attempts to charge the offense of robbery, and is bad for that offense, and properly charges an assault, it is good for the lesser offense, and a motion to quash such an indictment is rightly overruled. State v. Howes, 26 W. Va. 114.

1. VERDICT GOOD FOR LESSER OFFENSE.—And on an indictment for robbery, charging that the prisoners "did make an assault" upon one G., and one gold watch, etc., from the person and against the will of G., etc., "feloniously and violently did steal," etc., the jury acquitted the prisoners of the felony charged, but found them guilty of "assault and battery." On motion in arrest of judgment, it was held, the finding was valid under ch. 208, § 27 of the Code. Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 592; State v. Howes, 26 W. Va. 110.

2. WORD "FELONIOUS" NECESSARY.—At common law, it seems, the indictment for robbery should necessarily allege that the assault was "feloniously" made. Houston v. Com., 87 Va. 265, 12 S. E. Rep. 385; Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 592.

C. DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.—In Moody v. State, 1 W. Va. 337, an indictment charging accused with the robbery of "thirty United States notes for the payment of divers sums of money, amounting in the whole to the sum of $260, of the value of $260," was held to sufficiently describe the property taken.

And in State v. Jackson, 26 W. Va. 250, it was held, that an indictment for robbery which described the property taken as "silver coin of the value of $2.00" was sufficient.

VI. CLERK'S CHARGE TO JURY.

Where indictment charges accused with robbery by presenting of fire arms, it is proper to charge the jury that if they find him guilty as alleged in the indictment, they should fix his punishment according to the provisions of the first clause of § 3874, Code 1887. Houston v. Commonwealth, 87 Va. 257, 12 S. E. Rep. 385.

VII. EVIDENCE.

A. ADMISSIBILITY.

Irrelevant Matter.—On a trial for robbery occurring at 10.30 p. m. a half mile from depot, evidence offered by accused that a negro was seen at 8 a. m. next thereafter, in the railroad yard, was irrelevant. Thompson v. Com., 88 Va. 45, 13 S. E. Rep. 304.

Describing Property.—And, where one is charged with the robbery of "silver coin of the value of $2.00," it is proper to permit the party, from whom the coin was taken, to give evidence as to the number and value of the pieces taken. State v. Jackson, 26 W. Va. 250.

Part of Res Gestæ.—On a prosecution for a robbery, a witness gives a description of the robbers received from the wife of the prosecutor a few minutes after the occurrence, and he states that he pursued after the parties and found the prisoner and another at a place he describes. The commonwealth's attorney may then properly ask him whether the prisoner and the other person corresponded on that night, in dress and appearance, with two of the men described by the wife of the prosecutor. And his answer that they did, was proper evidence. Jordan v. Com., 25 Gratt. 943.

B. SUFFICIENCY.

To Prove Taking and Genuineness.—Parties are indicted for the robbery of notes or paper, the indictment containing two counts, charging the same offense in different form. The notes or paper are produced at trial, inspected by the jury, and no suggestion made that they were spurious. It is also shown by the party robbed that he received the notes from the United States for services. On motion by accused to set aside the verdict because contrary to evidence, or for want of evidence proving genuineness of notes, it was not error to overrule the motion. Moody v. State, 1 W. Va. 340.

To Prove the Charge.—On a trial for robbery, the evidence showing that accused and companion assailed a party at a stated time, and that companion held the party while the accused took from his person a pocketbook of the value of fifty cents containing fifteen dollars in currency, was sufficient proof to warrant conviction. Wheeler v. Com., 86 Va. 658, 10 S. E. Rep. 924.

Taking Proved, Jury May Infer Intent.—And on a trial for robbery, when the fact of the taking has been proved, in the absence of satisfactory countervailing evidence by the accused, the jury may infer the felonious intent from the immediate asportation and conversion of the property. Jordan v. Com., 25 Gratt. 943.

VIII. INSTRUCTIONS.

A. BURDEN OF PROOF.—Where, on a trial for robbery, an instruction was given on behalf of the accused, that the burden of proving every essential of the charge was on the commonwealth, it was not error to add, "but the burden of proving an alibi is on the accused." Thompson v. Com., 88 Va. 45, 13 S. E. Rep. 304.

B. ASSUMING GUILT.—But, an instruction that if jury believe that defendant was present, aiding and abetting C. in robbing M., then he is guilty as principal in the second degree, though he neither beat nor struck M., nor presented fire arms "at him, nor received any portion of the goods carried away by C., as the fruits of the robbery," assumes that there was a robbery, and that C. committed it and carried off the stolen property, and was improper. Houston v. Commonwealth, 87 Va. 257, 12 S. E. Rep. 385.

IX. NEW TRIAL.

On trial for robbery, the evidence showing that accused and companion assailed a party at a certain time and that companion held him while accused took purse and money from his person, a new trial will not be awarded for newly-discovered evidence that a witness, who had testified at the trial, since remembered that the scene of the robbery was examined by lamplight, and not by moonlight. Wheeler v. Com., 86 Va. 658, 10 S. E. Rep. 924.

678 *The Commonwealth v. Richard Turner.

November, 1827.

Criminal Law—Criminal Beating of Slave.—An indictment cannot be sustained against a Master, for the malicious, cruel, and excessive beating of his own Slave.

The defendant was indicted at the Superior Court of King George, in October, 1826, for cruelly beating his own slave. The indictment charged that the defendant, "with force and arms, in and upon one negro man slave, named Emanuel, the property of the said Richard Turner, then and there being, did make an assault, and with certain rods, whips and sticks, him the said negro man slave did then and there wilfully and maliciously, violently, cruelly, immoderately, and excessively beat, scourge and whip, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth."

The defendant pleaded not guilty, and also demurred to the indictment, and the attorney joined in demurrer. The Superior Court, because of the novelty and difficulty of the questions arising on the demurrer, adjourned the same to the General Court for its decision thereon.

The case was argued here by Stanard, for the defendant, and the Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

The following opinion of the Court was prepared by

*The principal case is cited in Souther v. Com., 7 Gratt. 680.

DADE, J.

In coming to a decision upon this delicate and important question, the Court has considered it to be its duty to ascertain, not what may be expedient, or morally, or politically right in relation to this matter, but what is the law. It is its duty to expound and declare the actual law; and not to make, or amend it. We have not been unaware that, in regard to misdemeanors, very extensive powers have been sometimes attributed to the Court of King's Bench in England, as the custos morum of the realm; and *that the same are supposed to appertain to the General and Circuit Courts, as holding the same place, in respect to this Commonwealth. But, although both these tribunals have, upon the same principles, long exercised a control over offences contra bonos mores, we think it is apparent that neither has ever arrogated to itself, in the exercise of these powers, the latitude of jurisdiction, which some have supposed to belong to them, but which could not be exercised without an alarming encroachment upon the liberty of the subject or citizen. It is more just, as well as more safe, to consider this power as limited by the instances, which, in the process of ages, have from time to time occurred, and are upon record, than to regard it as a new principle applicable to every case, which, in the opinion of every Judge, may seem to be comprehended within it. This doctrine would erect a power truly inquisitorial: a power to be exercised, not within the limits of a long line of established precedents, but to be deduced according to the ever-varying opinions of its depositaries, from a course of reasoning upon a subject admitting as much diversity of opinion, as much subtlety and refinement, as any other whatsoever; the influence of the deportment of each member of society upon the general welfare of the whole.

This latitudinous doctrine we disclaim. Nor is it the first time that this Court has, in effect, made this disclaimer. The cases of The Commonwealth v. Isaacks, November Term, 1826, ante, 634; and Anderson v. The Commonwealth, ante, 627, at the same Term, rest for their decision mainly on the same principles. The first of these cases, was an indictment against a man and woman for living for many years in a state of concubinage; but, without charging a specific act of fornication. The indictment was at common law, and not under the statute. The second, was the case of abduction and seduction of a young female, (above the age of sixteen,) under such circumstances of atrocity, that the jury amerced him in $1,000, and the Court 680 superadded a *confinement of two years and six months. In the General Court, it was attempted to maintain these prosecutions upon the ground, that the acts were contra bonos mores. But, this idea was repelled by the Judges, and the jurisdiction was disclaimed.

It is said to be the boast of the common law, that it continually conforms itself to the ever-changing condition of society. But, this conformity keeps on pari passu with those changes. Like them it is slow and imperceptible: so that society may easily conform itself to the law. When great changes take place in the social order, a stronger hand, that of the Legislature, must be applied. Thus, when slavery, a wholly new condition, was introduced, the common law could not operate on it. The rules were to be established, either by the positive enactments of the lawmaking power, or to be deduced from the Codes of other countries, where that condition of man was tolerated. If we can derive no aid from these sources, it will not do to appeal to maxims and principles of the common law, applicable to quite different subjects. When the Courts recognize the power to punish one who should take his slave into the market place, and there violently beat him, it is not because it was a slave who was beaten, nor because the act was unprovoked or cruel; but, because ipso facto it disturbed the harmony of society; was offensive to public decency, and directly tended to a breach of the peace. The same would be the law, if a horse had been so beaten. And yet it would not be pretended, that it was in respect to the rights of the horse, or the feelings of humanity, that this interposition would take place.

To descend from these preliminary principles to the case in hand, it seems reasonable to suppose, that when slavery was introduced into the then English Colony of Virginia, without reference to the common law of England, which had never acknowledged it, (for villenage is not the prototype of slavery, as it has always existed 681 here,) *without the positive enactments of the Parliament of the Mother Country, or of the Colonial Legislature, but at the mere will of the buyers and sellers, the condition of the slave was that of uncontrolled and unlimited subjection to the will of the master: or, it was to be modified by the established usages of those countries, where to a great extent it still prevailed, or of those extinct nations, where it had existed, and had been subjected to well-settled and established rules; the customs of the former were but little known to a people with whom, from the influence of political and religious prejudices, they had scarcely any intercourse. But, amongst the ancients, slavery had been tolerated by the Theocratic Jews, and the polished nations of Greece and Rome. The Bible furnished to every man evidences of its existence and rules amongst the ancient Jews: History gave brief notices of its institutions amongst the ancient Greeks: but, the ample body of the Roman civil law furnished the most abundant information touching the institutions, customs, rules and enactments, in regard to this condition of man. From these sources, then, were probably derived the few and vague rules, by which the unconditional subjection of the slave to the will of the master, may be presumed to have been modified in the first stages of the existence of slavery in this Colony, and until it became the subject of positive legislative enactment.

Amongst the Jews, slavery was traced to the paternal curse of Noah upon the descendants of his grandson Canaan. Genesia, (chap. 9, ver. 25.) The records of their laws respecting slaves are few and meagre, and are principally to be found in Exodus, chap. 21. They constitute a marked difference in the rights of slaves and freemen in the most important of all, life itself. For, while the punishment of death is repeatedly denounced against the slayer of a freeman, or even many inferior injuries done to him; such as attempting his life by guile, (ver. 14,) stealing a freeman and selling him, or even having him in hand to sell, (ver. 16,) &c. &c., yet, the death of a slave by whipping under 682 the hand of the master, was merely punishable, (ver. 20;) and if the slave survived a day or two, the master was in no wise punishable, (ver. 21.) Maiming a slave (ver. 26, 27,) seems to have been followed by a consequence rather intended to relieve the slave, than to punish the master; i. e. his freedom.

Amongst the ancient Greeks, slavery prevailed to a great extent in every of the States, from the earliest to the latest period of their history. Yet, we have no important details concerning any of them, except the Spartan Helots. These, according to Thucydides, Isocrates and others, were the descendants of Greeks, chiefly Messenians, taken in war. It is notorious, that their condition was supremely miserable. It is of little consequence to speak of their rights, when we advert to the institution of the Cryptia or Ambuscade, attributed by Plutarch to Lycurgus; (see Plut. in vita Lycurgus) according to which, in order to reduce the formidable numbers of the Helots, the young Spartans were occasionally sent out to slaughter all the men they could lay their hands on.

The great extent and vast power of the Roman Republic and Empire, her higher advancement in the arts of government and jurisprudence, and the ample records of her civil institutions, embodied and preserved to us in the civil law, furnish more abundant materials from thence than from any of the ancient nations. As subjects of property, of police, and of government, their books are in no respect deficient. Here, as in Greece and even Judea, (for it can be but little doubted, that the curse of Noah was used to justify the Jews in the slavery which arms had enabled them to impose on the people of the promised land,) slavery is to be traced to captivity in war. The uncontrolled power of the 683 captor over the life of his captive, might be readily *understood to imply every inferior power. Accordingly, we find the Roman law bottomed upon this principle. Key to the Civil Law, 177, title "Slave;" Justinian's Inst. Book 1, title 3, § 3; Vattel, Book 3, ch. 8, § 152, &c.

We have before said, that slavery in this country was not derived from villenage. This was of purely feudal origin, and was never exercised in England, as slavery was amongst the ancients, and still is here. And yet, in many respects, its condition was very similar. Strictly, it was a tenure, whereby the inferior held lands of his superior. Co. Litt. title Villenage, sec. 172. And it was in this relation, that the subject is generally treated by the old law-writers. It is remarkable, that of the true condition of the pure villein in gross, we have only an imperfect account, and are at fault in many important particulars. Bracton, indeed, Lib. 4, fol. 208, thus defines it: "Purum villenagium est a quo praeestatur servitium incertum et indeterminatum: ubi scire non potest vespere, quale servitium fieri debet manere, viz. ubi quis facere tenetur, quicquid ei preceptum fuerit." This would seem to define slavery; yet, we know not whether the villein in gross was liable to unconditional sale by his Lord; whether he was subject to the writs of execution against chattels; nor whether, on the death of the Lord, he passed to the heir or executor, though it is more probable that they were regarded as real property. But, we know that they differed from our slaves in these important particulars. They might purchase some kinds of property which did not enure to the Lord, and even against him have an appeal of the death of the father. Litt. sec. 189. A villein might be an executor, and as such, sue his Lord. Ib. sec. 191-2. He might become a Monk, and was thenceforth free. Ib. sec. 202. And a wife became free by marrying a freeman. Ib. But that, in respect to this order of men, which is most pertinent to our present purpose, is, that the Lord might be indicted for maiming his villein. Litt. sec. 194. And the 684 remarkable reason is "given by Coke, 127, a, that the villein is a subject of the King; that vita et membra sunt in manu regis, "and so the Lord of the villein, for the cause aforesaid, cannot maim the villein, but the King shall punish him for maiming his subject." This reasoning excludes the idea, that in punishing the Lord for even maiming, the rights of the villein, the cause of humanity, or the good order and manners or morals of society, were at all regarded. Littleton, by enumerating maiming as the offence, for which the Lord was punishable, excludes the pretence of his being liable for a less offence: and Coke's reason, together with the old legal definition of Mayhem, shews that the true ground was, that the villein was, by the maiming, less serviceable to the King in his wars.

We, therefore, consider that the deductions from the laws of villenage are adverse to this prosecution: and we are left to enquire, what countenance it receives from the statutory law of our own land. As to this, it is not pretended that there is, or ever was, an act of the Legislature, either of the Colony or State of Virginia, made for the punishment of this offence. But, on the contrary, a just inference from our statutes in regard to slaves, furnishes an argument against the exercise of the powers, of late only, ascribed to the Courts. They are said to have been introduced into the Colony in the year 1620, and they do not appear to have been the objects of legislation, or of more than slight incidental notice in our laws, until nearly fifty years thereafter, (viz: in 1669,) when the first act of Assembly concerning injuries done to slaves, was passed, (2 Stat. at Lar. 270,) excusing the master from all punishment for killing his slave under correction for resistance.

In 1723, (4 Stat. at Lar. 132,) this act was extended to correction for any offence whatever; and owners killing their slaves, were not only punishable in case the homicide amounted to only manslaughter, but even in some cases, where at the common law, the crime would have mounted up to the degree of murder. This

685 was re-enacted *in 1748, (6 Stat. at Lar. 111,) in very nearly the same words, and was not repealed until 1788, (12 Stat. at Large, 681.)

The passage of these exculpatory acts, proves that slaves were not wholly without the protection of the law. As with the Jews, the Romans, and the villeins of England, their lives were guarded, and it is probable that these ancient laws and usages were the principal authority for it. But, after the passage of the act of 1669, and until the year 1788, there certainly could have been no pretence for maintaining such prosecutions as these. He who by statute had been declared not in any wise punishable for even homicide, ensuing from the correction of his slave, could not be regarded as amenable to the laws for any inferior degree of correction. Since 1788, the life of the slave is protected by the laws equally with that of the freeman. And the statutes for punishing maiming extend as well to the protection of the bond as the free, from this high and aggravated degree of personal injury. But, without any proofs that the common law did ever protect the slave against minor injuries from the hand of the master, with the positive assurance that, if ever the common law extended so far, it was, for more than a century, and up to a comparatively late period, nullified by the existence of statutes entirely inconsistent with it, where are we to look for the source of the power which is now claimed for us? Not in the statute book certainly; not in a species of common law growing out of usage since 1788. The time itself would be scarce long enough to give any usage within its limits, title to be enrolled in that venerable Code: but, no such usage has been cited; on the contrary, these prosecutions, with two or others springing up about the same time, the validity of which was always contested, and has never been settled, seem to be a new idea. The only remaining pretext would be the ductile and flexible character of the common law, which moulds itself to the changing condition of human society.

686 But, we have already *repelled the deductions sought to be drawn from this source: great changes are not to be made by the Courts. It is only silent, and almost imperceptible changes, which are recognized, and in due time, confirmed, and established by the judicial tribunals.

It is greatly to be deplored that an offence so odious and revolting as this, should exist to the reproach of humanity. Whether it may be wiser to correct it by legislative enactments, or leave it to the tribunal of public opinion, which will not fail to award to the offenders its deep and solemn reprobation, is a question of great delicacy and doubt. This Court has little hesitation in saying that the power of correction does not belong to it: and, with but one dissenting voice, it declares, that it has not jurisdiction over this offence, and that the demurrer to the Indictment must be sustained.*

BROCKENBROUGH, J. dissented, and in the conference-room gave his reasons to the following effect:

The question in the present case is, whether a master may be indicted and punished by fine and imprisonment for the immoderate, cruel and excessive beating of his own *slave. It has fallen to my lot to differ in opinion from the rest of my brethren, and it behoves me to state briefly the reasons which have induced me to form that opinion; particularly, as on one occasion within a few years past, in one of the Courts of my circuit, I sustained an Indictment of this character, and pronounced judgment against the defendant.

It will not be denied that, from the first introduction of slaves into this Colony in the year 1620, to the year 1669, the homicide, of a slave by his master, whether it was murder or manslaughter, was by law punishable as felony. This is apparent from the language of the statute passed in 1669, by which it is declared, that if a slave resist his master, and by the extremity of the correction should chance to die, his death shall not be accounted felony. If the master had possessed entire control over his slave, even to life and death, or if the manslaughter of a slave had been no crime, that statute would have been unnecessary. By what law, then, was this offence prevented, and what was the Code by which our ancestors of that period regulated the conduct of the master towards his slave? Not by the Jewish law, for there is not one word in the ancient characters or statutes, by which it can be inferred that it was adopted as the law of the Colony. Nor do I think it probable that the law of nations, or the laws of the Spartans, or the laws of the Roman Empire, (even if known to them,) constituted their rule of action. As to the first, it is sufficient to say, that it is laid down as a principle of that law, that the master has the power of life and

*Note.—The opinion in this case was made up so late in the term in which the judgment was rendered, that there was not time during that Court to do justice to the reasons upon which it was founded. It was, therefore, enjoined upon DABE, J. to prepare the written opinion by the ensuing Court, when, if approved by the other Judges, it was to be spread on their book of opinions. Circumstances rendered it expedient that this case should be published with others, before the term, at which it had been proposed to submit the opinion to be prepared by DABE, J. to his colleagues. Accordingly, he was written to for the opinion, and forwarded it as requested: but, as he did not feel himself justified in being instrumental in its going before the public, as the opinion of the other Judges, who concurred in the judgment, without their approbation, he required, that (if used at all,) it should be published, either as his own opinion alone, or if as that of the Court, (for which it was prepared, and whose arguments it embodies, as well as recollected) with an explanatory note, which would free them from responsibility for the particular course of the argument.

death over his slave. Justinian's Inst. Book 1, title 8, § 1. This is a power which our ancestors did not claim, as is proved by the statute before mentioned. The laws of the Spartans seem to be still more inhuman. If they resorted to the Roman Code, they found a different rule. By that law, masters were not only restrained from killing their slaves, but by a constitution of Antoninus it was ordained, that if the severity of masters should be found 688 to be excessive, "they should be compelled to part with their slaves on equitable terms. Their power over them was to cease, and this was founded on the principle, that no one should be allowed to misuse even his own property. Just. Inst. B. 1, tit. 8, § 2. As by the first two, a greater power was conferred than they claimed, so by the last, a penalty was annexed to the exercise of severity, which to them was probably unknown. It is not probable that they resorted to these strange laws, when they had one which they brought with them from the Mother Country, with which they were familiar, and which might be easily adapted to all the varying relations of their society. This was the common law of England. It is true, that to the common law, slavery, except in the modified form of villenage, was unknown. But, the relations of superior and inferior, had their rules well established by that law. A master had the power to correct his servant; a parent, his child; and a tutor, his pupil; but the moment either of these persons transcended the bounds of due moderation, he was amenable to the law of the land, and might be prosecuted for the abuse of his authority, for his cruelty and inhumanity. When slaves were introduced, although the power conferred on the master by that relation, was much greater than that conferred by either of the others, yet the common law would easily adapt itself to this new relation. The slave was the property of his master, and every power which was necessary to enable the master to use his property, was conferred on him. He might correct him for disobedience; he might sell him to another master; and he would be liable for the payment of his debts. If he was merely property, and nothing else, he might be destroyed by his master. But, to this extent the common law would not allow his power to reach, because it was unnecessary for his full enjoyment of the right of property. The slave was not only a thing, but a person, and this well-known distinction would extend its protection to the slave as a person, except so far as the application of it conflicted with the 689 enjoyment of "the slave as a thing.

Upon this ground, was his life protected: on this ground, I apprehend, his person was protected from all unnecessary, cruel, and inhuman punishments. I see no incompatibility between this degree of protection, and the full enjoyment of the right of property.

If I am asked what evidence there is that such was the law before the year 1669, I answer, that there are no reports of the adjudications of our Courts during that period: but this we know, that the common law was the Code of Virginia, and that its rules prevailed, unless they were repealed by legislative enactment, or dispensed with as being incompatible with the new relation created by the introduction of slaves.

In the long period between 1669 and 1788, I admit that this question could not have arisen. I admit, that whilst a statute existed which exempted a master from punishment for killing his slave, by reason of a blow given during his correction, or for the manslaughter of a slave, any beating, however cruel and severe, could not be the subject of a prosecution. But, this ferocious and sanguinary system of legislation was abolished by the act of November, 1788. 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, 681. By that repeal, the common law was expressly revived: by that repeal, that law again extended its ægis over the slave to protect him from all inhuman torture, though that torture should be inflicted by the hand of a master.

I had not supposed that I was stretching the principles of the common law to an unreasonable and unprecedented extent. I had supposed that if, in England, the mere attempt, though ineffectual, to commit a felony, or the solicitation to commit one, be a misdemeanor, (3 Bac. Ab. 549;) if an Indictment will be allowed in Massachusetts for poisoning a cow, (1 Mass. T. Rep. 59;) or in Pennsylvania for killing a horse, (1 Dall. 335,) an Indictment might be sustained in Virginia for maliciously and inhumanly beating a slave almost to 690 death.

In other words, I had supposed, "that whilst the common law protected all persons in the just exercise of any authority or power conferred on them by the law; yet, for the abuse of that authority, or an excess in the exercise of it, they were liable to be prosecuted as delinquents.

I have not thought it necessary to say any thing on the subject of the consequences of the doctrine which I have supported. I do not believe, that in those consequences any thing can be discerned injurious to the peace of society. When it is recollected, that our Courts and Juries are composed of men who, for the most part, are masters, I cannot conceive that any injury can accrue to the rights and interests of that class of the community. And with respect to the slaves, whilst kindness and humane treatment are calculated to render them contented and happy, is there no danger that oppression and tyranny, against which there is no redress, may drive them to despair?

My opinion is, however, overruled by the better judgment of all the rest of the Court, and the demurrer to the Indictment is to be sustained.

juries, other than those actually foreseen, and estimated by the inquest.

Nuisance—Indictment—Sufficiency.—As indictment for a nuisance, which concludes, "to the common nuisance of divers of the Commonwealth's citizens," is not sufficient.

Same—Same—Same.—It ought to be laid to the common nuisance "of all the citizens of the Commonwealth residing in the neighbourhood;" or "of all the citizens, &c. residing, &c. and passing thereby."

This was an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Law for the county of Cumberland.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

DANIEL, J.

This was an Indictment for a nuisance, which is alleged by the said Indictment to consist in this: that the defendant, on the 10th day of February, 1821, "erected a nuisance, to wit, a mill-dam and pond, which is now, and ever has been since its erection, highly prejudicial to the health of the people residing in its neighbourhood; and the same nuisance, to wit, the mill-dam and pond so erected and built as aforesaid, at the time aforesaid, and on the creek known and called by the name of Tare-wallet, in the county of Cumberland, doth yet continue, and is suffered to remain to the common nuisance of divers of the Commonwealth's citizens, to the evil example of all others, &c."

The defendant demurred to the Indictment, and issue was taken thereon. The defendant also pleaded, that the said mill-dam and pond were erected, and built by him by leave of the County Court of Cumberland, first had and obtained according to the provisions of the act of Assembly in such case made and provided. To this plea, the Attorney for the Commonwealth demurred, and issue was joined on the demurrer. Thereafter, the Judge of the Court adjourned to this Court the following questions: *1. Is the Indictment in this case sufficient in law to put the defendant to answer the same, and what judgment should be rendered on the first demurrer? 2. What judgment is to be rendered on the demurrer to the defendant's plea?

With respect to the last question, the Court are unanimously of opinion, that the demurrer to the defendant's plea should be sustained, the act of Assembly respecting mills, &c. having provided, that "no inquest, or opinion or judgment of the Court thereupon, shall bar any public prosecution or private action, which could have been had or maintained, if the said act had never been made, other than prosecutions and actions for such injuries as were actually foreseen, and estimated upon such inquest." 2 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 228, § 9.

As to the first question, "what judgment should be rendered on the demurrer to the Indictment?" there is more difficulty. Some of the Court are of opinion that the act complained of in the Indictment as a public nuisance, might be regarded as such if it was alleged to be "to the common nuisance of all the citizens of the Commonwealth residing in the neighbourhood," which is not distinctly averred by the charge of its being to the common nuisance of divers of the Commonwealth's citizens. They are of opinion that the authorities (a) support the position that "divers" is not sufficient, but that "all" is necessary; and yet, there is hardly any nuisance which can affect every citizen of the Commonwealth, and that, therefore, according to the very nature of things, a nuisance may be regarded as a public one, if it affects all who reside in the neighbourhood. Others of the Court are of opinion that the Indictment is sufficient, since it is averred that the erection of the nuisance is highly prejudicial to the health of the people residing in its neighbourhood, and this may be well intended to mean all the "people of the neighbourhood; and that the divers citizens, mentioned in the conclusion, are "all the citizens of the neighbourhood." Others are of opinion, that a common nuisance should be such as of itself necessarily to affect the public generally, or by its connection with what does so affect the public, (as in the case of its erection near a public highway,) to justify the conclusion that it might be injurious to all the citizens of the Commonwealth residing near, or passing thereby, and that such is not the offence laid in this Indictment.

A majority of the Court concur in the opinion that the offence complained of, is not sufficiently stated to be "to the common nuisance of all the citizens of the Commonwealth residing in the neighbourhood," nor to the "common nuisance of all the citizens of the Commonwealth residing in the neighbourhood thereof, and passing thereby," and that the defendant's demurrer to the Indictment ought to be sustained. In this opinion, however, JUDGES JOHNSON, DADE and FIELD do not concur.

Jacob Martin, Constable, &c. v. David Sturm, and John Sturm.

November, 1827.

Executions—Statute—Construction—Indemnifying Bond.—A Constable is not authorised, by the 25th section of the act concerning executions to take the indemnifying bond there prescribed, when he levies an execution issued by a single Magistrate on a judgment for a small debt.

Bond with Condition—Declaration—General Demurrer—Effect.—In a declaration on a bond with collateral condition, if there be two assignments of breaches, and either assignment be good, and the whole declaration is demurred to, the demurrer ought to be overruled.

This was an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Law for Harrison county. The plaintiff, for the benefit of Benjamin J. Bryce, had brought his action of debt against the defendants in the County Court, upon an indemnifying bond executed by them under the 25th section of the act of Assembly, concerning executions. The declaration set forth, that Eskridge, 6 Munf. 308; monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com. 16 Gratt. 674. The principal case is cited on the subject of nuisances in Com. v. Webb, 6 Rand. 737, 728.

the plaintiff, as Constable, had levied a Fieri Facias for eleven dollars, with interest and costs, for the benefit of David Sturm, on the goods of one Norman Randall, which goods were claimed by Bryce, and the defendant David Sturm, with the other defendant, entered into bond conditioned to indemnify the said Constable against all damages which he might sustain in consequence of the seizure and sale of the property which had been levied; and moreover to pay and satisfy to any person claiming title to the said property, all damages which such person might sustain in consequence of such seizure and sale. The declaration assigned as breaches of the said condition, 1. That the property levied on was the property of the said Bryce, and that he had sustained damage by the said seizure and sale, to the amount of $100. 2. That the plaintiff had been liable to pay the said Bryce great damage for the seizure and sale aforesaid, and had been put to great costs, and expenditure to his damage, $100. The defendants demurred to the whole declaration, and issue was joined on the demurrer. The County Court gave judgment for the defendant, and the record was carried before the Superior Court of Harrison, by Superseadeas. That Court "being of opinion, that the questions of law arising on the record, and the proper construction of the act of Assembly in relation thereto, ought to be settled by the General Court, as the cases arising under that act are rarely of a sufficient magnitude to give jurisdiction to the Court of Appeals," adjourned the same to this Court for its decision.

The case was argued in writing, by J. Allen, for the plaintiff, and Duncan, for the defendant.

695 *BROCKENBROUGH, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

The principal question arising in this case is, Whether a Constable, who has levied a Fi. Fa. issued by a single Magistrate, on a judgment rendered on a warrant for a small debt, can take an indemnifying bond from the plaintiff, under the 25th section of the law concerning executions, (a) in the same manner that a Sheriff may take such bond under an execution issued from a Court of Record. The language of that section is, that if a Sheriff, or other officer, shall levy an execution, &c. The words "other officer," are sufficiently broad to include the case of a Constable. But, there are sound considerations which induce the Court to believe that the Legislature did not intend to include him. The section is placed in the revised act concerning executions, which are directed to issue from the offices of Courts of Record, whereas the section of the law which directs the Magistrate to issue executions, and the Constable to levy them, is found in the body of the act concerning the County and Corporation Courts, (b) and is included in the same section which gives jurisdiction to the single Magistrate in cases of small debts and penalties. This, however, of itself, would have little or no weight. But, the 26th(a) section clearly indicates that the Constable was not in the legislative mind; for it directs that the bond and security shall be returned with the execution to the office of the Court from whence it issued. Now, the executions in these cases do not issue from any office, or Court. The Magistrate is not a Court, has no office, generally keeps no record, and until very lately, was not required, or authorised to keep a docket of his proceedings. When the bond is returned to the Clerk's office, it becomes an office paper, for the filing of which, or giving out a copy, the Clerk is entitled to be paid a regular fee prescribed by law, and it is accessible 696 *to any person who may claim the property which was levied on, and the doubt as to the title of which, was the cause of the bond being taken. There may be several claimants, and the bond may be put in suit in the name of the officer who took it for the benefit of either of the claimants; in such case, the Clerk ought not to give possession of the bond to either of them, but to retain it and to produce it on a trial when required by a subpoena duces tecum, or otherwise. But, if such a bond is returned to the Magistrate, it can only be filed with his private papers, and no fee is allowed for filing it away, or copying it. It is not probable that the Legislature intended to subject Magistrates to this additional trouble and responsibility, and it is probable that if they had intended to include Constables, they would have provided some office or place to which the bonds taken by them might be returned, and where they might be kept in safe custody. Although, then, these words would of themselves include Constables, yet it seems that the Legislature only intended to embrace Sheriffs, Coroners, Marshals and others, who may levy executions issuing from Courts of Record. The bond, therefore, cannot be recovered on, as a bond under the statute. This decision is not opposed by the decision in M'Clunn v. Steel, 2 Virg. Cas. p. 256, in which this point was not considered.

There is, however, a second breach assigned in this declaration, viz. that the plaintiff himself (the Constable) was put to great costs, and expenditures, and labour and trouble, to his damage of $100. Although the bond is not good as a statutory bond, and no evidence ought to be given to prove the first breach, yet, as the defendants have bound themselves to indemnify the plaintiff for all damages and costs which he might sustain by reason of the premises, the plaintiff ought to be allowed to prove the damages and costs sustained by himself under the second assignment of breaches, the bond being a good bond at common law. The demurrer being to the whole declaration, it must be overruled.

697 *The following is to be entered as the opinion of the Court.

This Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that a Constable, who has levied a Fieri Facias issued by a Justice on a judgment upon a warrant, has no power to take an indemnifying bond under the 25th and 26th sections of the act concerning executions; and that there is no error in the judgment of the County Court sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration on that ground; but, as the bond taken in this case is good as a common law bond, and the plaintiff has in the second assignment of breaches alleged, that he has sustained damage by occasion of the defendant's breach of the condition of his bond, he ought to be allowed to support that assignment of breaches by proof, and that there is error in the said judgment on that ground; and as the defendants demurred to the whole declaration, this Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the Superior Court of Law ought to reverse the said judgment, and remand the cause to the County Court for further proceedings to be had therein.

(b) 1 Rev. Code, p. 253.

Henry L. Prentis v. The Commonwealth.*

Privilege of Legislator—How Taken Advantage of.—

The privilege of a member of Assembly, cannot be noticed by the Courts ex officio. As it may be waived, it must be claimed. And it can only be claimed by plea, or on motion tendered, or made at the proper period.

Same—How Waived;—Case at Bar.—If a member of Assembly allows a judgment to be rendered against him during the existence of his privilege, and does not seek during the progress of the proceedings, either to abate or suspend them, he will be deemed to have waived his privilege, and he cannot afterwards be allowed the Writ of Error coram vobis to reverse the judgment.

This was an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Law for Henrico county.

It was argued by Scott, for the plaintiff, and the Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

698 *The case is stated in the following opinion of the Court, which was delivered by

SUMMERS, J. §

On the 26th of February, 1827, the Grand Jury, impanelled before the Hustings Court of the City of Richmond, presented the plaintiff in error, by the name and description of Henry L. Prentis, of the Legislature, for unlawful gaming at a place called the Profile House, in the said City, at a game played with cards, called faro. On this presentment a summons issued, and was returned by the Sergeant, "executed on the 8th March, 1827." At the March Term of the Hustings Court, (29th of the month,) the plaintiff in error was called, but not appearing, judgment was entered against him for $20, the fine imposed by law, and the costs of the prosecution. On the 27th of June, 1827, he presented a petition to the Hustings Court, setting out his election to the House of Delegates in April, 1826; his attendance as a member of that body, from the first Monday in December following, until the adjournment of the †Privilege—How Taken Advantage of.—To the point that the courts cannot ex officio take notice of a personal privilege, but it must be claimed when relied on the principal case is cited in Turnbull v. Thompson, 27 Gratt. 810.

‡Same—How Waived.—It has been almost universally held that where a defendant relies on a mere privilege, he must plead his privilege, otherwise he will be considered as having waived it. Neale v. Utz, 75 Va. 486, citing the principal case as authority.

Legislature on the 9th of March, 1827, and the continuance of his privilege whilst returning home, a distance of four hundred and twenty miles: Alleging his exemption from all process and arrests, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace, during the continuance of his privilege;|| that by operation of law, all process and other proceedings against him, stood suspended for the same period; that the proceedings had in the Hustings Court, were in violation of his privilege as a member of the General Assembly, and praying that a Writ of Error coram vobis might be awarded, in order that the errors complained of might be corrected. On consideration by 699 *the Hustings Court, this petition was rejected, and an exception taken, making it part of the record. On the 10th of July, 1827, a Writ of Error was allowed by the Superior Court of Law of Henrico county, to the judgment of the Hustings Court, overruling the application for a Writ of Error coram vobis; and the cause coming on for trial in that Court, by consent of the plaintiff and the Attorney for the Commonwealth, the following questions were adjourned to this Court for its decision:

1. Ought the said Writ of Error coram vobis, to have been awarded by the Hustings Court, according to the petition of the plaintiff?

2. Ought the Superior Court of Law to reverse either, or both, of the judgments of the Court of Hustings, in the record mentioned; and if so, what further proceedings ought to be had thereon?

3. Ought the Writ of Error, awarded by the Superior Court of Law, to be quashed?

If the plaintiff is entitled to a reversal of the judgment pronounced against him by the Hustings Court, we have no doubt of the Writ of Error coram vobis, being the proper remedy. This brings us to the more immediate questions submitted to our consideration.

It is important that the administration of the government be not interrupted or delayed, by the embarrassments arising from the private affairs of those who are called into public service; and we have, therefore, examined with care, the decisions which have been made giving effect to exemptions of the character now claimed, and ascertaining the time and manner in which such exemptions must be insisted on. From this examination, we are satisfied that the Courts may not, ex officio, take notice of the existence of the privilege. It results, from its nature and character, that it may be waived, and therefore, ought to be claimed whenever relied on. The judicial history of this question does not furnish an example of the allowance of the privilege, but upon plea, or upon 700 motion, tendered or *made, at the period proper for the consideration thereof, by the Court whose proceedings are sought to be abated or suspended. It is not an incapacity like infancy and coverture, where consent cannot give jurisdiction, and where the irregular exercise of it is void ab initio. It is urged, with some force, that the same embarrassments may be produced, by requiring a member to allege and prove his privilege during its continuance, that would result from the trial of the cause in chief. We think not. The proof of the facts upon which it rests, are easy of attainment, because they are few, and may be adduced, as well in the absence as in the presence of the party. But, if it were otherwise, we think it not the province of the Courts, to extend the law of privilege beyond the limits heretofore prescribed to it by judicial decisions, which the Legislature must have had in view at the period of the enactments on the subject, and which are unaffected by any of the provisions of the statute. Upon the whole matter, we are of opinion, that the Court of Hustings was not bound to take notice of the privilege of the plaintiff, and that his failure to claim the exemption to which it entitled him, until after judgment, was a waiver thereof.

In this opinion, JUDGES BROCKENBROUGH, DADE and FIELD do not concur.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

This Court is opinion, and doth decide, that the Writ of Error coram vobis ought not to have been awarded by the Hustings Court, on the petition of the plaintiff; which is ordered to be certified.

PRIVILEGE.

Persons Entitled to Privilege from Arrest.—Judges, attorneys, suitors and witnesses are by the common law exempt from arrest in civil suits during their attendance at court, and for a reasonable time in traveling to and from the place of session. Com. v. Ronald, 4 Call 97; Richards v. Goodson, 2 Va. Cas. 381.

Statutory Privilege Does Not Protect Plaintiff.—As the plaintiff in an action does not have to be served with process, a statute allowing an exemption from service of process upon members of the legislature during its session does not protect a member, who is the plaintiff in an action, from a judgment rendered against him therein. Thus in Botts v. Tabb, 10 Leigh 616, a member of the general assembly, by a bill in equity obtained an injunction, before the session of the assembly, to stay proceedings on an execution at law against his property. On a motion to dissolve the injunction, made during the session of the assembly, he objected that his privilege should prevent the court from any action in the case at that time. The trial court, however, overruled the objection and upon appeal the judgment was affirmed.

Privilege Must Be Expressly Claimed.—The privilege of a member of the general assembly cannot be noticed by the courts ex officio. As it may be waived by the legislator if he so desires, it is incumbent upon him to claim the exemption if he wishes to avail himself of its benefit. It can only be claimed by plea, or on motion tendered or made at the proper period. Prentiss v. Com., 5 Rand. 697.

Waiver of Privilege.—A member of the legislature may waive his privilege and let the cause proceed to trial. Johnson v. Johnson, 4 Call 38. And where a member of the legislature allows a judgment to be rendered against him during the existence of his privilege and does not seek during the progress of the proceedings either to abate or suspend them, he will be deemed to have waived his privilege, and will not afterwards be allowed to have a writ of error coram vobis to reverse the judgment. Prentiss v. Com., 5 Rand. 697.

Constitutional Privileges and Privilege Taxes.—As to what are the "privileges and immunities" guaranteed to citizens of the states by the federal constitution; as to the privilege of the accused in criminal cases to remain silent and refuse to give evidence against himself, and as to privilege taxes, see monographic note on "Constitutional Law" appended to Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

701 *William R. Finn v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1827.

Criminal Law—Confession*—What Admissible as—Case at Bar.—If a prisoner, in speaking of the testimony of a witness who had testified against him, says, "that what C. said was true as far as he went, but that he did not say all, or enough;" this is not admissible as a confession of the prisoner; nor does it lay any foundation for proving to the jury what C. did swear to.

Same—Evidence—Witness Dead—Testimony on Former Trial—Admissibility.—Although, in a civil action, proof may be given of what a witness, who is since dead, did swear to on a former trial between the same parties, and on the same issue, yet such evidence is inadmissible in a criminal prosecution. And if the witness has only removed beyond the jurisdiction of the country, such proof is certainly not admissible in a Criminal case.

Secondary Evidence—What Must Be Shown.—If evidence be not prima facie admissible, but may be rendered so by circumstances, the party who offers the evidence, ought to set forth the circumstances which render it admissible.

Forgery—Scienter—Evidence.—In a prosecution for passing a forged note, knowing it to be forged, evidence, that the prisoner endeavored to engage a person to procure for him counterfeit money, that he enquired whether he had brought him any, and of declarations that he intended to cultivate the acquaintance of a counterfeiter, and intended to remove to a place near his residence, &c. is admissible as tending to prove the scienter.

This was a Writ of Error to the judgment of the Superior Court of Law for Kanawha county, by which the plaintiff in error was sentenced to imprisonment in the Penitentiary for the term of ten years. The Indictment on which he was tried, contained three counts, of which the first two charged that he feloniously passed to one John Whittaker a forged bank note, of fifty dollars, of the Bank of the United States, well knowing the said bank note to be forged: the first count charged the felony to have been committed with intent to injure and defraud the said John Whittaker; the second count, with intent to injure the President, Directors and Company of the Bank of the United States. The third count charged him with "offering to pass and exchange" the forged note, with intent to injure and defraud the said Whittaker. In each count, the tenor of the forged note was set out.

During the trial, the prisoner excepted to certain opinions of the Court, and the Bill of Exceptions is as follows:

"Be it remembered, that on the trial of the issue, the Attorney for the Commonwealth introduced a witness who 702 *proved that he had, during the last winter, a conversation with the prisoner while he was confined in jail concerning this prosecution: that on the prisoner's commencing this conversation, the witness reminded him that he, the witness, was recognized to appear and give evidence on his trial, and should have to detail any communications which he might make: the prisoner replied that he knew it, and wished him to do so; that he meant to explain the matter to him. The prisoner then observed, that what a certain Mr. Candler swore to at the Called Court, was strictly true, as far as he went, but that he had not told all, or enough, and as the prisoner was in the act of speaking farther as to Candler's testimony, the witness was called to the opposite side of the room, and left the prisoner with the intention of returning to him, and hearing the further remarks which he might make, and to which the one stated seemed to be introductory: that shortly afterwards, other persons came into the room, and a servant with food for the prisoners, when the witness left the apartment: without giving the prisoner an opportunity of renewing the conversation, and without recollecting at the moment the propriety of doing so, and would willingly have gone back afterwards and heard the residue of what the prisoner might have thought proper to have added, but concluded it would be of no service to him: that the prisoner did not attempt to recapitulate the testimony which Candler had given at the Called Court, but referred to it in the words above stated.

The Attorney for the Commonwealth then offered to prove by other witnesses, what the said Candler had testified to before the Called Court, having first proved, that the said Candler, although summoned to attend at this term as a witness against the prisoner, has since left the Commonwealth, and admitted that he is now living, but beyond its jurisdiction: to the admission of proof of what Candler swore at the Called Court, the prisoner, by his 703 Counsel, objected; but the Court overruled the objection, *and permitted it to be proved, instructing the jury, that although this testimony was admissible, yet it was peculiarly proper for them to consider and decide upon the weight to which it was entitled, from the interruption of the conversation in which the prisoner had spoken of Candler's evidence.

The evidence given by Candler before the Called Court, as detailed by the witnesses, was in substance, as follows: that some time before the commencement of this prosecution, the prisoner proposed to Candler, that they should join in procuring and passing counterfeit money: that Red river and Big Sandy river, (as well as the witnesses recollect,) were spoken of, in connection with the procuring and passing the counterfeit money, but the witnesses did not recollect that the kind of money, whether coin or bank notes, was mentioned by Candler; but one of the witnesses understood, from his general recollection of Candler's testimony, that coin was meant, rather than bank notes. To the admission of this testimony, the prisoner, by his counsel, further objected, on the ground that it was irrelevant and impertinent to the issue; but the Court was of opinion, that it was admissible, as tending to prove the scilicet, and permitted it to go to the jury, with instruction, that they were to consider it as before them on that part of the issue alone. The prisoner afterwards, in the progress of the cause, introduced a witness to prove that the day after the passing of the note, in the Indictment mentioned, by the prisoner to the said John Whittaker, and three or four days before the said Whittaker procured a warrant to be issued against the prisoner, the witness received an order from the prisoner on the said Whittaker, for a small sum in goods, and presented it to the said Whittaker for payment; that while the witness was in conversation with the said Whittaker, the prisoner joined them, and in the conversation continuing between the three, the said Whittaker observed, that he had sent the said bank note to town the day before, and that some said it was 704 good, and some that *it was bad; but that he had no doubt but that it was good; the prisoner then observed to him not to pay the order to the witness until the note should be ascertained to be good; to which the said Whittaker replied, that he was not afraid of the note's being bad, and that whether good or bad, the witness might have the amount of the order, and that if the prisoner would take the residue of what was coming to him, on account of the note, in goods, that he, Whittaker, would take the note at a venture; but that the prisoner refused to do so, saying that he must have a part of the balance in money. To this conversation going in evidence to the jury, the Attorney for the Commonwealth objected, the said Whittaker not being examined as a witness on the trial, but having left the Commonwealth some time before; which objection the Court sustained, being of opinion that it was competent for the prisoner to give in evidence the conversation which took place, at the time of passing the said note, as part of the res gesta, and to examine witnesses as to any other conversations of his, about which the Commonwealth had given evidence; but, that his conversations with the said Whittaker, or any other persons, not falling within these rules, were inadmissible, as evidence on his part.

On closing the testimony on the part of the Commonwealth, the attorney prosecuting, announced as part of the evidence on his part, the warrant for apprehending the prisoner, in the following words and figures:

"Kanawha County, to wit: Whereas, John Whittaker of Kanawha county, hath this day made oath before me, Van B. Reynolds, a Justice of the Peace for the county aforesaid, that, on the 17th day of August, 1826, at the county of Kanawha aforesaid,

Jesse G. Ballard and William R. Finn, of said county, did feloniously pass in payment to him, the said John Whittaker, a certain false, forged and counterfeited bank note, partly printed and partly written, purporting to be a note of the Bank of the United States, of the denomination of fifty dollars, with 705 *intention to defraud the said John Whittaker; they, the said Jesse G. Ballard and William R. Finn, then and there knowing the said note to be false, forged and counterfeit. These are, therefore, to command you to apprehend the said Jesse G. Ballard and William R. Finn, and to bring them before me, or some other Justice of the Peace for said county forthwith, to answer the premises, and further to be dealt with, according to law. Given under my hand and seal, this 23d of August, 1826.

"Van B. Reynolds, (Seal.)"

And when the jury were about to leave the bar, he offered to send it out as part of the evidence, to which one of the prisoner's counsel objected, alleging that it was the first knowledge which he had of the paper being offered in evidence, and moved the Court to exclude it from the jury; but, the Court overruled this motion, and permitted the said paper to go to the jury, but accompanied it with the instruction, that it was no evidence of the truth of any of the recitals which it contained, and could only be looked into for the purpose of ascertaining the period of commencing the prosecution, and the persons against whom it was commenced. On the offering of this warrant in evidence, the counsel for the prisoner admitted, that Jesse G. Ballard named therein, was the same man, who had been previously examined as a witness on the part of the prisoner.

To sustain the issue on his part, the Attorney for the Commonwealth examined a witness in the course of the trial, who deposed, that the prisoner had, on two or three occasions within twelve months before the commencement of this prosecution, applied to the witness to procure for him counterfeit money from a person on Big Sandy river, who was reported to make it, but the witness did not recollect that either bank notes or coin were particularly mentioned; that on one of these occasions, when the witness had recently returned from that part of the country, and in which he resides, the prisoner enquired of him, if he had brought him any of the money, and on being told he had not, the 706 *prisoner replied, he must go over himself, and spoke of obtaining employment in that quarter as a surveyor, and using it as a means of cultivating an acquaintance with the person reported to be engaged in counterfeiting, but that the witness had no knowledge of the prisoner's ever going to that quarter of the country, or his being absent from Kanawha at any time since. To the admission of this evidence, the prisoner by his counsel also objected, but the Court, being of opinion that it was admissible as tending to prove the scienter, permitted it to go to the jury; to all of which opinions of the Court, the prisoner by his counsel excepts, and this his Bill of Exceptions is signed, sealed and reserved.

The case was argued by Johnson, for the plaintiff in error, and the Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.*

The plaintiff in error was indicted for feloniously passing to one John Whittaker, a counterfeit bank note, purporting to be a note of the Bank of the United States. At the trial, certain exceptions were taken to the opinion of the Court, which will be noticed in their regular order. Judgment having been rendered against him, he obtained a Writ of Error at the last term of this Court, and the question now is, whether the judgment shall be reversed or affirmed?

1. The first branch of the Bill of Exceptions sets forth, that the Attorney for the Commonwealth introduced a witness, who proved that he had, during the last winter, a conversation with the prisoner, while he was confined in jail, concerning the prosecution; the witness warned the prisoner informing *him that he should be compelled to detail in evidence, whatever he communicated. The prisoner replied, that he knew it, and meant to explain the matter to him: the prisoner then said, "that what Mr. Candler swore at the Called Court, was strictly true, as far as he went, but that he had not told all, or enough." An interruption of the conversation here took place, whilst the prisoner was in the act of speaking of Candler's testimony, nor was an opportunity again afforded him of renewing it. In this interrupted conversation, the prisoner did not attempt to recapitulate the testimony which Candler had given at the Called Court, but merely referred to it as before mentioned. The Attorney for the Commonwealth, then offered to prove by other witnesses, what Candler had testified before the Called Court, having first proved that Candler, though living, is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, having left the Commonwealth soon after he was summoned to attend the Court as a witness. The prisoner objected to this evidence, but the Court admitted it, instructing the jury, however, that although the testimony was admissible, yet it was peculiarly proper for them to consider and decide on the weight to which it was entitled, from the interruption of the conversation in which the prisoner had spoken of Candler's evidence. It seems to this Court, that there is a weighty objection to the admission of the evidence which was introduced to prove what Candler had sworn to in the Called Court. The Attorney for the Commonwealth supposed that he had laid a foundation for the introduction of that evidence, in the interrupted conversation of the prisoner. The objection to the evidence is, that in reality the prisoner made no confession of guilt at all; the conversation was rather a declaration of his innocence, than a confession of guilt. Nor was it a confession that Candler's evidence was true: he said that what Candler swore to was true, as far as he went, but he did not say all, or enough. If a witness has told the truth, but not the whole truth, his evidence is not true. The conversation, then, of 708 *the prisoner, laid no foundation whatever for the introduction of the other evidence, and both should have been excluded from the consideration of the jury. A question, however, arises on this Bill of Exceptions, of a graver and more important character: it is, whether the evidence which Candler gave on the examination, can be admitted per se, and independently of the prisoner's confession, Candler having removed from the Commonwealth. In a civil action, if a witness who has been examined in a former trial between the same parties, and on the same issue, is since dead, what he swore to on the former trial, may be given in evidence, for the evidence was given on oath; and the party had an opportunity of cross-examining him. Peake, 60; Phillips, 199. But we cannot find that the rule has ever been allowed in a criminal case; indeed, it is said to be expressly otherwise. Peake, 60, quoting Fenwicke's Case, 4 St. Trials. Nor can we find that the rule in civil cases extends to the admission of the evidence formerly given by a witness who has removed beyond the jurisdiction of the country; much less can it be admitted in a criminal case. We are all, therefore, of opinion, that there is error in the judgment of the Court, as set forth in the first part of the Bill of Exceptions.

*Absent. DADE and SEMPLE, J.

2. Of the second exception, no notice need be taken, because it relates to the proof of what Candler had sworn to on the former occasion, and we have excluded it on another ground.

3. The third exception relates to evidence offered by the prisoner; but, as the Court is equally divided on its admissibility, it will not be noticed.

4. In the progress of the trial, the Attorney for the Commonwealth offered in evidence the warrant for the apprehension of the prisoner, and one Jesse G. Ballard, charged with this offence. The prisoner moved to exclude it, but the Court permitted it to go to the jury, accompanied with the instruction that it was no evidence of the truth of any of the recitals contained in it, and could only be 709 looked *into for the purpose of ascertaining the period of commencing the prosecution, and the persons against whom it was commenced. On offering the warrant in evidence, the prisoner's counsel admitted, that the Jesse G. Ballard named therein, was the same person who had been examined as a witness for the prisoner.

As the warrant for apprehending the prisoner does not appear to be evidence of itself, it was certainly the duty of the attorney to shew the relevancy of it: if it was wanting for the purpose of shewing the date of the prosecution, it would have answered that purpose to have stated to the jury the date which appeared on the warrant, and that might have been stated by the counsel, or a witness; but, it was improper to give it in evidence for the purpose of shewing the persons against whom it was issued, without shewing that from some previous evidence, that fact became material in the cause; the rule being, that where evidence is not prima facie admissible, the circumstances which render it so must be set out.

5. In the course of the trial, the Attorney for the Commonwealth examined a witness, who deposed, that the prisoner had, on two or three occasions within twelve months before the commencement of the prosecution, applied to the witness to procure for him counterfeit money from a person on Big Sandy river, who was reported to make it, but the witness did not recollect that either bank notes or coin were particularly mentioned; that on one of these occasions, when the witness had recently returned from that part of the country, in which he resides, the prisoner enquired of him, if he had brought him any of the money, and on being told that he had not, the prisoner replied, that he must go over himself, and spoke of obtaining employment in that quarter as a surveyor, and using it as a means of cultivating an acquaintance with the person reported to be engaged in counterfeiting, but that the witness had no knowledge of the prisoner's ever going to that quarter of the country, or his being absent from 710 Kanawha *at any time since. The prisoner objected to this evidence, but the Court admitted it as tending to prove the scienter.

The passing a counterfeit note, may be of itself a perfectly innocent transaction; the guilt consists in passing it, knowing it to be counterfeit. If no other circumstances than those of the transaction itself are given in evidence, it would be impossible to ascertain whether it was passed with this guilty knowledge, or not. Hence Courts have been driven to the necessity in such cases, of admitting evidence of the conduct of the prisoner, so that from his conduct on one occasion, the jury may infer his knowledge on another. Thus, in Whiley & Haines's Case, (2 Leach, 983,) on a charge of uttering forged notes, evidence was admitted to prove that they had uttered other forged notes, knowing them to be forged. So in Ball's Case, it being proved that the prisoner had uttered counterfeit notes in June, 1807, proof was offered to shew that he had, in the March preceding, uttered another forged note, and that from December, 1806, various forged notes had been paid into bank endorsed with his hand-writing. In these cases, substantive felonies were allowed to be given in evidence, for the purpose of proving that he knew that the note he uttered was forged. Is not the evidence offered here, admissible on the same principle? The prisoner endeavoured to engage a person to procure for him counterfeit money; enquired whether he had brought him any, and declared that he intended to cultivate the acquaintance of a counterfeiter, and for that purpose, intended to remove to a place near his residence. This evidence taken singly, it is true, may have but little weight; but, all the evidence in the cause is not given, and there may have been other circumstances connected with it, which would manifestly prove the guilty knowledge. The evidence given is probably a link in the chain of evidence, and being so, it would be wrong to exclude it from the consideration of the jury, the object being to infer from his conduct 711 and declarations, *his knowledge of this fact. On this ground, a majority of the Court is of opinion, that there was no error in admitting it.

But, the judgment is to be reversed for the errors contained in the first and fourth exceptions, and a new trial awarded.

John Tyler, Governor, &c. v. David Greenlaw.

November, 1827.

Justice of Peace—Power to Bail.—A Justice of the Peace, before whom is brought a prisoner charged with a felony, has power to bail him, where only a slight suspicion of guilt falls on the party; and a recognizance taken before such Justice, conditioned for the appearance of such prisoner before the Examining Court, is good, and a recovery may be had thereon, if the party makes default.

Recognizance—Declaration on—Sufficiency of.*—Although the condition of a recognizance does not specify the court-house of the county as the place at which the prisoner is to appear, and the declaration on the recognizance avers that such was the condition, yet on nul tiel record pleaded, judgment ought to be rendered for the plaintiff, because the statute points out that as the only place where the examination shall be had.

This was an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Law for the county of Richmond. It was an action of debt, brought in the said Superior Court, on the following recognizance: "Be it remembered, that on the 8th September, in the year of our Lord 1826, David Greenlaw, of the county of Richmond, labourer, James Shepherd, of the said county, labourer, Dominic Bennehan, of the said county, labourer, and Richard O. Jeffries, of the said county, labourer, came before us, three of the Commonwealth's Justices of the Peace for the county of Richmond, and severally acknowledged themselves to be indebted to John Tyler, Esquire, Governor or Chief Magistrate of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and his successors, that is to say; the said David Greenlaw, in the 712 sum of three thousand *dollars, and the said James Shepherd, Dominic Bennehan, and Richard O. Jeffries, in the sum of one thousand dollars each, to be respectively levied of their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, if the said David Greenlaw shall make default in the performance of the condition underwritten.

"The condition of this recognizance is such, that if the above bound David Greenlaw shall personally appear before the Commonwealth's Justices assigned to keep the peace, in and for the county aforesaid, on Monday, the 18th day of this month, then and there to answer the Commonwealth aforesaid, for and concerning a charge against him, on behalf of the Commonwealth, for knowingly and feloniously passing at different times, a considerable amount of notes, counterfeit on the Bank of Virginia, to James V. Berrick, with which the said David Greenlaw stands charged before us, and to do and receive what by the said Court shall then and there be ordered and judged, and shall not depart thence without the leave of the said Court, then this recognizance shall be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue.

"D. Greenlaw, (Seal.)

"James Shepherd, (Seal.)

"Dominic Bennehan, (Seal.)

"Richard O. Jeffries, (Seal.)

"Acknowledged before us,

"John Darby,

"Moore F. Brockenbrough,

"Thomas R. Barnes."

The declaration sets forth the recognizance, and condition, according to their effect, stating the condition to be that the said David Greenlaw should personally appear before the Commonwealth's Justices assigned to keep the peace, in and for the county aforesaid, on Monday, the 18th day of September, 1826, at the court-house of the said county, &c. to answer, &c. and should do and receive what by the said Court, that is, the Court to be held 713 at *the court-house of the county aforesaid, on the 18th September, 1826, for the purpose of examining into the fact with which the said David stood charged as aforesaid, should then and there be ordered and adjudged; it refers to the recognizance as now remaining of record in the County Court of Richmond; it avers the breach of the recognizance in this, that the said David Greenlaw did not personally appear before the Commonwealth's Justices assigned to keep the peace for the said county, at the time aforesaid, and at the court-house aforesaid, at which time and place, it also avers, that the said Justices did hold a Court for the examination of the fact with which the said David stood charged, and vouches the record of the said Examining Court; and demands the penalty of the recognizance.

The defendant demurred generally to the declaration; and also pleaded nul tiel record, as to the supposed recognizance; and issue was joined on the demurrer and plea by the Attorney for the Commonwealth. The record exhibits a transcript from the record of the Examining Court, by which it appears that the default of the defendant is recorded, and the recognizance is ordered to be recorded and estreated.

The Superior Court adjourned to the General Court, the questions arising on the demurrer and plea, for its decision.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.*

(After stating the case.) The only question which arises on the demurrer to the declaration, is this: Had the Justices of the Peace, before whom the recognizance was taken, power to let the said Greenlaw to bail, and to take the recognizance in the declaration mentioned? The Court is of opinion, that the act of Assembly

714 concerning bail in *criminal cases. (1 Rev. Code, p. 595-6,) does authorise a Justice of the Peace to let any prisoner to bail, who may be apprehended for any crime, of which only a light suspicion of guilt falls on the party, although such crime may be punishable with death, or by confinement in the Penitentiary, such being the plain and obvious meaning of the statute. This general power is not taken away by the act concerning criminal proceedings against free persons, (1 Rev. Code, p. 596,) which directs that the Justice before whom a free person shall be charged with treason, murder, or other crime or misdemeanor, if in his opinion such offence ought to be enquired into by the Courts of his Commonwealth, to commit the person so charged to the county or corporation jail. The Legislature did not intend thereby to diminish the rights of the prisoner, nor divest the Justices of the Peace of their power in relation to bail. It would be giving too harsh a construction to this statute, to give it that interpretation, especially when there is nothing in it which cannot be reconciled with the provisions of the statute concerning bail. The very act of letting to bail, supposes a previous commitment to prison, and whether that imprisonment is by being in custody of an officer of the law, or within the walls of a jail, is wholly immaterial. The Court is therefore of opinion, that the Justices had authority to let the said Greenlaw to bail, and, consequently, the capacity to take the recognizance in the declaration mentioned.

*See principal case cited in Archer v. Com., 10 Gratt. 636.

The question arising on the issue made up on the plea of nul tiel record, is also adjourned. Upon inspecting the transcript of the recognizance shewn in evidence, a majority of the Court is of opinion, that there is such record as is set forth in the declaration, because, although the condition of the recognizance does not specify the court-house as the place at which the said Greenlaw is to appear, yet, as that is the place directed by the statute at which the Justices are directed to examine into offences, no other place can be intended by the recognizance. We are therefore 715 *of opinion, that judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff, on that issue.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

The Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the law upon the demurrer of the defendant to the declaration of the plaintiff, is for the plaintiff, and there being shewn in evidence, such record as the plaintiff in pleading hath alleged, judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff on the issue joined, which is ordered to be certified.

The Commonwealth v. Prentis Chubb.

November, 1827.

Statute—Prevention of Sale of Lottery Tickets—Rule of Interpretation.—The act of Assembly, passed 11th February, 1825, entitled, "an act to prevent the sale of foreign lottery tickets within this Commonwealth," does not come within the operation of the 29th section of the gaming law, and is, therefore, not to be interpreted as if it were a remedial law, but like other penal laws.

Lottery Ticket—What Constitutes.—A guarantee, (or written assurance or promise, whereby the warrantor binds himself that he will pay the prize which may be drawn to a certain number in a lottery,) when sold by the proprietor of a lottery, or a duly authorized agent of the proprietor, is strictly a lottery ticket, although it is not written in the usual form of lottery tickets; and the sale of such guarantee by such proprietor or his agent, is forbidden by the said act of 1825.

Same—What Constitutes Sale of.—If an individual opens an office, and sells guarantees as a substitute for lottery tickets, he the vendor holding the tickets themselves for the benefit of the purchaser, he sells those things which are substantially lottery tickets, and such sale is forbidden by the said act.

The defendant was indicted at the Superior Court of Law for the county of Henrico, under the act passed 11th February, 1825, entitled, "an act to prevent the sale of foreign lottery tickets within this Commonwealth." The Indictment contained five counts, but the defendant was convicted on three counts only, which are as follows:

716 "Henrico County, to wit: The jurors for the Commonwealth of Virginia, duly summoned to attend the Superior Court of Law for the trial of criminal causes, directed by law to be holden for the county of Henrico aforesaid, upon their oaths present:

"That Prentis Chubb, late of the county of Henrico, labourer, on the twenty-second day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, at the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this Court, under a false and feigned pretence of transferring and delivering to one Spotswood D. Crenshaw a certain paper writing, purporting to be signed by certain persons calling themselves Allens, and purporting to guarantee the payment of what a certain lottery ticket, in a lottery called the Union Canal Lottery of Pennsylvania, seventeenth class, would be entitled to, unlawfully did sell the said lottery ticket in the said lottery, being a lottery not authorised by the laws of this Commonwealth, to the said Spotswood D. Crenshaw, and did then and there unlawfully, bargain, contract and agree with the said Spotswood D. Crenshaw, to sell to him, the said Spotswood D. Crenshaw, and to procure to his order the lottery ticket aforesaid, and unlawfully then and there did act, directly and indirectly, as agent, attorney and proxy for the managers of the said lottery, in the sale of the said lottery ticket, and in the procurement of the same for the said Spotswood D. Crenshaw, under the false and feigned pretence aforesaid, against the form of the act of the General Assembly in that case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present:

"That the said Prentis Chubb afterwards, to wit, on the same day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this Court, unlawfully did open, and keep open, a lottery office for trafficking and dealing in lottery tickets other than such as are 717 authorised by the laws of this Commonwealth, and did then and there unlawfully traffick and deal with one Spotswood D. Crenshaw, in selling to, and procuring for, the said Spotswood D. Crenshaw a certain lottery ticket, in a lottery called the Union Canal Lottery of Pennsylvania, the same being a lottery not authorised by the laws of this Commonwealth, against the form of the act of the General Assembly in that case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present:

"That the said Prentis Chubb afterwards, to wit, on the same day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this Court, unlawfully did procure for, transfer and sell to, one Spotawood D. Crenshaw a certain paper writing, signed by certain persons styling themselves Allens, purporting to guarantee the payment of what a certain lottery ticket would be entitled to in a certain lottery, called the Union Canal Lottery, seventeenth class, the said lottery not being authorised by the laws of this Commonwealth, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and against the form of the act of the General Assembly in that case made and provided."

The defendant having been found guilty by the jury, he by his counsel moved the Court to set aside the verdict, and grant him a new trial on the ground, that the Court had, during the progress of the trial, misdirected the jury on the law of the case. Pending this motion, the defendant asked the Court to adjourn to the General Court the questions arising on that instruction; and the Court being of opinion, that the decision of the highest tribunal ought to be had on this new law, did adjourn to the General Court as a question of novelty and difficulty, the following:

"Was the instruction given by the Court a misdirection, and ought a new trial to be awarded to the defendant on that ground?"

718 *The instruction given by the Judge of the Superior Court of Henrico to the jury, was in the following terms:

"The first question in this case is, how shall this law be construed. The act of Assembly declares, that 'in every case that may arise under any laws, for the preventing, discouraging, or suppressing of gaming, the Court shall interpret them as remedial, and not as penal statutes.' It was a rule of construction at the common law, that all penal statutes should be construed strictly: but, this rule of construction, like all other common law rules, the Legislature had the competent power to change. They have expressed their decided intention to change that rule in the case of those penal laws, which are intended to prevent, discourage, or suppress gaming. Is the purchase and sale of lottery tickets an act of gaming? In common parlance it is certainly so considered, and the Legislature obviously so considered it, when they by the act of February 20th, 1812, entitled, 'an act to amend an act to reduce into one, the several acts to prevent unlawful gaming,' prohibited the offence of putting up a lottery publicly or privately, to be drawn or adventured for; and when again in 1819, on a general revision of the laws, they not only included the former provision against private lotteries, but the new provision against buying or selling of lottery tickets, in lotteries not authorised by the laws of this State. It is, however, contended, that this rule of construction does not apply to future laws for the prevention, discouragement, or suppression of gaming, but extends only to prior or cotemporaneous laws of that kind. This idea is, however, refuted by the term of the clause itself: it extends to 'every case that may arise under any laws, &c.' clearly shewing, that all laws, future as well as present, on the subject of gaming, are to be construed by that rule. Another consideration will clearly prove the correctness of this position. When this rule was incorporated in the general law, at the revision of 1819, there was no other law in force on the subject, except that law itself. If it had 719 been intended to 'confine the application of the rule to that law only, the language would have been, 'In every case which may arise under this law, the Court shall consider it as remedial, &c.'"

"It is urged, that the Legislature did not intend by this act, to suppress or discourage gaming, because they have still tolerated the sale of tickets in our own lotteries; and that the true and only motive was, to prevent our people from becoming tributary to other States, by purchasing tickets in lotteries authorized by their laws. That this may have been one of the motives, I am not disposed to deny. One of the effects of this rage for gambling in lotteries, is to transfer a large portion of our monied capital to the northern cities, to which the Legislature were anxious to put a stop. But, I cannot admit that this was the only motive. The spirit of adventure in lotteries, had infected all orders of men: the rich man and the poor man, the merchant and the mechanic, the loungers and the labourer, the freeman and the slave, had all coveted the smiles of fortune by resorting to the lottery offices: they were all dazzled by the deceitful hope of becoming suddenly rich. Idleness, laziness and prodigality, were the effects of this disposition. To put a stop to these injuries to the morals of the community, as well as to check the northern current by which their wealth was swept away, the Legislature interposed their authority. They have assumed a guardianship over their concerns, by prohibiting, to a certain extent, one species of gambling as they have heretofore prohibited many other kinds of gambling: that they still permit the sale of lottery tickets when authorised by themselves, affords no argument to prove, that they do not consider the dealing in lottery tickets as a dangerous species of gambling. They can always prevent this species of traffic from running into excess, (so far as it consists in the purchase or sale of our own tickets,) by refusing to authorise the drawing of a lottery. But, they have no control over the permission granted by other States to set up lotteries, and they cannot, therefore, 720 prevent the gambling in 'those foreign lotteries to any excess, however mischievous, unless they prevent the sale of them altogether. These I apprehend to be the motives which actuate the Legislature in prohibiting the sale of foreign, while they permit the sale of our own, lottery tickets.

"Whether this guardianship be a wise exercise of power or not, let the moralist and political economist discuss as much as they please. Courts and Juries have only a right to expound the law, and when rightly expounded, to enforce it.

"This act is then to be construed liberally: the Courts and Juries must put such a construction on it as may suppress the mischief intended to be remedied; as will guard against all subtle inventions and evasions intended to continue the mischief for private advantage, and give life and strength to the remedy, pro bono publico, according to the true intent of the makers of the law.

"This brings us to the question, whether a guarantee, or written assurance, or promise, whereby the warrantor binds himself that he will pay the prize which may be drawn to a certain number in a lottery, be a lottery ticket, or not, within the true intent and meaning of this law. I think there can be no doubt that if the proprietor of the lottery, or a duly authorised agent of the proprietor, were to issue such guarantees, that they would be strictly and literally lottery tickets. There is no set form of a lottery ticket: it is a written promise that the proprietors will be responsible for the prize; and whether they use the usual form or not, their responsibility is the same: And I am equally clear, that if a man opens an office, from which he vends assurances, or guarantees, as a substitute for lottery tickets, and for the purpose of evading and defeating the law, although he does not strictly and literally sell lottery tickets, yet he does sell those papers which are substantially lottery tickets, if it can be proved, or inferred from the evidence in the cause, that he the vendor holds the tickets themselves for the benefit of the purchaser; for, 721 "in such case, the vendor would be the bailee of the purchaser, and would be bound to give possession of the ticket to the purchaser when required. The mischief to the public is in such case just as great as the sale and delivery of the tickets themselves.

"There is one case, in which I know that a sale of a guarantee would not come within the spirit or meaning of the act. If a vendor, without having the possession of the tickets, or without having any control over them, were to undertake to insure to a purchaser that a certain number should draw a prize in a lottery, and that he would pay the prize when drawn, he would certainly not come within the spirit of the law. Such an insurance under such circumstances, could never be effected by any man in his senses, except at a price much greater than the usual price of tickets; that increased price, and the knowledge that the purchaser must rely exclusively on the personal responsibility of the vendor, with a certainty that he has no right to, and can never obtain the possession of, the ticket itself, would deter all persons from engaging in such traffic; the evil of laying out large sums in lotteries could never exist, and there would be no reason for extending the provisions of the law to such rare cases.

"Whether the defendant comes under one or the other of these classes of cases, I leave to the jury to decide, from the evidence which they have heard."

The case was argued in the General Court, by Leigh and Chapman Johnson, for the defendant, and by the Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

BOULDIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.*

The defendant was indicted in the Superior Court of Henrico, for a violation of the act of February, 1825, prohibiting the vending of tickets in lotteries not 722 authorised by the laws of this State, and prohibiting the opening of offices for that purpose. On his trial, it appeared that he sold papers signed "Allens," (of which firm he was a partner,) whereby Allen's guarantee to the holder what the number on that paper might draw: the name of the lottery appears on the papers, as also the number. After the whole evidence had been given to the jury, and the cause argued, the Judge instructed the jury that such a paper as the one above described, sold by the proprietor of the lottery, is a lottery ticket, though called by him a guarantee; and that if such paper be sold by another, as a substitute for a lottery ticket, the seller being in possession of the ticket, and holding it for the use of the buyer, and this done to evade the operation of the law, such sale is a violation of the law. But, previous to giving these instructions, the Judge discusses at large the question whether the act of 1825 should be construed as a remedial law under the operation of the act of 1802, and he concludes that it must be so construed, and says, that such conclusion brings him to the question, what is the character of the papers before described? In answer to that question, he gives one instance, in which he says, such papers are lottery tickets, when sold by the proprietor of the lottery; and one other instance, in which he says their sale would violate the law, when made by others than the proprietor, to evade the statute. He then states the case of a guarantee which would be innocent, and submits to the jury whether the defendant comes under one or the other of these classes of cases. The jury found the defendant guilty, and his counsel moved for a new trial, on the ground, that the opinion delivered by the Judge was a misdirection of the jury; and the questions thence arising are adjourned to this Court. The cause has been argued with great ability both by the Attorney General and the defendant's Counsel. On the part of the defendant, it is contended, that the act of 1825 is a penal law unaffected by the act of 1802; first, on the ground that the latter act applies to no other laws than those in existence at the time it was passed, and also that the act of 1825 is not an act to suppress or discourage gaming within the meaning of the act of 1802; and a majority of the Court are of opinion, that the act of 1825 ought to be construed as all other penal laws are construed; and in this opinion, JUDGES BROCKENBROUGH, ALLEN and SUMMERS do not concur.

It is then contended, and with great force of argument, that the opinion of the Superior Court, that the said act of 1825 should be liberally expounded, was a substantive instruction to the jury; and if so, that opinion being deemed erroneous by this Court, a new trial should be directed of course. We have given this argument our best attention. By some of the Court it is contended, that this conclusion of the Judge, from the opinion itself, forms no part of the instructions given to the jury. It is perfectly evident, that the range of argument adopted by him was wholly designed to shew the enlarged ground, on which he supposed the instructions which were to follow might be justified. We can see no distinction between this and other cases, where the argument is wrong and the judgment is right. The object of the Judge was to tell the jury what character the law stamps on the papers before the jury, with reference to the case then before the Court; and if that character be given truly and according to law, it matters not whether the Judge would have so delineated it, if he had not supposed greater latitude was to be taken in the construction of the act than is approved by this Court. But, it is contended, that the circumstances in the cause embrace questions of fact, which might have been solved by the jury in some other way, than simply giving an affirmative or negative answer to the propositions laid down by the Court; and if so, the direct opinion of the Judge, that the law should be so construed as to advance the remedy and suppress the mischief, assumes the character of operative instructions to the jury. This objection was enforced, by supposing cases with an ingenuity, from which, at the time, there appeared to be no escape, and supported by argument 724 wholly unanswerable, *if the premises be true. But, is it true that the case allows of the supposition that these guarantees (as they are called) might have been so sold as to be without the range of either of the direct instructions of the Judge? And could the jury, consistently with those instructions, find the defendant guilty, under the idea that the facts proved only a case of equal mischief? We think not.

The first and second propositions of the Judge embrace every possible case of a sale of the guarantees alluded to. The third states a guarantee not in the case. The first of these propositions is, that such a paper, sold by the proprietor of the lottery, is a ticket; i. e. the sign or symbol of the holder's interest in the wheel: the second states, what facts the jury must find to constitute guilt, if the paper was sold by any other than the proprietor; and no case can be conceived that falls not within a sale by the proprietor or some other person. We therefore think, that (this objection notwithstanding) this case must rest on the propriety of the instructions given to the jury. The objections made to the first of these instructions, are deemed by the Court by far the most important in the whole case, and the attention paid to them at the bar has been proportioned to their importance. The objection is, that the abstract general proposition is too broad; that supposing the fact, that lottery tickets might assume that form, if those who issue them so please, it should have been left to the jury to find the fact, whether they were issued as, and for, tickets; and further, the general allegation, that such papers issued by the proprietor, are tickets, is not law; for, there are cases in which such papers might be issued, where they could with no propriety be called the sign of the holder's interest in the lottery, and so not tickets. In support of these objections, many cases were supposed, and with great propriety a demand made, that they should be fairly met and answered. The case supposed, at the time this demand was made, is extremely imposing, and an answer to it includes an answer to the whole objection. It 725 supposes the *case of a guarantee, an insurance simply, as the word imports, that the prize drawn to a particular number shall be paid: that such contract is, or may be, different from the sale of a ticket; to prove which, it is among other things supposed, that he to whom the guarantee was made, was before owner of the ticket, or that some one else was owner.

This, it is said, is embraced by the terms of the instruction, and the jury must have found the party guilty, had the supposed case been true. An answer to this objection is found in the plain, legal and common sense meaning of the instruction itself. It affirms, that these papers are tickets, when sold by the proprietor of the lottery; that in such original direct undertaking, by him who holds the prize, the words "I guarantee," have no meaning different from "I will pay;" and we can conceive no form of writing more exactly answering the purpose of evincing the holder's interest in the lottery, and securing to him the receipt of the prize drawn. There is no imaginable case, where the holder of the paper in question has not an identity of rights with the holder of any other promise to pay the prize drawn. But, what is called the real ticket might, it is said, have been sold to another, and surety a guarantee that A. shall have the prize drawn by B's ticket, is no sale of a ticket. There is nothing more true, than this objection in the form it is urged. But, we have before seen, that such papers, sold by the proprietor, are tickets, and he in that case has only sold two tickets of the same number, and bound himself to pay the prize drawn to each. Whether, therefore, the proprietor has before sold a ticket of the same number or not, the sale of the paper in the record is the sale of a ticket. But, the holder may have before purchased the ticket, and it may have been destroyed or so obliterated, as that the holder needs such a paper as the one in question. To this objection the answer is, that the instructions of the Court plainly suppose an original sale, and by no fair construction can be made to embrace the case of such collateral undertaking. There was 726 nothing *in the evidence, which, in the most distant manner, alluded to the state of facts supposed by this objection. If the ticket had been purchased out of the State, and afterwards the name or number is obliterated, and the proprietor within the State hand him another ticket of the same number, this is no sale of a ticket under the act, but evidence simply of the right acquired under a former sale and purchase: and yet, can it be seriously asked whether, when the Court is informing the jury that the sale of such tickets violates the law, that it would be needful to qualify the remark by a statement, that a delivery of such papers, which is no sale, will not have that effect? The qualification the objection supposes, could not be annexed to the instruction given by way of exception to its general operation, because it would not be embraced in its general terms. The furnishing evidence of a former right, or giving further assurance for its enjoyment, comes with no propriety under the idea of a sale; and it was not necessary for the Court to have given that explanation to the jury, since it was entirely plain without it.

The second of the direct instructions to the jury, we think clear of difficulty. The facts there stated, constitute a sale of the ticket to all intents and purposes; nor is the sale less complete, because the ticket is not delivered. Neither does the fact of a superadded warrantee, make the least difference. The purchaser, by the legal effect of his contract, has a right to the ticket, and the seller to the stipulated price; and it is perfectly immaterial how involved and complicated a contract is; if it result in giving the seller the price, and the buyer title to the thing, it is a sale. It is difficult to place the fact of sale in a more clear light, than it is exhibited by the instruction itself; the seller holds the ticket, he sells the guarantee as its substitute; that guarantee contains stipulations binding the signer to the same effects as the ticket binds the proprietor, and the seller thenceforth holds the ticket for the buyer's use. Whether the ticket be sold by that transaction, depends on what is here 27 meant *by holding the ticket to the use of the buyer: it can mean nothing but this, that the buyer is to have the avails of the ticket, and the use thereof to get those avails; and what other title can a man have to a bond payable to himself and in his pocket? We confidently say none. The Counsel racked their invention to state cases embracing all the propositions in this instruction, and in which the ticket would not be sold; but, we think they entirely failed.

The opinion here delivered is not in conflict with the authorities cited; they prove clearly that the thing plainly forbidden must be done, or punishment cannot follow. We deem it unnecessary to go through those cases, but will refer to some of the most prominent. In Mary Mitchell's Case, 2 East, 936, the Court decided in a prosecution for forgery, that the terms warrant or order in the statute, did not cover the case of an order for, or request to, deliver goods not belonging to the party in whose name the order was drawn: this was certainly a very strict construction of the statute, and subsequent Judges unwillingly have conformed to it. But, does any one think that a rule so rigid would have been adopted in a case of misdemeanor? But, after the construction of the act was thus settled, the question did not turn on the form of doing the thing, but whether it was done. In Hunter's Case, 2 East, 928, the defect was in the indictment which did not set forth and aver facts constituting a receipt. It is evident, that had all the actual facts been stated in the indictment, the party would have been deemed guilty, but be that as it may, the question in all these cases was, whether the instrument in itself or by proper averments and proof was the thing, the forgery of which, the Legislature declared should be felony. But, in deciding whether the form of the instrument forged was within the statute, the Courts always governed themselves by the answer to the question whether the legal effect of it, if genuine, would be the thing forbidden, and finally came to the conclusion now familiar to all, that the counterfeit might be forgery, though the instrument was *so made, as if 728 genuine, it would not be effectual to its purpose, provided it was so near like that which would be effectual, as to deceive ordinary observers. It is decided in Locket's Case, and several others, that the instrument charged to be forged may be called warrants, provided that in legal effect they are so; even though they pass currently under different names. The question in all these cases is, whether the thing done, is the thing forbidden, and the form of doing it is of little importance.

The following is to be entered as the judgment of the Court.

The Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the instructions given to the jury, as applicable to this case, were right and proper; and, therefore, no new trial ought to be granted to the defendant on the ground of misdirection.

INDEX.

ABDUCTION.

The seduction and abduction of a female over sixteen years of age, (being not within the statute,) cannot be punished by indictment. It would have been otherwise, if a conspiracy had been charged.

Anderson v. The Commonwealth, 627

ADMINISTRATOR.

1. An administrator de bonis non, cannot sue the representative of a former executor or administrator, either at law or in equity, for assets wasted or converted by the first executor or administrator; but such suit may be brought directly by creditors, legatees or distributees.

Coleman, adm'r de bonis non of

Wernick v. M'Murdo, &c., 51

2. This remedy was given to the administrator de bonis non, by the act of 1661; but that act was repealed by the act of 1711.

Ibid.

ADVANCEMENT.

1. Where a legacy is given to a child, and afterwards an advancement is made to that child, such advancement shall be taken as a satisfaction of the legacy; but this presumption may be rebutted by evidence.

Jones v. Mason, &c. 577

2. The rule that the thing advanced must be ejusdem generis with the thing bequeathed, may be controlled by evidence shewing that it was the testator's intention that the one should be in satisfaction of the other.

Ibid.

AMENDMENT.

1. A judgment is rendered by default in the General Court, upon notice, on a bond due to the Commonwealth; but the clerk, in entering the judgment, only allows interest from a date posterior to that from which, by the terms of the bond, interest was to run. This error may be amended, upon motion to the General Court, at a succeeding term.

Commonwealth v. Winstons, 546

2. This power of amendment applies to a motion, as well as to an action, and extends to the General Court.

ASSIGNMENT.

Where a note, not negotiable, is endorsed by several persons in succession, the last assignee could only sue the maker and his immediate assignor, and not a remote assignor, before the act of 1807.

Caton & Veale v. Lenox, &c., 31

ATTACHMENT.

A Capias ad Respondendum being returned "not found," an attachment is issued, which neither specified the names of the plaintiffs, nor of the defendants. It is levied on an "ox cart," without saying to whom the ox cart belonged. For 730 each *of these defects, the attachment is void.

Clay v. Neilson,

ATTORNEY.

An attorney at law has no right to receive a bond from the debtor in discharge of his debtor's claim, without the assent of the client. If he does, he is the agent, not of the plaintiff, but of the defendant, and the plaintiff may still proceed against the defendant.

Smock v. Dade,

AUDITA QUERELA.

The Audita Querela, to relieve a defendant from an execution, where the matter of discharge has been subsequent to the judgment, is an obsolete remedy, and has been substituted in modern practice by the motion.

Smock v. Dade,

AUTREFOIS ACQUIT.

A plea of Autrefois acquit, which does not set forth the Court, nor the time, nor other circumstances of the trial or acquittal, nor vouch the record, nor shew it, if of another Court, should be rejected on motion. The attorney ought not to be required, either to plead or demur to it.

Wortham v. The Commonwealth, 669

BAIL.

1. There is no obligation on the assignee of a note to pursue the bail of the maker, before the assignee can sue his assignor.

Caton & Veale v. Lenox, &c., 31

2. Bail cannot be relieved in equity, against a judgment by default, without assigning some good reason why he did not defend himself at law.

Brown v. Toell's adm'r, 543

3. When a prisoner, who has been remanded for trial by the Examining Court, to the Superior Court, on a charge of felony, and against whom a bill of indictment has been found by the Grand Jury, applies to the Superior Court to be let to bail, on the ground that there is only a slight suspicion of guilt against him, the judgment, and the finding of the bill, are not conclusive evidence against the application, but the Court may examine other evidence.

The Commonwealth v. Rutherford, 646

4. But, it is a question for the exercise of the sound discretion of the Court; and if they are satisfied that there is material evidence for the Commonwealth, that is not before the court, was not before the Examining Court, or spread upon the record, the Court ought not to sustain the motion.

Ibid.

5. A Justice of the Peace, before whom a prisoner charged with a felony, has power to bail him, where only a slight suspicion of guilt falls on the party; and a recognizance taken before such Justice, conditioned for the appearance of such prisoner before the Examining Court, is good, and a recovery may be had thereon, if the party makes default.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where evidence, not admissible in itself, but which may become so by being connected with other evidence, is rejected by the Court, and a bill of exceptions filed; the bill ought to state that such other evidence was offered; otherwise, it will not be presumed.

CLERICAL ERROR.

What shall be deemed a clerical error? Rees v. Conococheague Bank, 326

CONFESSION.

If a prisoner, in speaking of the testimony of a witness who had testified against him, says, "that what C. said was true so far as he went, but that he did not say all, or enough;" this is not admissible 731 as a confession *of the prisoner; nor does it lay any foundation for proving to the jury what C. did swear to.

Finn v. Commonwealth, 701

CONSTABLE.

A Constable is not authorised by the 25th section of the act concerning executions, to take the indemnifying bond there prescribed, when he levies an execution issued by a single Magistrate on a judgment for a small debt.

CORPORATION.

In a suit brought by a corporation, it is not necessary to aver in the declaration that it is a corporation duly constituted, or that it is authorised by law to sue in its corporate name; but, these questions may be put in issue by the defendant, or raised upon the trial of the general issue.

Rees v. Conococheague Bank, 326

COSTS.

In a case of great novelty, the Chancery Court ought not to give costs to either party.

Jones v. Mason, &c., 577

COURT OF APPEALS.

A dissolved injunction is revived by an appeal taken by the plaintiff in the Court of Chancery; and it is improper in the appellee to take out execution, so long as the appeal is depending. Quare, whether the party offending should be punished by the Court of Appeals, or the Court of Chancery?

Turner v. Scott, &c., 332

DEMURRER.

In a declaration on a bond with collateral condition, if there be two assignments of breaches, and either assignment be good, and the whole declaration is demurred to, the demurrer ought to be overruled.

Martin v. Sturm, &c., 693

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. The practice of inserting in a demurrer to evidence, the evidence on both sides, is established by repeated decisions in this State.

Green v. Judith, &c., 1

2. In such case, the demurrant must be considered as admitting all that can reasonably be inferred by a jury, from the evidence given by the other party; and as waiving all the evidence on his part, which contradicts that offered by the other party, or the credit of which is impeached, and all inferences from his own evidence, which do not necessarily flow from it. Ibid.

3. If a party finds out, after a demurrer to evidence, that he ought not to have demurred, but should have left his cause to a jury, the Court cannot award a venire de novo. Ibid.

DEPOSITIONS.

A notice to take depositions is insufficient, if it omits the place where the depositions are to be taken; nor, if the Magistrates meet on the day appointed, can they resume the taking of depositions at any future day, without an adjournment to such day.

Hunter v. Fulcher, 126

DILIGENCE.

In general, due diligence must be used by the assignee in bringing suit against the maker, before the assignor can be sued; but, there are many cases in which no suit need be brought against the maker as where the note was a forgery, or the assignor has received the money from the maker, or where the assignor practised a fraud upon the assignee, or where exchanged notes were given between the maker and assignor as a consideration for each other, and the note given by the assignor has never been paid by him, nor sued upon, &c.

Caton and Veale v. Lenox, &c., 31

DISCOUNT.

1. A loan on accommodation paper, and a discount on real paper, stand on the same footing, as to the right of a bank to deduct the interest in advance on the whole amount of the note.

Stribbling v. Bank of the Valley, 132

2. Taking interest in advance upon the whole of a note discounted at the bank, is lawful. Ibid.

DISMISSION.

1. A dismission of a presentment is not a retraxit, nor is a retraxit known to the criminal law, where the prosecution is carried on by the Commonwealth.

Wortham v. Commonwealth, 669

732 *2. The dismission of a presentment by the Court, at the instance of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, is not an acquittal. It is an informal Nolle Prosequi. Ibid.

EQUITY.

ESTATE TAIL.

1. A will is made between the 1st day of January, 1787, and the 1st day of January, 1820, by which the testator gives to his sons several tracts of land, and if either of them should die without lawful issue, the part allotted to him to be equally divided among his surviving brothers, &c.; this is a fee tail, and not an executory devise.

Bells v. Gillespie, 273

2. By a will dated in 1778, the testator gave a tract of land to his two sons, to be equally divided between them, to them and their heirs for ever; but, in case either of his said sons should die without issue lawfully begotten, he desired that the survivor should have the whole. But, if both his said sons should die without lawful issue, he desired that his land should be sold by his executors, and the money arising therefrom should be equally divided among his daughters then living, &c. This is an estate tail in the sons, which was converted into a fee simple by the act of 1776.

Broadbuss and Wife v. Turner, 308

EVIDENCE.

1. Where a witness has given evidence in a suit, in which a new trial is granted, and the witness die before the second trial, the substance of his testimony may be proved on the second trial, and it is not necessary to repeat his very words.

Caton and Veale v. Lenox, &c., 31

2. A remote assignor of a note not negotiable, might have been a competent witness, before the act of 1807, to prove that the immediate assignor was discharged, in a suit between him and the last assignee. Ibid.

3. It seems, that if the interest of the witness was apparent on the face of the paper, and he was not objected to on the first trial but on the contrary, was cross-examined, it is too late to make the objection on the second. Per Carr, Judge. Ibid.

4. Parol declarations of a grantor, previous to the execution of a deed, and at the very moment of executing it, are admissible to explain the intention with which it was made. Per Carr, J.

Land v. Jeffries, 211

5. The book of a teller in a Bank, is not per se evidence to establish the facts appearing in that book, but may be given in evidence in connection with the evidence of the teller himself, if the said teller's evidence make it proper to refer to it, to prove that a particular entry was made.

Courtney v. Commonwealth, 666

6. See Confession.

7. In a criminal case, proof of what a witness (who is since dead,) swore to on a former trial between the same parties, and on the same issue, is inadmissible.

Finn v. Commonwealth, 701

EXECUTOR.

1. An executor cannot apply the assets of his testator to his own individual purposes, unless he is in advance to the estate to the same amount; and a purchaser, knowing of such application, purchases at his peril, &c.

Graff & al. v. Castleman, &c., 195

2. The rule that where a party relies on an account furnished by the other party, he is bound to take it all together, and admit the debits as well as the credits, unless he can surcharge and falsify it by proofs, is not applicable to an executor's account, nor to any case where there is a trust or confidence.

Robertson, &c. v. Archer, &c., 319

3. A suit by an executor against the legatees for advances made to the estate beyond the assets, will not be entertained after a great length of time has elapsed since the qualification of the executor, and the estate has been distributed with the consent of the executor. Ibid.

FOREIGN LAWS.

1. A law of another State is sufficiently authenticated under the act of Congress, if it has the seal of the State affixed thereto; and the particular officer entitled to affix the seal, depends upon the regulations of the several States, respectively.

Hunter v. Fulcher, 126

2. Where a party in a suit in Virginia, relies on the law of another State, to support his *claim, he may produce an authenticated copy of the section only on which he relies, without a copy of the whole law. Ibid.

FRAUD.

1. Where the grantor of personal property remains in possession, after an absolute conveyance, such conveyance will be deemed prima facie fraudulent.

Land v. Jeffries, 211

2. But, such possession is not conclusive evidence of fraud, but is open to explanation. Ibid.

3. Therefore, where a woman about to be married, makes a conveyance of her personal property to a third person, with the privity and approbation of her intended husband, the marriage takes place a few minutes after the conveyance, and the husband takes possession of the property after the marriage; the property, thus conveyed, will not be subject to the husband's creditors, as his possession after marriage, was not that of his wife, (she not being sui juris), and her short possession between the time of the conveyance and that of the marriage, not being sufficient, or of a nature to render the deed fraudulent.

Ibid.

4. See Caveat, No. 3.

GAMING.

1. Taking a chance in a raffle, at twenty dollars, or any less sum, although the property raffled for exceeds that sum, (the raffling being at a private house,) does not bring the person within the operation of the gaming act.

Commonwealth v. Garland, &c., 652

2. The winner of the thing raffled for, (it exceeding $20,) does come within the operation of the law, although neither of the losers (the loss of each being less than $20,) comes within it.

Ibid.

3. If the prize is won by two or more individuals, in partnership, but the gain of each is less than $20, neither of them is embraced by the law.

Ibid.

4. The taking a chance in a raffle, is not the same offence as the purchase of a foreign lottery ticket, and is, therefore, not liable to the penalty prescribed for the latter offence, by the latter part of the 27th section of the gaming act.

Ibid.

5. An indictment, which charges that unlawful gaming is carried on at a house of public resort, is good.

Wortham v. Commonwealth, 669

GENERAL COURT.

In general, the judgment of a Superior Court, although in favor of a prisoner, ought to yield to that of the General Court, expressed in an analogous case.

Commonwealth v. Carver, 660

INCONTINENCY.

1. Before the statute of circumspecte agatis, 13 Edw. 1, the Court of King's Bench punished offences of incontinency; but, since that statute, the cognizance of such offences has been transferred to the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Anderson v. Commonwealth, 627

2. The offences of adultery, fornication, and the like, cannot be punished by our Courts of law, as common law offences, unless they be accompanied with other circumstances, which of themselves constitute a misdemeanor; such as, the public commission of the act, or a conspiracy. The statutory offence must be punished according to the statute.

Ibid.

3. See Abduction.

4. The offence of fornication is not punishable as a common law offence. The statute, which prescribes a penalty for the offence, must be pursued in such case.

Commonwealth v. Isaacs and West, 634

INDEMNIFYING BOND.

A constable cannot take an indemnifying bond on an execution issued by a single magistrate on a judgment for a small debt.

Martin v. Sturm, &c., 693

INDICTMENT.

1. See Gaming, No. 5.

2. An indictment for a nuisance, which concludes "to the common nuisance of divers of the Commonwealth's citizens," is not sufficient. It should be laid to the common nuisance "of all the citizens of the Commonwealth, residing in the neighbourhood;" or, "of all the citizens, &c. residing, &c. and passing thereby."

Commonwealth v. Faris, 691

INDORSEMENT.

A blank indorsement of a note, is sufficient to vest a title in the holder, though it be not filled up before the judgment.

Rees v. Conococheague Bank, 326

INJUNCTION.

1. Where an injunction is awarded until the answer comes in, the injunction is not dissolved by the coming in of the answer, but is a subsisting injunction until it is dissolved by the subsequent order of the Chancellor.

Turner v. Scott, &c., 332

2. A dissolved injunction is revived by an appeal taken by the plaintiff in the Court of Chancery; and it is improper in the appellee to take out an execution, so long as the appeal is depending.

Ibid.

3. Quære, whether the party offending should be punished by the Court of Appeals, or the Court of Chancery?

Ibid.

INSTRUCTION.

A Court cannot be called upon to give an instruction on an abstract point of law.

Caton and Veale v. Lenox, &c., 31

INTEREST.

Interest cannot be recovered as of course, in actions for the recovery of rent, but may be given under circumstances, to be judged of by the jury.

Mickie v. Lawrence, &c., 571

JUDGMENT.

A judgment by default, for want of appearance, founded on an instrument of writing for the payment of money, on which an endorsement of a credit is made by the plaintiff himself, ought to be entered subject to such credit; or, if the plaintiff refuses to take the judgment in that way, a writ of enquiry should be awarded.

Rees v. Conococheague Bank, 326

JUROR.

A juror, who having heard the testimony of a witness in the cause, and then formed an opinion on it, and was doubtful whether he had expressed the opinion or not, though he thought it most probable he had expressed it, but declared at the time of the trial that he had no prejudice against the prisoner or his cause, and that he could, as he believed, give the prisoner as fair a trial as if he had not heard any thing on the subject, is an impartial juror, and a challenge against him for cause ought to be overruled.

Pollard v. Commonwealth, 659

LEASE.

1. No set form of words is necessary to constitute a lease; and a contract between two persons that one should have, during the life of the other, land, negroes, &c. he paying therefor a stipulated annual sum is not a sale, but a rent.

Mickie v. Lawrence, 571

2. Such a contract does not lose its character of a rent, by slaves and other personal property being included in the contract.

Ibid.

LEGACY.

1. Where a legacy is given to a child, and afterwards an advancement is made to that child, such advancement shall be taken as a satisfaction of the legacy, but this presumption may be rebutted by evidence.

Jones v. Mason, &c., 577

2. The rule that the thing advanced must be ejusdem generis with the thing bequeathed, may be controlled by evidence shewing that it was the testator's intention, that the one should be in satisfaction of the other.

Ibid.

LOTTERIES.

1. The act of Assembly, passed 11th of February, 1825, entitled, "an act to prevent the sale of foreign lottery tickets within this Commonwealth," does not come within the operation of the 29th section of the gaming law, and is, therefore, not to be interpreted as a remedial law, but like other penal laws.

Commonwealth v. Chubb, 715

2. A guarantee (or written assurance or promise, whereby the warrantor binds himself that he will pay the prize which may be drawn to a certain number in a lottery) when sold by the proprietor of a lottery, or a duly authorised agent of the proprietor, is strictly a lottery ticket, although it is not written in the form of lottery tickets; and the sale of such guarantee by such proprietor or his agent, is forbidden by the said act of 1825.

Ibid.

3. If an individual opens an office, and sells guarantees as a substitute for lottery tickets, he holding the tickets themselves for the benefit of the purchaser, he sells those things which are substantially lottery tickets, and such sale is forbidden by the said act.

Ibid.

MARRIAGE.

Quære, if a husband be prosecuted and convicted of an unlawful marriage, and the wife is not prosecuted, can a judgment of separation be pronounced on the verdict?

Commonwealth v. Leftwich, 657

*MARRIED WOMAN.

A conveyance by a woman while sole, of her own property (even if it were a deed of trust) who afterwards marries, although not recorded, is not void under the statute of frauds against the creditors of the husband; as the statute only applies to creditors of the grantor.

Land, &c. v. Jeffries, &c., 211

MILLS.

Although leave has been given by the County Court, to erect a mill, according to the provisions of the statute, yet that is no bar to a public prosecution or private action for injuries, other than those actually foreseen and estimated by the inquest.

Commonwealth v. Faris, 691

MOTION.

If, on a motion, (to quash an execution, or enter a judgment satisfied,) the relief of the party depends on matters of fact, the Court has a discretion to direct a jury, or try the facts.

Smock v. Dade, 639

PLEADING.

1. A declaration against an administrator, containing counts charging him in his individual character, combined with other counts, charging him in his representative character, is bad on general demurrer.

Epes's adm'r v. Dudley, adm'r &c., 437

2. But, where all the counts are laid against the defendant, as administrator, they will be considered as applying to him in his representative character, and therefore good; although the declaration, in some of the counts, omits to state that the claim was for money due from the intestate of the defendant.

Ibid.

PRACTICE.

The long prevalence of a practice, not sanctioned by law, will not give it validity, if it affects the rights of persons.

Wernick v. M'Murdo, &c., 51

PRIVILEGE.

1. The privilege of a member of Assembly, cannot be noticed by the Courts ex officio. As it may be waived, it must be claimed; and it can only be claimed by plea, or on motion tendered or made at the proper period.

Prentiss v. Commonwealth, 697

2. If a member of Assembly allows a judgment to be rendered against him during the existence of his privilege, and does not seek, during the progress of the proceedings, either to abate or suspend them, he will be deemed to have waived his privilege, and he cannot afterwards be allowed the writ of error coram vobis to reverse the judgment.

Ibid.

PROHIBITION.

The County Courts have no power to grant writs of prohibition. If they exceed their jurisdiction, by granting them, the Superior Courts of Law may restrain the exercise of such jurisdiction, by prohibition.

Jackson v. Maxwell, 636

PROSECUTOR.

1. In an indictment for a trespass or misdemeanor, it is not necessary to insert the name or surname of a prosecutor at the foot of the indictment, if it appears that the indictment was found true on the evidence of a witness sent to the Grand Jury, either at their own request, or by direction of the Court, and this whether there was a previous presentment or not.

Wortham v. Commonwealth, 669

2. A volunteer informer ought to be made a prosecutor, and liable for costs in case of failure; but, one who is compelled to be an informer, cannot be considered a prosecutor.

REPEAL.

The repeal of a law prescribing a punishment for an offence, without a proviso, that offences committed before the operation of the new law, shall be punished under the old, excuses offenders under the repealed law. This is again decided, after repeated adjudications to the same effect.

Commonwealth v. Leftwich, 657

*RETRAXIT.

See Dismissal, No. 1.

ROADS.

On an application to turn a road, where the witnesses on each side are nearly equal in number and credibility, the concurrent judgments of the County and Superior Courts ought to be approved by the Court of Appeals.

Atkinson v. Ball, 446

SHOOTING.

See the next head.

SLAVE.

A negro slave is a person on whom a free person may commit the offence of malicious or unlawful shooting, stabbing, &c. under the act against those offences, passed 9th of February, 1819.

Commonwealth v. Carver, 660

SUPERSEDEAS.

The penalty of a Supersedeas bond is to be fixed by the Judge granting it, and is not governed by the law respecting appeals by plaintiffs or demandants.

Smock v. Dade, 639

TIME.

See Executor, No. 3.

TRUSTEE.

1. Where one is appointed by will, trustee of the real estate, and executor of the personal, and dies, the children of the testator may file a bill against the representative of the executor and trustee, for an account of the proceeds of the real estate, without having an administrator de bonis non appointed of the estate of their testator.

Graff, &c. v. Castleman, &c., 195

2. A trustee cannot aliene the trust fund in payment of his own debts. Ibid.

USURY.

1. The law of usury applies to the banks, subject to the modifications produced by their charters.

Stribbling v. Bank of the Valley, 132

2. Where the facts are agreed or found by the jury, it is the province of the Court to say, whether they amount to usury or not. Ibid.

3. When a proposition is made for a loan of money, and the lender will only consent to lend a part of the money wanted, on condition that the borrower shall receive Bank stock, at a price much above the market value, to make up the deficiency, and the bargain is made on these terms, such contract is usurious. Ibid.

4. A note is made, and endorsed for the accommodation of the payee, and afterwards put into the hands of a broker by the payee, to be sold in the market. It is purchased of the broker by a third person, who has no knowledge that it is accommodation paper, or for whose benefit it is sold. This transaction is not usurious.

Whitworth, &c. v. Adams, 333

5. An intermediate endorsement of a valid note, subsequent to that of the payee, for an usurious consideration, as between the endorser and endorsee, will not vitiate the note in the hands of a subsequent bona fide holder, without notice of such usury. Ibid.

6. A note, valid in its inception, is afterwards endorsed by a party to whom it has regularly come, to a third person, at a greater discount than legal interest; such transaction is usurious. Ibid.

CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Brown v. Street.

August, 1827.

Judgment—Equitable Relief to—When Granted.*— Equity will not interpose to arrest a Judgment at Law, where the point has been fully decided in the Court of Law, unless there has been some surprise, defect of evidence, fraud, or some call for discovery.

This was an Appeal from the Lynchburg Chancery Court. The following opinions give a full view of the subject.

Leigh, for the Appellant.

Johnson, for the Appellee.

August 21. JUDGE CARR.

This seems to me a very plain case. On the 21st of December, 1809, Brown, by written agreement under seal, sold to Street, a tract of land, containing 57

2 acres, more or less, in the County of Franklin, bounded by the lands of Hancock, Rives, and Brooks, with a grist mill thereunto belonging; for which Street was to pay a negro man called Juba, and $200, to be paid on the 1st of January, 1810; Brown being bound to make and maintain a right in fee simple to the land. The negro was delivered immediately; and on the day after the contract, (22d of December, 1809,) Street executed a penal bill for the $200, thus: 'I confess myself justly indebted to T. Brown, in the sum of $200, to be paid to the said Brown, &c. on the 1st of January next. Yet the condition of the above is such, that the said Brown is bound to make a right in fee simple, to a certain tract of land in the County of Franklin, bounded by the lands of Hancock, Rives, and Brooks; and should the said Brown make and maintain the said right, the said Street is bound in the penal sum of $400; otherwise, the above obligation to be held void,' &c.

On this penal bill, Brown, in 1812, brought an action of covenant, setting out the bill with its condition, and averring that he had conveyed in fee simple, the said land to the said Defendant, according to the form, tenor and effect, of the said covenant, and charging a breach in the non-payment of the money.

The Defendant pleaded, that the Plaintiff ought not to have and maintain his action, because, by the covenant, he was bound to make him a title to the land before the payment of the $200; and he avers, that the Plaintiff has not made him a title in fee simple to the said tract of land, and this, &c.

The Plaintiff replies, that he ought not to be precluded, &c. because he saith, that he hath made a right and title in fee simple to the Defendant, to the tract of land in the covenant aforesaid, in the declaration mentioned, and this he prays may be enquired of, &c.

This is the sole issue joined in the cause. The Jury find a general verdict for the Plaintiff for $231; thereby falsifying the plea, and affirming that the Plaintiff
3 had made a title to the Defendant, to the tract of land which, by the covenant, he had bound himself to convey. Without having this fact expressly proved to them, the Jury could not have found for the Plaintiff; for, the covenant shewed, that this conveyance was a condition precedent to the payment of the $200, and the pleadings rested the whole case upon that point, the Plaintiff taking the affirmative, that he had made the fee simple title. This judgment stands unimpeached. No exception, no motion for a new trial, no appeal. But a Bill of Injunction is filed to stay the judgment, and in effect to re-try the issue in Equity; and this, without stating any surprise in the trial at Law, any defect of evidence, any fraud, or making any appeal to the conscience of the Defendant for a discovery.

This brief statement is sufficient to shew, that Equity has nothing to do with the case. I shall not, therefore, trouble myself with the evidence taken on the Injunction, further than to say, that I think my brother Green's view of it is a very correct one.

The Decree of the Chancellor must be reversed, and that of the County Court affirmed.

JUDGE GREEN.

Street, on the 21st December, 1809, purchased a mill and tract of land adjoining, as containing 57 acres; for which he was to pay a negro man who was immediately delivered to Brown, at the price of $500, and $200 on the first of January, 1810. Articles of agreement, to this effect, were executed by the parties on the day the contract was made. The land was described as bounded by the lands of Hancock, Rives, and Brooks; and Brown covenanted to make and maintain a right in fee simple to the land, which was described as containing 57 acres, more or less. Street, on the 22d of December, 1809, gave to Brown an obligation to pay the $200 on the 1st of January, then next, provided Brown should make 4 and maintain to Street a right in fee simple to a certain tract of land, bounded by the lands of Hancock, Rives, and Brooks, (without naming any quantity,) to which Brown was already bound to make and maintain a title in fee simple.

*See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 426.

In April, 1812, Brown instituted an action of covenant on this obligation against Street, and averred that he had conveyed the land according to the agreement; and issue was taken upon this single point, and found for the Plaintiff; who thereupon had judgment for the $200 and interest.

The Defendant, Street, thereupon filed his bill to injoin the judgment at law, stating, that upon a survey, the land represented in the contract as 57 acres, turned out to be only 40 or 41 acres; and that he claimed a proportionable abatement, which the said Brown refused to allow, pretending that he had conveyed to Street the full quantity which he had agreed to sell; and the Complainant, whilst he admits the fact, that such a conveyance had been made, alleges that it embraces 20 acres or more, which did not belong to the tract he purchased, but were a part of the lands of William Brooks, which he never meant or wished to purchase, and which is of inferior value.

The Defendant, by his answer, stated that he had sold 60 acres of land, instead of 57, as mentioned in the contract: that the boundaries were known and agreed upon by the parties; and that it was agreed, that if the agreed boundaries did not contain 60 acres, the deficiency was to be made up out of the adjoining land, which he had purchased from William Brooks; and refers to the deed to him recorded, which included all the land conveyed to the Plaintiff, and that he had conveyed the 60 acres to the Plaintiff.

It is hardly possible, from the pleadings and proofs in the cause, to ascertain clearly the circumstances of the transactions involved in this suit. It seems, however, that Benjamin Brooks, the father of William Brooks, held one acre of land, on which there was a mill; and that the legal title remained in Hancock, who held

5 all the adjoining *land. B. Brooks afterwards purchased of Hancock the land adjoining the mill, by metes and bounds, supposed to contain 57 acres. B. Brooks had the land surveyed, and represented to Hancock that it contained only 31 acres; whereupon, Hancock sold or laid off to him by metes and bounds, 26 acres of the adjoining land. The first sale now turns out by survey, to be 40 or 41 acres. All these lands, including the acre upon which the mill stood, were afterwards conveyed by Hancock to William Brooks, at the request of B. Brooks; so that Brooks held in the whole, in reality, 67 acres, in the mill tract. Afterwards, W. Brooks sold the mill with 60 acres of land to Brown (called 57 in the contract between Brown and Street;) but before any conveyance was made, Brown sold to Street. The witness, who wrote the agreement, says he understood the sale to be of the 60 acres purchased by Brown, of Brooks; and that it was supposed to be 60 acres that were sold by Hancock to B. Brooks; although, in the writing, he put it at 57 acres. The Plaintiff contends that he only purchased the 40 acres, which was the first purchase by Brooks from Hancock; that he was not bound to take any beyond the lines of that purchase, out of Brooks' second purchase from Hancock, that being Brooks' land, which he did not wish or intend to purchase.

The Defendant contends, that his purchase from Brooks was of sixty acres, out of all he got from Hancock, (which Brooks admits:) that his sale to Street was of the land he had purchased of Brooks; and that the second purchase of Brooks from Hancock, was no more Brooks' land when he sold to Street, than the mill and the first purchase, the legal title to the whole still being in Brooks; and that Brooks has conveyed to him, and he to Street, according to their respective contracts.

The Defendant's representation seems to be true. The call to be bounded in part by Brooks' land, refers to the seven acres reserved by Brooks out of the 67 acres he held; which is all, so far as appears, that he held in that neighbourhood.

6 *It is proved, that Street, after the contract, said that he was to take the difference between the quantity in the first purchase from Hancock, and the 60 acres out of the adjoining land, the second purchase from Hancock. This is proved by Brooks, Hancock, and the two Kemps. The real dispute was with Brooks, as to what particular part of his second purchase should be laid off for Brown and Street, claiming under him.

Whatever might be the merits of this dispute, it seems to have been settled by the giving of a deed, according to Brooks' survey, by Brown, and its acceptance by Street. That deed is in the record. There is no witness to it, and it is recorded upon the acknowledgment of Brown; and I think the probability is, that it was made and recorded, without the consent of Street. However this may be, it can have no influence in the actual state of the pleadings and proofs. Street does not allege, or pretend to prove, this fact; and the issue tried in the suit at Law, which was found against Street, directly involved this question. If this deed had not been proved to have been accepted by Street, the Jury could not have found that Brown had performed the condition precedent, by conveying according to his contract. It is true, if the contract was only to convey the first purchase from Hancock, by Brooks, this conveyance would have been, if accepted, a performance of the contract, although it conveyed other lands also. But, in that case, it could not be right to allow Street a credit for the deficiency, whilst he held the title to the excess conveyed to him, as is the effect of the Decree. But, in truth, the land conveyed, was according to the contract, so far as it includes a part of the two purchases from Hancock. The only description of the land, in the contract, is, 57 acres, more or less, adjoining Hancock's, Brooks', and Rives' lands. It does not refer to any particular boundaries, nor to any general description, as a particular purchase made by Brown, of any other: or by Brooks, of any other. To identify the land sold, it was indispensably necessary

7 *to resort to parol evidence. It was a case of latent ambiguity.

As to the question, how the additional land was to be laid off, if Street intended to contest that, he should have refused to accept the conveyance; and his acceptance of the deed, precludes any enquiry into that subject; no fraud or mistake being alleged. The acknowledgment of a deficiency of 17 acres, has no effect. It was only an acknowledgment that 17 acres were conveyed, over and above the quantity of the original purchase by Brooks from Hancock.

The land, (I mean the whole tract conveyed to Street,) was intrinsically of little value. One of the witnesses values it at $1 per acre; another, at $2; and the additional land is valued by a witness, at 70 cents. The difference between laying off the 17 or 20 acres, in the way Brooks insisted on, and in the way Street claimed, could not amount, in value, to more than $5 or $10. The real value of the purchase consisted in the mill.

Upon the whole, I think the Decree of the Chancery Court should be reversed, and that of the County Court affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL concurred, and a Decree entered accordingly.*

8 *Cooke v. Thornton.

August, 1827.

Trespass Quare Clausum Fregit—What Necessary to Sustain.—To maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, there must have been actual possession in the Plaintiff, when the trespass was committed.

Same—When It Will Lie.—And therefore, such an action will not lie for any damages resulting from the ouster of the Plaintiff, after the trespass was committed, unless the Plaintiff has regained the possession.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Spottsylvania County, where Thornton brought an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against Cooke. The subject is sufficiently explained in the following opinions.

Johnson, for the Appellant.

Leigh and Stanard, for the Appellee.

August 21. JUDGE CARR.

Cooke leased to Thornton a tenement in

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL absent.

+Trespass Quare Clausum Fregit—What Necessary to Sustain.—In Blackford v. Rogers, 2 Va. Dec. 294. it is said: "In Cooke v. Thornton, 6 Rand. (Va.) 8. It was held that the action of trespass quare clausum fregit could not be maintained unless the plaintiff was shown to be in the actual possession when the alleged trespass was committed; but in Van Brunt v. Schenck, 11 Johns. 385. SPENCER, J. says that in this country the principle, as to real property, has been carried further than in England; and we allow the owner to maintain trespass without actual entry, on the principle that possession follows ownership, unless there be an adverse possession. I am not aware of any case which overrules Cooke v. Thornton, supra, nor, indeed, of any case in this court which throws any doubt upon it; but it having been suggested that a different practice has grown up, more in conformity with the law as stated in the quotation from Van Brunt v. Schenck, supra, than with it, we have thought it prudent to refrain from any expression of opinion upon what may prove an interesting and important question, until the decision of it is called for upon the record. In the case before us it is wholly unnecessary to pass upon it, as the evidence tends to show possession in the defendant in error at the time of the alleged trespass, and negatives the claim of possession, actual or constructive, in the plaintiff in error." In this case (Blackford v. Rogers) it was held that, in trespass quare clausum fregit, where Fredericksburg for seven years. He afterwards dispossessed him of the tenement, before the expiration of the term; there being about three years of the lease to run when this suit was brought. This is an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, brought by the tenant for this wrong. The declaration shews that there had been no re-entry; but, that the possession gained by the ouster, continued in the landlord.

Several points were made in the Court below, but one only was relied on in the argument here, or seems worthy of notice. It is that going out of the first Bill of Exceptions. The Counsel for the Defendant moved the Court to instruct the Jury, "that admitting the dispossession to be wrongful, they ought not to take into consideration, in their estimate of damages, the injury resulting from the Plaintiff's being kept out of possession, from the date of the writ to the expiration," (of the term) "but only from the time of the dispossession, until the suit was brought;" which instruction the Court refused to give.

9 *In this refusal, I think there was clear error. To maintain this action, there must have been an actual possession when the trespass complained of was committed. Before entry and actual possession, a person having the freehold in Law, cannot have trespass. Thus, it will not lie before entry for a conusee of a fine, or a purchaser by lease and release, or an heir or devisee against an abator. A disseisee may have it against the disseisor for the disseisin itself, because he was then in possession; but not for an injury after the disseisin, until he hath gained possession by re-entry; and then he may support this action for the intermediate damage; for, after the entry, the law, by a kind of jus post liminii, (as Blackstone expresses it,) supposes the freehold to have all along continued in him. I might quote many passages from the Books, in support of this.

the boundary between the plaintiff's and the defendant's lands was in dispute, and the evidence failed to show that the plaintiff ever had actual or constructive possession of the disputed strip, but tended to show possession thereof in the defendant prior to and at the time of the trespass. Judgment for the defendant was proper. In Wilson v. Phoenix Powder Mfg. Co., 40 W. Va. 419, 21 S. E. Rep. 1087, it is said: "One in actual possession may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit. Formerly, to maintain that action, actual possession was necessary. Bart. Law Prac. 182; Kretzer v. Wysong, 5 Gratt. 9; Cooke v. Thornton, 6 Rand. (Va.) 8. and Truss v. Old, 6 Rand. 556. Therefore, a tenant being in possession, the landlord could not sue in trespass for lasting injury to the freehold, but must bring trespass on the case. 1 Tucker, 191. But now a constructive possession is sufficient to maintain trespass. Snyder v. Myers, 3 W. Va. 195; Storrs v. Feick, 24 W. Va. 606." When a disseisor takes possession and excludes the disseisee entirely therefrom, the former can alone recover for a direct injury to the land; but the disseisee may before his re-entry maintain trespass against the disseisor for disseizin itself. Storrs v. Feick, 24 W. Va. 608, citing the principal case as authority. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Bailey v. Butcher, 6 Gratt. 146. See the principal case also cited in Bailey v. Butcher, 6 Gratt. 145; McDoddrell v. Pardee and Curtin Lumber Co., 40 W. Va. 567, 21 S. E. Rep. 879. On the subject of trespass quare clausum fregit, see generally, on this subject, monographic note on "Trespass" appended to Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Munf. 251.

The principal case is also cited in Rand v. Com., 9 Gratt. 751; Crelgh v. Boggs, 19 W. Va. 252.

have an action of trespass against the disseisor, and recover his damages for the first entry, without any regress; but after regress, he may have an action of trespass with a continuando, and recover, as well for all the mesne occupation, as for the first entry."

Monockton v. Pashley, &c. 2 Ld. Raym. 977. Per Lord Holt. "As to the case of an entry with ouster, it may be set forth specially in the count, or not, with a continuando, or diversis diebus et visibus, between such a day and such a day; but, then you must prove, that the Plaintiff re-entered before the action brought, or else you cannot assign the mesne trespass; for, by the ouster, the Defendant has got possession, and he cannot be a trespasser to the Plaintiff: but when the Plaintiff re-enters, the possession is in him ab initio, and he shall have the mesne profits."

I have seen the rule no where more clearly laid down, than in the case of Case v. Shepherd, 2 Johns. Cas. 27. Per Curiam. "In this case, the trespass is laid with a continuando, but the distinction, as to the amount of damages, is this. After an ouster, you can only recover for the simple trespass, or first entry; for, where there is an ouster, every subsequent act is a continuance of the trespass. Yet, in order to entitle the Plaintiff to recover for the subsequent acts, there must be a re-entry. But, after a re-entry, he may lay his action with a continuando, and recover mesue profits, as well as damages for the ouster."

In the case before us, there was an ouster, and no re-entry. The Plaintiff, therefore, could recover for the simple trespass, or first entry only. He could not lay his action with a continuando. The Defendant, therefore, might have asked for much broader instructions than he did. He only asked that the Jury might be instructed not to give damages from the time of dispossession till the expiration of the lease, but to the date of the Writ; and by refusing this instruction, the Court virtually told the Jury, that they might give damages for the whole term unexpired at the date of the ouster. This was unquestionably wrong.

I think the Judgment should be reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial; upon which, such instructions as result from the principles now laid down, should be given, if asked for.

JUDGE GREEN.

This is an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. There are five counts, all of which, except the second, lay the trespass with a continuando until the suing out of the Writ; and some of them, even until the filing of the Declaration; and in all, the continuando is laid with the allegation that the Defendant had kept the Plaintiff out of possession, during the whole time mentioned in the continuando.

To this Declaration, there was a general demurrer, and a plea of not guilty; on which issues were joined. No Judgment was pronounced on the demurrer, unless the final Judgment for the Plaintiff may be considered, as I think it may, as involving a Judgment upon the demurrer.

11 *The Jury found a general verdict for the Plaintiff. The Defendant took two exceptions to opinions of the Court, given on the trial; the first of which only is insisted on.

The proper course of practice, in the case of a demurrer and issue in fact, is, to try the demurrer first, as has been repeatedly said in this Court. For, if the demurrer to the whole Declaration was sustained, there would be no necessity for trying the issue in fact, and the expense of the trial would be saved; for, in that case, after a verdict for the Plaintiff, the Defendant would still be entitled to a Judgment upon the demurrer. If the demurrer ought to be overruled, there would be no error which would justify a reversal of the Judgment, although the demurrer were decided after the finding of the issue.

In this case, the second count, which does not lay the trespass with a continuando, is unquestionably good. All the rest are, I think, bad. In deciding upon a general demurrer to such a Declaration, I should have thought that the Judgment should be, to sustain the demurrer as to the bad counts, and that the Plaintiff take nothing by them; and to overrule it as to the good count, so as to put the bad counts finally out of the cause in respect to them; as in 1 Saund. 286, n. q., it is said, that in such case, the Plaintiff shall have Judgment for so much as is good, and of course, not upon the whole Declaration. It was, however held, in The Duke of Bedford v. Alcocke, 1 Wils. 248, that the demurrer in such case should be overruled in toto; by which the Defendant could suffer no injury; for, if the Plaintiff took a verdict on the whole Declaration, and any count was bad, he could not have any Judgment, but might avoid that consequence by taking a verdict on the good counts only. This rule of the Common Law, as to the effect of a verdict upon the whole Declaration, in which there is a bad count, is reversed by our Statute, which enacts that, "when there are several counts, one of which is faulty, and entire damages are given, the verdict shall be good; but the De-

12 fendant may apply to the Court to instruct the Jury, to disregard the faulty count." Under this Statute, if there was a general verdict after a demurrer to the whole Declaration, some of the counts being bad, and some good, the Judgment could not be arrested, and the Plaintiff might in fact recover upon proof only of the bad counts, unless the Defendant had some means of avoiding this consequence upon the trial. This Court, in Roe v. Crutchfield, 1 Hen. & Munf. 361, adopted the rule laid down in The Duke of Bedford v. Alcocke, and declared, that the Defendant might still avail himself of the objection to the bad counts, by moving the Court to instruct the Jury to disregard them, or by demurring to the evidence, or objecting to the evidence applicable only to the bad counts, and taking an exception, if it be admitted, so as to show that the evidence was only applicable to the bad counts. Such a motion to exclude the evidence, would be in effect a motion to declare the counts to be bad, and to be disregarded by the Jury; for, in any other view, to exclude evidence proper to support the matter put in issue by the pleadings, would be utterly inadmissible. Without some effectual means allowed to the Defendant, to avoid the effect at the trial of allowing the Plaintiff to proceed upon his defective counts, by overruling the demurrer in toto, such a demurrer ought to be sustained as to the defective counts.

The Defendant, in this case, moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that although it appeared, that the Defendant had leased the premises to the Plaintiff for seven years, of which three years were unexpired when the suit was brought, and that the Defendant dispossessed the Plaintiff; yet, they should not take into consideration, in their estimate of damages, the injury resulting from the Plaintiff's being kept out of possession, from the date of the Writ to the expiration of the term; but only from the time of the dispossession, until the suit was brought. The Court refused, being of opinion, that as the Jury had a right to give vindictive damages, they might take 13 into consideration the whole loss *resulting to the Plaintiff from the tortious entry. The Defendant might, with propriety, have asked the Court to instruct the Jury, to disregard all the counts but the second, and that under it, no evidence could be given of the continued dispossession of the plaintiff, or any other injury done by the retaining of the possession, after the first entry and taking of the goods; and for this first entry and taking only; could damages be given.

It is well settled, that in an action quare clausum fregit, whether by a freeholder or tenant for years, the trespass cannot be laid with a continuando, unless the Plaintiff has remained in possession, or regained it. If he has never been deprived of the possession, the continuando is to be laid diversis diebus et vicibus. If he has been dispossessed, and has regained the possession, he may lay the continuando without describing the trespass as done diversis diebus et vicibus. To this general rule there is an exception, in cases in which the estate of the Plaintiff has determined by lapse of time, or act of God, before the action brought; and this from necessity.

The reason of this general rule, is, that trespass can only be upon land in the possession of another. As soon as a party is put out of possession, the continued possession of the trespasser is no trespass upon him. But, when he regains the possession, he is, by relation, considered as having had a continued possession, and may then, in an action of trespass, recover the meane profits, and damages for the whole time he was dispossessed. See 20 Vin. Abr. "Trespass;" Letter K. passim; Trials Per Pas, 232; Co. Litt. 257, b. The case cited in 7 Vin. Abr. 267, H. 3, pl. 13 that in trespass by tenant by Statute Staple, the Plaintiff had a verdict, and Judgment for damages, before and after the Writ, up to the finding of the verdict, is contrary to the whole course of decision in England.

If the tenant by Statute Staple was considered as having any estate in the land, he could not be a tenant for years; for, the period for which he was entitled 14 to hold was uncertain, *being accountable for casual profits, which might shorten the time for which he was entitled, or circumstances might enlarge the time. 19 Vin. Abr. 572; A. a. passim; Ibid. 574, D. a; and the Statute declares, that "the merchant shall have such seisin in the lands and teuements delivered unto him or his assignee, that he may maintain a Writ of Novel Disseisin if he be put out, and re-disseisin also as of freehold, to hold to him and his assigns, until the debt be paid." It probably was held, that a tenant by Statute Staple and not a freehold, but a quasi freehold; and if not a freehold, then he had no estate. For, in Dighton v. Grenville, 2 Vent. 228, there is an elaborate argument to prove, that he has an estate, without determining what estate. The case of trespass by such a tenant, cited in Viner, probably formed an exception to the general rule, on account of the peculiar character of his interest.

In effect, the instruction of the Court authorised the Jury, not only to give damages for the detention of the possession up to the suing out of the Writ, (which the Defendant seems to have been willing to submit to,) but also for the detention up to the trial; and for this cause, the Judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had therein.

JUDGE CABELL.

This is an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The Declaration contain five counts; all of which, except the second, lay the trespass with a continuando, stating, that the Defendant kept and withheld the possession, from the time of the original trespass, up to the time of suing out the Writ; and in one of them, up to the time of filing the Declaration.

The Defendant filed a general demurrer to the Declaration, and also the plea of not guilty; on both of which, issues were joined. On the trial of the issue on 15 the plea *of not guilty, the Jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff for $950; but, as the damages laid in the Declaration were only $500, the Plaintiff released $450 of the damages found by the Jury; whereupon, the Court gave Judgment for the $500.

The record does not shew, that the Court pronounced any Judgment on the demurrer; unless we are to consider the Judgment for the Plaintiff, on the verdict, as involving, or as tantamount to, a Judgment overruling the demurrer. I am of opinion that we ought so to consider it; for, unless the Court had thought the demurrer ought to have been overruled, no Judgment should have been pronounced for the Plaintiff, on the verdict.

Considering the Judgment on the verdict, as a judgment overruling the demurrer, the first question which arises is, whether that Judgment be correct.

Where there is a general demurrer to the Declaration, and also an issue of fact, the regular course is to decide the demurrer first; because, if the demurrer to the whole

Declaration be sustained, there would be no utility in trying the issue. For, whatever might be the verdict of the Jury, the Defendant would be entitled to a Judgment in his favor. Green v. Dulaney, 2 Munf. 518. But, although this be the regular course, yet if the Court proceed differently, and try the issue of fact first, and then overrule the demurrer, that will not be sufficient cause to reverse the Judgment; provided the demurrer was such, that it ought to have been overruled, or ought not to have been sustained.

Where a Declaration contains many counts, some of which are good and some are bad, and there is a general demurrer, the regular course, I conceive, is, to overrule the demurrer as to the good counts, and to sustain it as to those that are bad; thus putting the bad counts out of the case, and preventing any farther question as to them, in the future progress of the cause. 1 Saund. 286, note q; 5 Bac. Abr. "Pleas and Pleadings," B. 1, in a note. But, although this be the regular course, yet a general *overruling of the demurrer, will not be a sufficient cause for reversing the Judgment, provided any of the counts be good. Duke of Bedford v. Alcocke, 1 Wils. 248; Roe v. Crutchfield, 1 Hen. & Munf. 361. If the demurrer had been thus overruled before the trial of the issue of fact, still it would have been competent to the Defendant, to avail himself of the objection to the bad counts, either by moving the Court to instruct the Jury to disregard them, or by demurring to the evidence, or by objecting to such evidence as was applicable only to the bad counts. Roe v. Crutchfield, 1 Hen. & Munf. 361.

It was a rule at the Common Law, that if the Plaintiff took a verdict on the whole Declaration, and any one count was bad, he could have no Judgment whatever. But, this rule has been done away by our Statute of Jeofails, which declares, that "when there are several counts, one of which is faulty, and entire damages are given, the verdict shall be good; but the Defendant may apply to the Court to instruct the Jury to disregard the faulty counts." 1 Rev. Code, 512, sec. 104.

The second count in this Declaration was unquestionably good; and therefore, so far as relates to the demurrer, the Judgment is unassailable.

But, on the trial of the cause, the Defendant tendered a Bill of Exceptions to the opinion of the Court, which states, that "it appeared that the Defendant had leased to the Plaintiff a tenement in Fredericksburg, for a term of seven years, about three years of which were unexpired when the suit was brought, of which the Defendant dispossessed the Plaintiff before the expiration of the lease; on which, the Defendant's Counsel moved the Court to instruct the jury, that admitting this dispossession to be wrongful, they ought not to take into consideration, in their estimate of damages, the injury resulting from the Plaintiff's being kept out of possession from the date of the Writ to the expiration, but only from the time of the dispossession until the suit was brought. The 17 Court, however, being of opinion that the Jury in this case, having a right to give vindictive damages, might take into consideration the whole loss sustained by the tortious entry; and therefore overruled the motion; to which opinion the Defendant's Counsel excepted."

The Law has wisely provided remedies suited to every possible case that can be supposed to exist. But, if a party injured resorts to a remedy not provided for, nor suited to his case, it is he and not the Law that is to blame, if he fails to obtain that redress which his case requires.

If, in the case before us, the Plaintiff had brought his Writ of Ejection Firmæ, or an action of trespass in ejectment, as originally practised, he might have recovered back his term, or the remainder of it together with damages for the trespass, and for the meane profits, during the time the term was withheld from him; or, if no portion of the term was in arrear, at the time the Judgment was pronounced, then he would have Judgment for the damages only. 3 Black. Com. 199, 200, 201.

But, he has brought an action of trespass quare clausum fregit; and that, without any previous entry on the disseisor, so as to regain the possession. Now, the gist of the action of trespass is the injury to the possession; and trespass cannot be supported, unless, at the time the injury was committed, the plaintiff was in actual possession. 2 Roll. Abr. 553; Com. Dig. "Trespass," B. 3; Bac. Abr. "Trespass," C. 3; 5 East. 485, 487; 3 Black. Com. 210. Thus, before entry or actual possession, a person cannot maintain trespass, though he hath the freehold in Law; as a person before induction, or a conusee of a fine, or a purchaser by lease and release, (though the Statute executes the use,) or an heir or devisee against an abator; or a lessee for years before entry. Chitt. Pl. 175-6-7, and Cases there cited. A disseisee may, before his re-entry, maintain trespass against the disseisor for the disseisin itself, because he was then in possession. 3 *Black. Com. 210; but until he has gained possession by re-entry, he shall not have trespass against the disseisor, either for an injury done after the disseisin, or for the continuance of the possession after the disseisin; "because the franktenement is in the disseisor at all times after the disseisin;" and the Law is the same, whether the disseisee, at the time of the disseisin, held a freehold or a chattel interest. 2 Roll. Abr. 550, 553; Com. Dig. "Trespass," B. 3; 20 Vin. Abr. "Trespass," K. 447. If, however, the estate of the disseisee is determined by its own limitation, or by the act of God, so that the disseisee cannot enter, then he may maintain trespass, from necessity, without re-entry. But, if the disseisee regain the possession, he may then have trespass (laying it with a continuando) for any intermediate damage, and for the meane profits for the whole time the possession was withheld; for, after his re-entry, the Law, by a kind of jus postliminii, supposes the possession to have, all along, continued in him. 3 Black. Com. 210; Co. Litt. 257; a; 2 Lord Raym. 977.

The Defendant in this case, therefore, as there had been no re-entry by the Plaintiff, had a right to require of the Court the exclusion of all evidence of the continued dispossession of the Plaintiff, or of any other injury done by the retaining of the possession by the Defendant, after the first entry. He had a right to require an instruction to the Jury, that in estimating the damages, they should confine themselves to the original trespass and ouster.

The effect of the instruction actually given, was, to authorise the Jury to give damages for the continued dispossession, not only to the time of bringing the suit, but to the expiration of the lease; or at least; to the time of the trial, if the lease had not then expired.

For this error, the Judgment should be reversed, and the cause be remanded for a new trial; in which, no instruction is to be given, that shall authorise the Jury to give damages for any thing after the original trespass and ouster.

Martin v. Anderson.

August, 1827.

Pleading and Practice—Statute of Limitations—Where Plea Received.—A plea of the Act of Limitations ought not to be received after issue joined on another plea, unless some good reason be assigned why the plea of the Act of Limitations was not sooner tendered.

This was an action on the case brought in the Superior Court of Caroline County, by Anderson against Martin. The Defendant put in the plea of non assumpsit, on which issue was joined. At a subsequent term, the Defendant moved the Court for leave to file a plea of the Act of Limitations, which the Court refused; whereupon, the Defendant excepted. In the Bill of Exceptions, no reason is assigned why the plea was not sooner tendered. A verdict was rendered for the Plaintiff, and Judgment accordingly. The Defendant appealed.

August 21. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.†

This case differs from Tomlin's adm'r v. How's adm'r, Gilm. 1, in this, that no good reason appears upon the record, why the additional plea of the Act of Limitations was not sooner tendered.

The Judgment should be affirmed.

§Pleading—Plea with Verification—Replication.—There cannot be an issue, where there is a plea of new matter, concluding with a verification, with-

This was an action of covenant brought in the Superior Court of Bath County, by Carlisle against Lockridge. The covenant was in these words: "Received of John Carlisle notes on men in Virginia, for collection, to the amount of nine hundred and ninety-six pounds, which I will be bound to him for the amount. Given under my hand and seal, this 27th of September, 1817." The breach stated in the Declaration was, that the Defendant "had altogether failed to comply with his said covenant on his part, and hath broken the same in the following particulars: 1. By failing to collect the said notes, and to pay the amount collected to the Plaintiff. 2. By failing to pay to the Plaintiff the sum of 996l.

The Defendant demurred to the Plaintiff's Declaration, and assigned the following causes: 1. The first breach laid is inconsistent in charging the Defendant with not collecting the notes, and with not paying the amount collected. 2. The amount collected, and the amount not collected, are not particularly set forth. 3. For not averring that any part had been collected. 4. For not averring that a reasonable time had elapsed since the Defendant's undertaking, and that he had failed to use due diligence in the collection. To the second breach the Defendant demurred, because it presented no cause of action, the Defendant not being bound, at all events, immediately to pay the sum of 996l. as the said breach supposed.

The Defendant also pleaded three several pleas, all concluding with a verification. The third was rejected by the Court, and issue was joined on the remaining pleas.

The covenant was, not to pay at all events, but that he would use reasonable diligence in collecting the debts, and would pay the amount collected, upon request. The demurrer, therefore, should have been sustained, and Judgment given for the Defendant.

Moreover, there was no issue joined on the second plea, there being no replication. There cannot be a joinder of issue, without a replication, where the plea concludes with a verification.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of the County of Buckingham. For a full view of the case, and the points made in the argument, it is only necessary to refer to the following opinions.

Attorney General, for the Appellant.
Daniel, for the Appellee.

August 22. JUDGE CARR.

In the Superior Court of Buckingham, the Mutual Assurance Society, by their Principal Agent, made a motion against Stratton, assignee and actual owner of buildings insured by Silas Flournoy, for quotas due from 1809 to 1822, inclusive, and a quota of deficiency, under the Acts of 1822. On the trial of the motion, it was agreed by the parties, that the General Laws, as well as the Particular Laws, Rules and Regulations of the Society, should be considered by the Court as part of the evidence in the case, and in case of appeal, should be taken as part of the case, and *that the Court might decide on all questions, whether submitted in the form of plea or otherwise; and this agreement to be considered as an appendage and part of the motion, as well for the Court, as for the Clerk. The Court gave Judgment for the Plaintiff, for the various quotas claimed, with interest, &c. and costs, damages and expenses, according to Law, and the Rules and Regulations of the said Society. From this Judgment, the appeal is taken; and many objections to it have been raised, and well argued.

We feel no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Court. The interest is unquestionably a part of the matter in controversy.

The first point for the Appellant is the Statute of Limitations. If it applied to the case, it would certainly take in most of the quotas claimed. But in my judgment, it does not apply. The Declaration for Insurance is a sealed instrument; and this is the foundation on which the quotas rest. By the original Act of Incorporation, the Society were to assess, from time to time, such quotas as the state of the funds might require. But by the Act of 1809, it was declared, that no quotas should thereafter be assessed on the members, but that the General Meeting, or Standing Committee, should be authorised to require the members to pay annually such part of the premium, as they may deem proper, not exceeding, for the town subscribers, one fifth of the premium, nor for the country subscribers, one seventh. In execution of this Law, the Rules and Regulations of the Society (which are its Laws, and binding on all its members) have fixed the rate of the town subscribers at one fifth, and of the country subscribers, at one seventh, of the premium. The quota thus founded on the Declaration, and fixed by the Laws, is not a subject for the application of the Statute of Limitations.

The next objection is, that one who takes the property by assignment from the original subscriber, is not liable by motion. To ascertain this, we must look at the nature of *the institution and the Laws creating and regulating it. The fundamental principle of the Society is mutual assurance and mutual risque. Every member is the insurer of every other, and has every other bound to insure him. To raise a fund for the losses which should occur, each member is bound upon declaring, to pay such premium as should be fixed, upon the property insured. As it was foreseen, that future requisitions would be necessary, it was enacted, that each member should be bound to pay such quotas as might afterwards be called for by the proper authority. It was foreseen also, that the property insured would be constantly passing from hand to hand, by sale, mortgage, &c. To meet this state of things, the Law enacts, that in every sale, mortgage or other transfer of property insured, the purchaser or mortgagee shall be considered as a subscriber in the room of the original: thus making him, to all intents and purposes, a member of the Corporation, entitled to all the advantages, and subject to all the burthens, of every other member.

The power of the Legislature to do this, has not been denied; and it will be seen at a glance, that without such a provision, the Society could never have gotten on. The original Act, which contained this provision, did not subject the members to a recovery by motion; but it was soon found, that this summary remedy was necessary; and an Act passed, stating, that whereas the Mutual Assurance Society was bound to make immediate reparation to those who might meet with loss by fire, and it was therefore just and expedient, that the said Society should be enabled to recover immediately of the delinquent subscribers or members, the premiums and quotas which might be due from them; therefore it was enacted, that the said Mutual Assurance Society should have full power to recover the whole or any part of such premiums or quotas, as were or might become due from any delinquent subscriber or member, &c. on motion and ten days notice; saving to any person, against whom such motion might be made, the right of a trial by Jury,

The principal case is cited with approval in Arnold v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 145, 18 S. E. Rep. 477.

The principal case is cited in Campbell v. Shields, 6 Leigh 523.

if he should desire it. The next section gives to any person, whose property has been, or may be, insured, the same remedy against the Society. Now, upon what principle of construction can it be contended, that the assignee of property insured, is not equally liable to this motion, with the original subscriber? The former Act made him a member. It is agreed on all hands, that before the remedy by motion was given, he stood on the same ground with the other members: that the property in his hands was liable: that he might have been sued and made personally liable. Then comes the last Act, and subjects every delinquent subscriber or member, to a recovery by motion. It cannot be denied, that the words of the Act embrace him. Does not the spirit also? He has the same advantages, the same rights, with any other member. His property is insured. If destroyed by fire, he could recover of the Society by motion. Ought he not to be subject to the same remedy? Would it not violate the fundamental principle of association, (the mutual and equal risk and liability of every member,) that a portion of them should be liable to this summary remedy, and others exempt from it? That his case was tried by the Court, he cannot object; for, the trial by Jury was expressly reserved to him, if he had desired it. The case of Greenhow v. Barton, 1 Munf. 590, was mentioned; but that was a case of a divided Court. Neither was it like this; for there, the property was never insured, as no premium had been paid; and it will be seen, that Judge Roane places his objection to the liability by motion, principally on that ground. Upon the best consideration I have been able to give the subject, I am satisfied that the Defendant here was liable to the motion.

It was next objected, that there was no re-valuation. This, however, did not seem to be relied on; and properly, for it cannot affect the motion, either on the reason of the case, or on the express Regulations 26 of the Society, p. 22 *sec. 13, to which the Defendant, with the other members, was a party.

It was objected also, that it does not appear that the Defendant was assignee of the property insured. This was an afterthought. The Defendant received a notice, that the motion would be made against him as assignee, and actual owner, of buildings insured by Flournoy. He appeared to that notice and defended himself on various grounds; but never objected, that he was not assignee. So far from it, indeed, that his whole defence was predicated upon the admission of the fact that he was assignee. After this, it is too late, in the Appellate Court, to object that there was no proof of that fact. But, in truth, it is proved, as appears by the complete record brought up by order of this Court.

Another objection is, that no sale has taken place under the Act of 1822, and until that, there could be no motion against the country subscribers. This objection, so far as it applies to quotas due before the Act of 1822, is founded on a clear misapprehension of that Law. Its object was to abolish the Country Branch of the Society. But justice required, that such abolition should not leave the Society chargeable with any of the debts of that Branch, without adequate funds to meet them. The Act therefore directs, that the Principal Agent shall assess a repartition on all the members of the Country Branch, agreeably to the provisions of the Acts concerning the M. A. Society, sufficient to pay all lawful demands against the Principal Agent as such, or against the Society: But such repartition shall not be made or exacted, until it shall be found that after selling all property, and estimating all dues up to this time, which belong to the said Country Branch, there is a deficiency in the funds to meet their engagements and pay their debts; nor then, but by the direction, and under the control, of the Standing Committee. If there were nothing more in the Law, this clause shows clearly, that it did not intend to suspend, or to touch, the 27 right of the Society to "coerce the payment of quotas already due.

For, it considers these as forming a part of the actual funds of the Country Branch directing the Agent to sell the property, and estimate all dues up to this time, belonging to the said Branch: and it is only when the fund thus made up shall be found deficient, that a repartition is to be made. A contrary construction would impute to the Legislature the singular and gross injustice of holding out a premium to delinquency, by placing the subscribers who had failed to pay up their quotas, on a better footing than those who had paid. But, the next section of the Law says, in express words, "that the members of the Country Branch, after complying with the requisitions heretofore and herein imposed, shall be released from all further responsibility," &c. It is most clear, then, that it is to the repartition or quota of deficiency only, that the Act of 1822 applies, leaving former requisitions untouched, or rather directing a compliance with them, before the members can be released. By a copy from the records of the M. A. Society, duly certified, it will be seen, that the Defendant Stratton, as assignee of Flournoy, owes for quotas growing due from 1809, to 1822, inclusive, $73 60 cents, and for the quota of deficiency $6 60 cents only. This last sum is all that can be affected by the question, whether the sale and settlement, directed by the Act of 1822, took place before the repartition was assessed. We find, in the record, a copy duly certified from the records of the M. A. Society, held August 13, 1822. "The Principal Agent laid before the Committee an estimate of the funds and debts due from the Country Branch; upon examination whereof and due consideration of the subject, the Standing Committee are of opinion, that in order to carry into effect the provisions of the second section of the Act passed on the 4th of March 1822, entitled "An Act to abolish the Country Branch of the M. A. Society," it will be necessary to assess on all the members of the Country Branch, a quota of 20 cents on every dollar of the 28 *amount of premium assessed on the property of the said members."

Then follows a resolution requiring the said quota to be paid. At a subsequent date, the Standing Committee adopt a Preamble and Resolutions, stating, that as doubts had been entertained whether, previous to the order requiring the quota of deficiency, all the property of the said Society had been sold, and the proceeds estimated in the funds of the Society: "Resolved, that it be certified to those whom it may concern, that all property belonging to the said Country Branch, had been sold previous to the said 13th of August, 1822, and that the proceeds of the sale of the same, together with all dues, up to that time, were estimated in the funds of the said Country Branch, to meet their engagements, and pay their debts." It seems to me, that under the Laws regulating this Society, their own Rules and Regulations, and the Declarations signed and sealed by each member, these extracts from their records sufficiently show, that the sale and settlement, directed by the Act of 1822, had been made before the repartition; and that the Defendant Stratton is bound for this quota of deficiency, as well as the other quotas. See Korn v. M. A. Society, 6 Cranch's Rep. 192, and Currie's adm'r v. M. A. Society, 4 Hen. & Munf. 315, for the general principles applicable to this Corporation.

Another exception taken, is, to that Law of the Society, which enacts, that the members who, by failing to pay, shall render it necessary to coerce the payment of premium or quota by recourse to legal proceedings, shall, to indemnify the Society for expenses necessarily incurred in the employment of collectors, pay $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the premium or quota, and interest due. This was said to be usury. But, it does not seem to me to have a single feature of usury about it. The debtor may always relieve himself by paying up what is due, before the Society have been obliged by his delinquency to incur the expense and trouble of a legal proceeding. Neither is this a penalty, against 29 which *even Equity would relieve.

It is stipulated damages. The members of the Society, who made this Law, (and the Defendant among them,) knowing, that in every case where money was to be collected, persons must be employed and paid, and thinking it just that this payment should come, rather from the delinquent, than from the general fund, have agreed in General Meeting, that whenever any one of them should be in default, and collections had to be coerced, he should pay up this $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to meet the expense. It is their own estimate of the damages, and is surely binding on themselves. This must have been the opinion of this Court in Greenhow v. Buck, 5 Munf. 263; for there, after reversing the Judgment of the Court below, they enter Judgment for the sum claimed, with interest, together with $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. damages on the principal and interest, and the costs.

With respect to this $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. another objection, (not taken in the Court below, nor in the argument here,) has occurred to a brother Judge. It is, that these damages being imposed by a Law of the Corporation, cannot be recovered by motion. The Act of Assembly gives the remedy by motion, to recover the premiums, quotas, &c. due from subscribers. This $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is a mere accessory, an appendage to that, to reimburse to the Corporation the expenses incurred in making the motion, and collecting the money from the delinquent subscriber. It is a part of the costs of the proceeding, which the subscribers have agreed among themselves that each shall pay, whenever his delinquency makes it necessary for the Society to resort to a motion. The expenses which this $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was intended to meet, growing out of the motion, the members must of necessity have meant, that it should be recovered at the same time, and by the same motion, with the premium or quota. They never could have intended, that the motion should be made, and the premium or quota, with its interest recovered; and then, that a distinct action should be brought,

and a new set of costs incurred, to recover this $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. which, in nineteen cases out of twenty, would not exceed \$10; and the costs of which recovery, would generally equal, if not overgo, the sum demanded. To say, then, that this $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. shall not be recovered in the motion, would be to defeat the Law of the Corporation and the justice of the case. These were, probably, some of the considerations, which induced this Court, in the case of Greenhow v. Buck, (before referred to,) to give Judgment for the $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the motion. The reasons of the Court are not given in that case; but, when they (after reversing the Judgment of the Court below,) enter Judgment for the quotas claimed, with interest, "together with $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. damages on said principal and interest," we cannot but conclude, that the power of the Court to award these damages on motion, was considered, and decided on by them. This, then, is clear authority; and concurring with the justice of the case, I cheerfully follow it.

The last objection to be considered, and, in my opinion, the most serious, is, that the Judgment of the Court below is void for uncertainty. The Judgment is, that the Plaintiff recover against the Defendant, the several sums claimed as quotas, with interest till payment, with costs, damages and expenses, according to Law and the Rules and Regulations of the Society; thus leaving it to the Clerk to ascertain those damages. I have examined all the Books within my reach, to find some certain authority on this point, but have failed. The general rule seems to be, that the Judgment, being the voice of the Law pronounced by the Court on the matter in controversy, should be so certain as to leave nothing doubtful or unsettled. The Judgment with us is never given for a sum certain, as costs; but for costs according to Law. This is considered as sufficiently certain, because the Law is certain and fixed; and yet the Clerk may, in his taxation, mistake the Law. By analogy to this practice, it did seem to me, that the Judgment here might be sustained. The Law of the Society giving the $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

damages, is just as certain as the 31 *General Law of costs; and that Law, by the express agreement of the parties, is made a part of the record. The agreement says, "it shall be an appendage and part of the case, as well for the Court as for the Clerk." There seems to me no more uncertainty here, than in all other Judgments as to costs. Nor can I conceive, why the agreement should have named the Clerk, but with a view to enable him to fix the damages by this document, this Law. This was my own idea; but, as my brethren differ with me, and think that it might be a dangerous precedent, to relax, even thus far, the strictness which, it seems to them, has hitherto prevailed in Judgments, I acquiesce in their opinions, that the Judgment, for this error, must be reversed, so far as relates to the damages; and this Court, proceeding to give such Judgment as the Court below ought to have given, &c.; the Appellee, as the party substantially succeeding, to have costs.

JUDGE GREEN.

The agreement in this case does not amount to an exception to the Judgment of the Court, upon the whole of the proofs submitted upon the motion. It states certain specific grounds of defence, and agrees to so much of the evidence as relates to those particular objections. This precludes any objection to the want of evidence, as to any other matter, which was necessary to justify the Judgment; all of which must be presumed to have been given, unless the contrary appeared by an exception. This repels the objection taken at the bar, that it does not appear upon the proofs in record, that Stratton was the assignee of the original owner, who insured the property. The Judgment is founded on the supposition of that fact; and no exception being taken on that ground, it must be supposed to have been duly proved.

I concur in the views already taken of the other points made in the argument of the cause; but, I think the Judgment is erroneous for its uncertainty. It 32 directs, that the *Plaintiff recover damages and expenses, according to Law, and the Rules and Regulations of the Society, without specifying the amount or nature of the damages and expenses. The Judgment, with us, is always for costs generally, without specifying the amount, contrary to the practice in England. Bernard v. Scott, 3 Rand. 526; Tidd's Practice, 389. There is no uncertainty or inconvenience in this, as the fee books and process, which ascertain the amount of the costs, are records of the Court. So, the damages awarded on appeals, are ascertained by the General Laws; and Judgment is given for them generally. But there is no criterion, by which to ascertain the expenses and damages, allowed by the Rules and Regulations of a private Corporation, without resorting to extraneous proofs.

If the 7½ per cent. imposed as a penalty on the members of the Society, for the purpose of compensating the Society for the damages and expenses incurred in prosecuting a suit for the recovery of what may be due from a member, had been estimated, and the amount specified in the Judgment,

I should have thought the Judgment erroneous in that particular; this penalty, being imposed, not by Act of Assembly, but by a Bye-Law of the Corporation, which can only be recovered by action. The summary remedy, given by the Act of Assembly, can only be resorted to, to the extent thereby allowed for the recovery of the premiums and quotas and interest thereon. In the case of Greenhow v. Buck, 5 Munf. 263, the Court gave Judgment for the 7½ per cent.; but this question was not stirred, and probably passed without observation; and I cannot, therefore, consider it as an authority upon that point.

The Judgment should be reversed, and entered verbatim as it is, leaving out the words, "damages and expenses according to Law, and the Rules and Regulations of the Society."

JUDGE CABELL concurred with JUDGE CARR, as to the merits of the case, but was of opinion that the Judgment should be reversed for uncertainty as to the damages.

*Smith v. Jones.

October, 1827.

Court of Probate—Function as to Facts.—A Court of Probate occupies the place of a Jury as to facts, and ought to find all proper inferences from facts proved.

Same—Admission of Will to Record—Time to Procure Evidence.—Where the Court refuses to admit a Will to record, on the ground of a defect of testimony, and it appears before them, that the desired evidence may probably be procured, if time is allowed they ought to allow such further time, even although they may have pronounced Judgment, and while the Judgment is still in their power.

Same—Will of Realty—Evidence.—What evidence is sufficient to sustain a Will of Real Estate.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Henrico County, where a Writing, purporting to be the Will of Jesse Smith, deceased, was offered for probate by Lucy Smith, the widow of the deceased. The paper was deemed by the Court insufficient as a Will of real estate, but ordered to be recorded as a Will of personal estate. Both parties appealed from this decision; the widow, because the Will was rejected as to the real estate; and Samuel Jones, because the Will was ordered to be recorded as to the personal estate.

The circumstances are sufficiently detailed in the following opinion.

Scott, for the Appellee Jones.

October 17. JUDGE CARR delivered the opinion of the Court.†

This is a contest about the due execution of a Will before the Court of Probate. The Court below decided, that the writing was not executed as a Will of real estate,

Court of Probate—Function as to Facts.—A court of probate occupies the place of a jury as to questions of fact, and its province is, like that of a jury to draw all just inferences from the evidence. *Nock v. according to the Act of Assembly, and therefore, refused to record the same, as such; but ordered, that the said writing *be recorded as a Will of personal property. From this Judgment, both parties appealed.

Our Statute directs, that "such last Will be signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence, and by his direction; and moreover, if not wholly written by himself, be attested by two or more witnesses in his presence." To the Will before us, as first published, there are two subscribing witnesses, Lawrence Pendergast and Elizabeth Jones. Mrs. Jones proves, that the testator asked his wife to get the paper: that she read it to him: that this was before signing: that the testator said it was his Will, but he could not write at that time; that Pendergast put the name and mark of the testator to the Will, and then put his own name, and took hold of the witness's hand made her mark, (she being illiterate.) The Will, as exhibited, shows the name and mark of the testator signed to it, and the name of Pendergast, with the name and mark of Elizabeth Jones, as subscribing witnesses.

Pendergast is not produced. If he had been examined, and his evidence had agreed with that of Mrs. Jones, we should have had no doubt, that a Court of Probate ought to have admitted the paper to record as a Will of lands; for, the record showing the fact that the testator could not write, being paralytic, and that he was in possession of his understanding, we think the evidence of these subscribing witnesses would have proved circumstances, from which a Court of Probate ought to have concluded, that the Will was signed by Pendergast for the testator, "in his presence and by his direction, and moreover, was attested by two witnesses in his presence." We do not mean to say, that the facts deposed to by Mrs. Jones, would, if found in a special verdict, authorise a Court acting upon it, to say that the testator's name was signed by his direction. The Court in that case could infer nothing. The actual fact must be found; and that was the case in Burwell v. Corbin, 1 Rand. 131. The Court there was acting on a special verdict. But, we consider 35 that a Court of Probate occupies "the place of a Jury as to facts, and that a Jury ought, from such evidence, to have found the Will duly executed.

In the case of Bond and Wife v. Seawell, 3 Burr. 1773, it was agreed, that the facts should be put into the form of a special verdict, for the Judgment of the Court. It appeared, that the testator made his Will, consisting of two sheets of paper, and signed his name at the bottom of each page. He also made a Codicil upon a single sheet. All was in his own hand-writing, (which, by the way, has not the effect in England that it has with us.) He called in one Harding, showed him both sheets, and his signature to every page, and told him that was his Will. He also showed him the Codicil, and desired him to attest both; which he did, and then left the room. Vaughan and Leyland came in immediately after. The testator showed them the Codicil and the last sheet of the Will, and sealed both, before them. He took each of them up, and delivered them as his Act and Deed. These witnesses attested the same in the testator's presence; but never saw the first sheet of the Will, nor was that sheet produced to them; nor was the same or any other paper, on the table. Both the sheets of the Will was found with the Codicil, in the testator's bureau, after his death, all wrapped up in one piece of paper; but, the two sheets of the Will were not pinned together. On this case, there were three arguments; one, before all the Judges. Lord Mansfield delivered the result. He said, that "the case, as it now stands, turns only upon the solemnity of the execution; and that it had occurred to the Judges, that the way in which the parties had put the case, does not go to the whole merits; because, if the first sheet was in the room, at the time when the latter sheet was executed and attested, there would remain no doubt of its being a good Will, and a good attestation of the whole Will. But, if the first sheet were not then in the room, a doubt might arise, whether it was or was not a good attestation as to the real estate;

36 "a doubt about which the Judges have neither given, nor formed, any opinion. We are of opinion, that the due execution of this Will cannot be come at, in the method wherein the matter is now put.

"If this be considered as a special verdict, we think it is detectively found as to the point of the legal execution of the Will. Every presumption ought to be made by a Jury in favor of such a Will, when there is no doubt of the testator's intention. It is not necessary, that the witnesses should attest in the presence of each other; or that the testator should declare the instrument he executed, to be his Will; or that the witnesses should attest every page, folio, or sheet; or that they should know the contents; or that each folio, page or sheet should be particularly shown to them. This has been settled. But the fact, whether the first sheet of his Will was in the room or not, at the time of executing and attesting the latter, may be material to be known. If it was, the Jury ought to find for the Will generally; and they ought to find all things favorable to the Will. If it be doubtful, whether the first sheet was then in the room or not, we all think the circumstances sufficient to presume that it was in the room; and that the Jury ought to be so directed. But," (he adds,) "upon a special verdict nothing can be presumed. We are, therefore, all of opinion, that it ought to be tried over again," &c. This is high authority, and lays down very clearly the distinction between the powers of Jury, trying evidence, and of a Court acting on a special verdict. It shows, too, in a strong point of view, how careful the Court is in such cases, where a Will, the last and most solemn act of a man's life, is involved, to put the case in such a shape, as to enable them to come at the whole merits. The cases of Hands v. James, Com. Rep. 531, and Croft v. Pawlet, 2 Stra. 1109, show the power and province of Juries, in cases of this kind. We repeat, that we think the Court of Probate has the same power. All this is said upon the hypothesis that Pendergast had proved the same facts with Mrs. Jones; but he was not examined.

37 We think that if it had been proved to the Court, that he was dead, or that he was beyond the process of the Court and the power of the party, that the Court might have resorted to secondary evidence, and that the proof of Pendergast's hand writing, together with the evidence of Mrs. Jones, would, in that case, have authorized the Court to admit the Will to record as a Will of lands. It was proved that Pendergast was an itinerant unsettled man: that he lived in Henrico, when the Will was executed, and removed afterwards to Augusta, and after the Court had pronounced its opinion but during the same term, the party seeking probate of the Will, offered proof to the Court, that a Subpoena had been sent to Augusta, for Pendergast, and also the Affidavit of a Mr. Todd, that he had been to Campbell, where Pendergast lived in 1821, and was told there, that Pendergast had removed to Alabama. Now, though this evidence was not such, as to authorise the Court to act upon the case at once, as if Pendergast was beyond the power of the party; yet we think it was such as laid a very strong ground for the belief that the fact would turn out to be so: and that the Court ought, under such circumstances, to have recalled its decision, the cause being perfectly within its power, and to have continued the cause, to give the party an opportunity to prove that Pendergast had actually removed from the State.

If it be objected, that such a course would be dangerous, as giving the party an opportunity to accommodate his evidence to the opinion pronounced, we answer, that a Judge must in such cases be allowed considerable latitude of discretion: but that still he must exercise it soundly, and we must judge of this soundness. We do not think this one of the cases, in which there was danger, of subornation from a continuance.

If it be further objected, that there was no motion made for a continuance, but only that the Court would add to the record the evidence then offered, we answer, that 38 the "first motion was to receive the evidence. If it had been received, we do not know what motion might then have been made. But the Court refusing to receive the evidence at all, because it had rendered Judgment, the party was stopped at the threshold, and could only except to the opinion, and thus get the evidence upon the record. We think the Court ought to have received the evidence, though it had rendered Judgment; and though the form of the motion might not have been exactly right, that the Court, seeing the probable ground laid for resorting to the secondary evidence, ought to have taken the step proper for obtaining proof; and this opinion is much strengthened by the case from Burrow, where we see the pains the Court took (though the parties had made a mistake) to put the case in such a shape, as to enable them to come at the whole merits of the question.

The Judgment must be reversed, and the cause sent back, with directions to the Court to allow the party a reasonable time to obtain evidence of the absence from the State of Pendergast, if he be absent, and if not, to obtain his evidence.

October, 1837.

Demurrer to Evidence*—Judgment on—What Considered.—A demurrer to the Declaration is filed, and also a demurrer to the evidence and the Court decide against the demurrer to the Declaration; whereupon the Jury find a verdict for the Plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on the demurrer to evidence. The Court render final Judgment for the Plaintiff. This shall be considered as a Judgment on the demurrer to evidence, in favor of the Plaintiff.

Sealed Instrument—When Joint and Several.—A sealed instrument in the singular number, but signed and sealed by two persons, is joint and several.

Gilliam, assignee, &c. brought an action of debt in the County Court of Cumberland, against Holman and Wilson, on a bill penal. The bill begins, "I promise to pay," &c. and concludes, "I bind myself, my heirs," &c.; without mentioning any name in the body of it. It is signed and sealed by both the Defendants.

The Defendants demurred to the Declaration, and filed a plea, on which issue was joined. At the trial, the Defendants filed a demurrer to the evidence; and the Jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on the demurrer to evidence. The Court gave Judgment that the demurrer to the Declaration was insufficient, &c. and "therefore it is considered by the Court, that the Plaintiff recover against the said Defendants," &c.

From this Judgment, the Defendants appealed to the Superior Court of Cumberland, where the Judgment of the County Court was affirmed; and the Defendants appealed to this Court.

Leigh, for the Appellants, contended, 1. That the County Court have never disposed of the demurrer to evidence. They simply decide against the demurrer to the Declaration, and conclude, "and therefore," &c. 2. The bond purports to be given by one person only, and is signed by two.

S. Taylor, for the Appellee, said that the bond was, in effect, joint and several. As to its being in the singular 40 *number, the cases of Marsh v. Ward, Peake's N. P. Rep. 130; Clarke v. Blackstock, Bayley on Bills, 37, are conclusive authorities. But, if it be a joint and not a joint and several obligation, it is not bad on a general demurrer. As to the other objection, the Court will intend that both demurrers were overruled.

October 26. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.*

Both the demurrers were argued before the County Court. That Court expressly pronounced Judgment on the demurrer to the Declaration; and the rendition of final Judgment in favor of the Plaintiff in the action, upon the verdict of the Jury, necessarily involved a Judgment upon the demurrer to the evidence, to which the verdict had been made subject.

The only question in the cause, is, as to the character of the bill penal, on which the suit was brought. No person is bound in it by name. The bill, in its terms, is in the singular number throughout; "I bind myself, &c.," as if executed by one person only. But, it is signed and sealed by both of the Defendants. The question is, whether it be joint and several.

A promissory note, executed in the self same terms, and signed by two persons, would unquestionably be considered the joint and several note of both and of each of them. Bayley on Bills, 37. New edition. The case of Marsh v. Ward, Peake's Rep. 130; Clarke v. Blackstock, Holt's Rep. 474, and 3 Common Law Rep. 159.

A particular form of expression which will make an unsealed contract joint and several, will not cease to make it so, merely because seals are added to it. The effect of the seals is not to change the meaning of the parties, but merely to add to the solemnity and dignity of the Instrument. The Judgment is affirmed.

41 Lyons, &c. v. Turner and Wife.

November, 1827.

Willst—Construction—Period of Distribution.—Testator devised "all the rest and residue of the money arising from the sales of my estate, and debts due to me, to all my dear grand children who shall attain their ages of twenty-one years, to be invested in Bank Stock by my trustees, for the use of my grand children, or such of them as are now born, or may be born before distribution, and who shall attain that age, &c. The period of distribution above mentioned, means the time when the first legatee shall come of age and have a right to demand his aliquot part: to the exclusion of all others, who should be born after that period.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court.

The controversy arose on a clause in the Will of Peter Lyons, deceased, in these words: "I give all the rest and residue of the money arising from the sales of my estate, and debts due to me, to all my dear grand children who shall attain their ages of twenty-one years, to be invested in Bank Stock by my trustees, for the use of my grand children, or such of them as are now born, or may be born before distribution, and who shall attain that age, and to be paid their respective shares and parts thereof, as they shall attain that age, and not sooner," &c. The testator appointed four persons trustees for the execution of his Will, of whom only two, to wit: John and James Lyons, acted in the character aforesaid. At the time of his death, the testator left seven grand children, (the issue of his several children,) among whom the female Appellee was one, and had attained her age of twenty-one at the time this suit was brought. All the other grand children were then under twenty-one.

Under the above clause of the Will, the Appellees claimed the proportion of the estate to which Lucy L. Turner, the female Appellee, was entitled; and the trustees, doubting whether they ought, under a just construction of the Will, to pay the share of Lucy L. Turner, before the final distribution of the estate among the grand children, refused to pay it, without having the sanction of the Court of 42 Chancery. *Upon this refusal, the Appellees filed their present bill.

The Chancellor decreed, that Turner and Wife were entitled to their participation in the residuary fund, on Lucy L. Turner, the female Plaintiff, attaining the age of twenty-one years, she being the first who attained that age. The Defendants appealed.

Stanard and Nicholas, for the Appellants. Attorney General and Leigh, for the Appellees.

For the Appellants, it was said, that all grand children born before the final distribution, are entitled to shares of the estate, under the testator's Will. The authorities were divided into three classes.

1. Where there is a devise to a certain class of persons, as to the children of A, no child is included but those born at the death of the testator. Viner v. Francis, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 658; Singleton v. Gilbert, 1 Cox. 68; Davidson v. Dallas, 14 Ves. 576; Hill v. Chapman, 1 Ves. 405.

2. The second class is, where there is a life-estate given to one, and after his decease, to the children or grand children of A., all children born before the death of tenant for life, are entitled, although they may be born after the death of the testator. This class is illustrated by the cases of Baldwin v. Carver, Cowp. 209; Aynton v. Aynton, 1 Cox, 327; Attorney General v. Crispin, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 537; Middleton v. Messenger, 5 Ves. 136; 15 Ves. 152.

3. The third class is, where there is a bequest to children generally, payable at a certain period, or on a certain event, all take who come in case before the period appointed occurs, or event happens, Ellison v. Airey, 1 Ves. senr. 111; Congreve v. Congreve, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 530; Gilmore v. Severn, Ibid. 582; Andrews v. Partington, 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 401; Pulsford v. Hunter, Ibid.

43 416; Prescott v. Long*, 2 Ves. junr. 690; Hughes v. Hughes, 14 Ves. 256; Hoste v. Pratt, 3 Ves. 730; Whitebread v. Lord Saint, 10 Ves. 152; Gilbert v. Boorman, 11 Ves. 238.

For the Appellees, it was contended, that in all cases where a gross fund is to be distributed among a class of persons, all persons born after the period appointed,

*Absent, JUDGES GREEN, and COALTER.

†See monographic note on "Wills" appended to Hughes v. Hughes, 2 Munf. 309.

are excluded. All the cases cited by the Appellant's Counsel support this doctrine; and in the case of Singleton v. Gilbert, 1 Cox, 68, where there was a postponement of the time of taking, the Court adhered to the old rule. The only question is, what is the period appointed? Or, in other words, does the word "distribution" mean final distribution, or when the first legatee arrives at twenty-one? The language of the Will, and all the circumstances of the case, indicate the latter construction. Heth v. Heth, 2 Atk. 122, note; Walker v. Shore, 15 Ves. 123; Campbell v. Prescott, 15 Ves. 500; Barrington v. Tristram, 6 Ves. 245; Godfrey v. Davis, Ibid. 43; Hoath v. Hoath, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 3; Paul v. Compton, 8 Ves. 380; Booth v. Booth, 4 Ves. 399; Walcott v. Hall, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 305.

November 9. JUDGE COALTER delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.*

Without a particular examination of the authorities, none of which perhaps are entirely opposite to this case, I will submit my ideas as to the intention of the testator as disclosed by the Will itself.

He intended a present benefit, at the discretion of his Executors, to all his grand children who were or should be born before distribution, by an application of the interest of the fund to their support and education; and he intended a future interest in each one of them, who should 44 "attain twenty-one years of age; not merely to vest at that time, to be enjoyed at some remote and uncertain period, but to be then received and enjoyed. Had the bequest been simply to his grand children, who should attain twenty-one years of age, to be paid their respective shares as they shall attain that age, then I incline to think, that the grand children in being at the time of his death would alone form the class who were to take. If, at that time, they were all of age, although evidently from the terms of the Will no distribution could have been instantly made, yet the right to have the whole distributed, so soon as that could be done, would then have attached to each one, who would have had a vested right in his aliquot part, transmissible; which rights could not be affected by the birth of grand children afterwards. If, at that time, one was of age and the rest not, a right transmissible would have vested in that one, not only to an aliquot share, counting the others then in being, and he would have had a right transmissible, to such augmentation of the share as might thereafter accrue, on the death of any of the others before twenty-one. If, before a reasonable time to ask distribution, or pending a suit therefore, one or more of the class should die under twenty-one, this augmentation of what would otherwise have been the share, would also be demandable. If, however, one aliquot part had been paid or decreed, counting all, none having died, and then another came of age, one or more of the original class having died since such payment or decree, then this second one, coming of age, would be entitled to an augmented share; and the first one who came of age, or his representative, would also receive the augmentation so accruing, so as to make him equal with the second, an equality amongst the objects of his bounty being intended; and so on, from time to time, would the fund be distributed, as and when the individuals of the class severally attained their age of twenty-one.

45 "The testator, however, intended to include certain grand children, though not in being at the time of his death, and to exclude others, who might come into being after a certain event, to wit: after distribution. He knew the fact, that none were then of age, and that they might not be, at the time of his death; and therefore, that some time would probably elapse, before any distribution, either partial or final, would take place, or be called for. He therefore extends his bounty, as well to such of them as are now born, as to such as may be born before distribution, who shall attain the age of twenty-one years. It is this provision which raises the question before us.

On the part of the Appellant, it is contended, that the words, "or may be born before distribution," mean to extend the bounty to all such as are born at any time before a final distribution can be claimed. I say "can be claimed;" for, I do not understand, that if, after the last one who has come into being has arrived to the age of twenty-one, and being refused his share, has sued for it, another should be born pendente lite or before suit, but after the age of the claimant, that after-born child shall have a claim to share with that claimant, although distribution was not actually made. In such event, I understand it to be conceded, that the right to have the share, there being no other person in being entitled to claim, is a vested right to the whole remaining share, not to be affected by such posterior events. If this is not conceded, I think it must nevertheless be law.

On the part of the Appellees, it is contended, that the meaning of those words is, to exclude all who should be born after the first one came of age, and had, eo instanti, received an aliquot part or distributable share, counting those then in being and under age; or, having a right, was demanding it; the right to distribution, and the actual receipt of it, whether then or afterwards, being, according to the idea expressed, one and the same thing.

46 "According to the pretensions of the Appellant, it is urged, that when one of six in being shall attain twenty-one, that one has a vested right to one-sixth of the fund, which ought to be paid, but with this salvo; that, if final equality was intended, and inasmuch as final distribution cannot be made for a long time, some objects being of tender years, and as, before such distribution, many more may be born, the first, and every other object attaining age, must be held ultimately to a re-partition from time to time, either as the aliquot share shall increase or be diminished by after deaths or births. Thus; when the next one coming of age, claims partition, six more have been born; so that one-twelfth is a share, and the next must refund. When the next comes of age and claims, these six or any others, say to the number of six, are dead, then he is entitled to a sixth part, and the other two shares are augmented. When the next comes in, more are born, and then the shares are diminished, &c. &c. In the mean time, bonds are to be taken from those receiving, to refund, &c. Or, as the one first coming of age has a vested right to a share, computing the objects then in being, the executor is barred to pay him his share, and has no right to demand bond, except to refund in cases of debts, (and which he demanded in this case) and this shall be final as to him, whatever augmentation or diminution of shares may thereafter take place by deaths or birth; and should all die the next day, it would follow, I presume, that he will take no more, but that as to the five remaining shares, there shall be an intestacy.

Is a construction of the testator's Will, involving either of these consequences, a reasonable one?

He gives the fund to all his dear grand children, &c. to be paid their respective shares and parts. What shares and parts? Such as may eventually turn out to be grossly unequal? Or, share and share alike? It seems to me, that there must be other expressions or provisions in the Will, showing that inequality was intended, 47 before we can give a construction producing that effect. None such, however, are perceived; and I also think, when he gives the rest and residue of his estate to his grand-children, who shall attain twenty-one, if any one shall attain that age, there must be very cogent reasons, apparent from other parts and provisions in the Will, which shall induce a construction involving an intestacy as to any part, before we can so decide. But, I see nothing of this kind. Suppose the party, contingently entitled to the last share, according to the construction contended for by the Appellant, dies before twenty-one. Shall there be an immediate intestacy as to that, or shall it remain in abeyance, or until all the children of the testator die, so that it may be certain that no grand child can be born to take it? And on that event what will become of it? Will it be an undisposed of subject, although there are grand children in being, who have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and who were in being at the death of the testator? A construction involving inequality an intestacy both, it seems to me, cannot be put on this Will.

But, can the other mode of distribution claimed by the Appellant, be supported as intended by the testator? This construction will so nearly amount, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, and probably in this very case, to a bequest to all the grand children whenever born, who shall attain twenty-one years of age, as to make the words "before distribution," of little or no avail: insomuch, that if he had suspected such a construction as is contended for, he probably would have gone the full length of providing for all.

The testator made his Will, shortly before his death in April, 1809. It is recorded in September of that year. He had then, say seven grand children, born and alive, all under age. The eldest comes of age, and files her bill in 1812. John Hopkins, the next eldest, comes of age after 1815; for, in that year, he defends by his guardian.

Ann Eliza Lyons, the next, files her 48 petition as an adult, in *1821. All the rest seem yet to be under age; and two grand children, then lately born, are made parties in 1815. The testator might very reasonably have supposed, that before the youngest grand child, in being at his death, would attain, twenty-one years of age, every grand child would be born, which, in the ordinary course of nature, he could calculate on being born; and if he intended by those words, that every distributable share should be liable to be opened, in order to contribute in the way contended for, until the youngest came of age, he would hardly have thought it worth his while to stop it there, but would have provided for all his grand children whenever born; as the difficulty of distribution would have been very little, if any, increased thereby. But, he intended to put some termination or limitation to the coming in, being of the class provided for; and that, I think, ought to be a reasonable and convenient termination, unless there are very clear expressions to the contrary. The time of the first one coming of age, at which time her right to a share accrued, and which ex vi termini, means the time of the distribution of that share, seems to me to be the most reasonable and convenient termination. Making a division and paying one share, is certainly a distribution, in one sense of the word; a partial distribution. When the last share is paid over, then there is a final distribution. Which of these is meant by the words, "bored before distribution?" Did the testator intend, by the words, "to be paid their respective shares and parts, as they shall attain that age," that when one came of age she was to receive a part, which, by after-events, might be greatly diminished, and she obliged to refund accordingly, and to give security to do so? That her interest was vested, subject to be divested? Or, did he intend her to receive a part, which the executor could well ascertain and would be justified in paying, so as to enjoy it from that time, without account, and with the privilege of coming in for a farther share, from time to time, as the claim 49 might *be augmented by death? The absolute payment that seems to me to be directed to be made them, "as they shall attain that age," is inconsistent with that conditional payment insisted upon, as resulting from the other construction. The settled and uniform construction put on Wills, if not precisely like this, yet very nearly so, goes, I think, strongly to fortify me in this construction of the present Will. On the whole, I think the Decree is right.

Decree affirmed.

November 5. JUDGE CARR.†

This is a bill filed by Christian and others, as next of kin and distributees of John Fleet, against Martin Shearman
50 *to set aside a Deed and Will executed by Fleet, conveying and devising all his estate, real and personal, to the said Shearman.

The bill charges, that Fleet was, at the time of executing the Deed and Will, and had long been, utterly incapable of making a contract, or disposing of his property: that the Defendant obtained these instruments by fraud and imposition; and prays that they may be annulled, and that Shearman may be decreed to deliver up the real and personal property of Fleet, to be divided among them according to Law; and that he may account before a Commissioner for the rents and profits of the land, the hires of the slaves, &c.

Shearman answers, averring that Fleet was of perfect capacity and ability to make contracts, and dispose of his property; that he made a contract with the Defendant, by which he agreed to convey to him his whole estate, in consideration of being maintained by the Defendant during his life: that in execution of this contract, the Deed and Will were made: that the contract was perfectly fair, and that the Defendant has fully performed his part by maintaining Fleet during his life.

While the suit was yet at Rules, Shearman died, and it was revived against Ezekiel G. Shearman, administrator with the will annexed, and Ellis, and Jno. Tapscott, devisees of Martin Shearman.

They answer, expressing their assent to a revival, and their wish for a decision. Issues were made up to try the capacity of Fleet, and the fairness of the Deed and Will.

The Jury found that Fleet was not of sufficient capacity to dispose of his property, by Deed or Will, and that both these papers were obtained by fraud. This verdict being returned into the Court of Chancery, without objection that Court pronounced the Deed and Will null and void, and ordered that they be surrendered, to be cancelled.

‡JUDGES GREEN and CABELL, absent.

It was further ordered, that such of the Defendants as had in possession the lands or slaves in the papers mentioned,

51 *should surrender the same to the Plaintiffs, and such Defendants as claim as distributees of Fleet. The Court further ordered, that E. G. Shearman, administrator with the Will annexed of Martin Shearman, do render before a Commissioner an account of the administration of the said Shearman on the estate of Fleet, comprising in such account, to the debit, of the said Martin, the hire of slaves, and all the personal estate (except the slaves which may be surrendered under his decree) that the said Martin derived or claimed title to, under the said Deed or Will: that he also render an account of the rents and profits of all the lands and real estate claimed or held under the said papers, accruing in the life of the said Martin: that he also render an account of his administration on the estate of the said Martin; also an account of the hires and profits of such of the slaves claimed under the said papers, as may have come to his hands; and if any of them have been sold by him, an account of the value and price received therefor, and when and how disposed of.

In pursuance of this order, the Commissioner made a very voluminous report; of which it seems only necessary to notice here, that part which stated the account of Martin Shearman as executor of Fleet, up to the death of the said Martin. The balance against the said executor stated to be $5,714 01 cent, with interest, &c. The Commissioner also stated the account of E. G. Shearman, as administrator of Martin Shearman, making a balance against the said administrator of $12,712 41 cents. The last balance is made by excluding from the credits of the administrator, all sums disbursed by him, in payment of the proper debts of Martin Shearman, and especially the sum of $4,151 27 cents, paid by the said administrator, on an execution issued against him on a stay-bond executed by Martin Shearman. The exclusion is on the ground that the debt due from Martin Shearman to Fleet's estate, being due from him as executor, takes precedence of all his proper debts.

52 *It is proper to mention, that before this report was acted upon, the Plaintiffs filed a supplemental bill, making Armstrong a Defendant, upon the ground that after the Deed and Will of Fleet were set aside, he had been appointed by the County Court of Lancaster, administrator of Fleet, and, as such, ought to be a party to the suit. The administrator answered, consenting to adopt, and be bound by all the proceedings which had been taken in the case; claiming his rights as administrator, and offering to abide the Decree of the Court.

The cause coming on to be heard (as the Decree expresses it) "on the papers formerly read, an exhibit showing that Martin Shearman, the testator of the Defendant Ezekiel G. Shearman, administrator, &c. of Martin Shearman, who qualified as executor of John Fleet, to pay the administrator of the said Fleet, $5,714, &c. A sum is also decreed against Ezekiel G. Shearman individually, for the amount of rents and profits of the land and hires of the slaves received by him after the death of Martin Shearman.

From this Decree, the appeal is taken by Ezekiel G. Shearman alone.

In the record which has come up to this Court, there is no such paper as the exhibit (so particularly noticed by the Chancellor in his Decree,) showing that Martin Shearman duly qualified as executor of Fleet. There can be no rational doubt, that this omission is the error of the Clerk of the Chancery Court; nor can we doubt, that a Certiorari would supply the defect. For, if the identical paper which was before the Chancellor should be lost, it could be easily supplied; as it was but a copy from the records of Lancaster Court. It is equally clear to me, that we ought not to proceed in the cause without a Certiorari, unless upon the ground that the exhibit is unnecessary to a decision, or the admission, (which I understood the Counsel for the Appellants to make) that the exhibit might be considered as before us, if it could be brought up by 53 the Certiorari. *My own opinion is, that we do not need the exhibit to establish the fact, that Martin Shearman qualified as executor of Fleet. It is a settled principle, that nothing need be proved, which is admitted by the parties; and this fact is, I think, clearly so admitted. After annulling the Deed and Will, the Court of Chancery ordered, Martin Shearman's administrator to render an account of the said Martin's administration on the estate of Fleet. If this order was not made, on the admission of the parties that M. Shearman was executor of Fleet, it certainly could not have been acted upon by the Commissioner, without either an admission of that fact, or an exception taken to the report, because M. Shearman was never executor of Fleet. In the Commissioner's report, we see a long account headed thus: "Dr. the estate of John Fleet, dec'd, in account with M. Shearman, his executor." This account is extended from the death of Fleet to the death of M. Shearman; a space of thirteen years. The executor is regularly charged with the property which came to his hands, and credited by his disbursements from year to year, together with his commissions, &c.; the whole showing the usual course of administration of an estate. To all this, there is no exception that M. Shearman was not executor; but on the contrary, an express admission of the fact by E. G. Shearman; 1st, in page 3, of the report, where the Commissioner states, "that M. Shearman is debited, in his executorial account, with the hires of Fleet's slaves, from the consent of the Plaintiffs and the defendant E. G. Shearman, except as to the hires of Daniel, Harry and Lucy," &c. 2d. The fact is admitted by E. G. Shearman in page 81, where he claims (by a special statement made at his request) credits for M. Shearman, as executor of Fleet, to the amount of $633 83 cents. I desire no better evidence than this, to establish the fact (as between these parties) that M. Shearman qualified and acted as executor of Fleet.

54 *Taking this, then, for granted, I shall proceed to consider the objections stated in the argument, to the decree of the Court below.

1. It is objected, that the bill does not charge M. Shearman as executor of Fleet: that he does not answer as executor: that the revival against his administrator gave him no notice, that the claim was made of him as representing an executor, and was therefore, a debt of the first dignity; and that having no such notice, at any preceding stage, the Chancellor ought not to have suffered the exhibit which showed that M. Shearman qualified as executor of Fleet, to have been introduced at the hearing; and erred in founding his decree upon that document.

With respect to the original bill, it must be recollected, that M. Shearman was the man charged with the fraud and imposition in obtaining the Deed and Will, and withholding the property under them. If these charges were true, he was liable, however he held the property. But further, the Will is made a part of the bill. By the Will, M. Shearman is named as executor. The Will, too, as set out, shows that a probate of it had been taken, and this could only be by the executor, or (on his renouncing the executorship) by an administrator with the Will annexed. Martin Shearman, in his answer, claims both under the deed and Will: admits himself in possession of the whole estate, real and personal, (a house excepted;) states no renunciation of the executorship by himself, or qualification by another; and therefore, must be understood to admit himself in possession as executor, especially when the fact was, that he had actually qualified as executor. Holding thus as executor, and being thus liable, the suit was, on his death, revived against his administrator with the Will annexed, in the same plight and condition. He stood bound as representing an executor; and it was his business to take notice of all the debts, which his testator owed in that character, because the Law declares he shall pay them before any proper debt of the person he represents. Besides,

55 the *notice and responsibility, thus thrown on the administrator, E. G. Shearman, by the Law, it is a fact apparent on the record, that the first step taken by the Chancery Court, after the Deed and Will were pronounced void, was, to order E. G. Shearman to render before the Commissioner; an account of the executorship of M. Shearman on the estate of Fleet. This gave him notice in fact, as well as in Law. The same order, also, of the Court of Chancery, directed him to settle before the same Commissioner, an account of his own administration on the estate of Martin Shearman; and in this settlement, the Commissioner refused to credit the administrator, by payments made towards the proper debts of Martin Shearman, because the debts which M. Shearman owed as executor of Fleet, was of higher dignity; and there is no exception to this refusal of the Commissioner, on the ground that the administrator had no notice that he was sued as the representative of Fleet's executor. In the case, particularly, of a debt of nearly five thousand dollars, paid by E. G. Shearman on an execution against him, issued on a staybond, given by M. Shearman to Dall, and for which the Commissioner refused him a credit; so far from objecting that he had no notice by the suit of the Plaintiffs, that he was charged as representing Fleet's executor, he puts his right to that credit expressly on different ground; attempting to prove, that when Dall's execution was levied, the weather and his health were so bad, that he could not possibly go to the Chancellor to injoin and stay the sale; which injunction must have rested on the ground, that the property was bound to pay the debt to Fleet's estate first; because the administrator was bound as representing Fleet's executor.

The administrator, having thus, both in Law and in fact, received notice of the true character in which he was charged in this suit, could not be said to be surprised by the exhibition, at the hearing, of the document proving that M. Shearman had duly qualified as executor of Fleet;

56 *nor did the Chancellor (in my opinion) err in receiving and acting upon that document.

The next objection is, that Martin Shearman held nearly all the personal property, under the fraudulent Deed; and as to this, he cannot be liable as executor of Fleet.

The first answer to this, is, that the fact is not so. There appears to have been no delivery of the property under the Deed; and E. G. Shearman, when directed to settle the executorship of M. Shearman on the estate of Fleet, brings into the account all the slaves and other property contained in the Deed, and states them to be "the slaves belonging to the estate of Fleet," and "sundry property that came to the hands of M. Shearman, executor of Fleet;" thus expressly acknowledging that M. Shearman held them, as executor under the Will. But, if M. Shearman had held under the fraudulent Deed, what would have been the consequence? In Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384, and Beall v. Silver, 2 Rand. 401, it is decided, that if a man made a fraudulent Deed, and die, the fraudulent donee will be liable as executor de son tort; but here, as the fraudulent donee was appointed executor by the Will, and qualified, he was a rightful executor, and would, I apprehend, in that character, be liable for what he held under the fraudulent Deed.

But, it is denied that M. Shearman ever was a rightful executor, and insisted that the distributees could not file a bill against an executor de son tort, but must have an administrator appointed, or the estate committed to the Sheriff. I consider it settled Law, that every executor regularly appointed by a Court having jurisdiction of the matter, is a rightful executor, while his commission lasts; and though a subsequent Will should be afterwards produced, or the Will under which the executor was appointed, proved to be a forgery; yet the acts done by the executor prior to such proof, will be valid, and he will be 57 *chargeable as executor for any assets, which had come to his hands. If authority were necessary in support of a position so plain, I would refer to the case of Allen v. Dundas, 3 Term Rep. 125, where the very point is discussed and decided.

In our case, M. Shearman was regularly commissioned as executor, by Lancaster Court, in which the Will was proved. Until he was displaced, no administrator could be appointed; nor could he be displaced but by a suit impeaching the Will. This suit was, therefore, properly brought by the heirs and distributees. They pray that the Deed and Will may be set aside, the land divided, and the personal estate distributed. It is admitted, that this was right, so far as related to the division of the land; but contended, that as to the distribution of the personalty, the bill was wrong: that it should merely have sought to set aside the Will; and then have left it to the administrator, (who should be appointed,) to have recovered the assets. By a reference to the case of Paul v. Paul, 2 Hen. & Munf. 525, it will be seen, that upon a bill brought to set aside a Will, the County Court, after pronouncing the Will void, go on to direct a distribution. The Decree was reversed by the Court of Chancery; but, this Court reversed this last, and affirmed the Decree of the County Court; thereby sanctioning the order of distribution. In our case, it will be recollected, that after an administrator of Fleet was appointed, (which could only be done upon setting aside the Will,) that administrator was made a party to the suit. Here, then, were convened before the Court, all the parties interested; all praying the Court to proceed, and make an end of the matter; and I cannot conceive a solid objection to their doing so.

Taking the Defendant E. G. Shearman to be properly charged, and legally liable for the acts of M. Shearman as executor of Fleet, there can be no doubt, that under the express words of the Law, the debt incurred by Martin Shearman, as executor, is of the first dignity, and to be

58 *paid by his administrator, before any proper debt of the said Martin. The Commissioner was therefore right, in reporting the full balance of 5,714, with interest, against the administrator; and the Court right in decreeing against him the same sum.

With respect to the sum decreed against E. G. Shearman individually, for the rents of the land and hires of the slaves received by him, after the death of M. Shearman, there was no objection taken at the bar; and properly, because this part of the account seems to have been admitted by E. G. Shearman before the Commissioner.

Upon the whole, I am for affirming the Decree.

JUDGE COALTER.

The only question in this case, arises out of the principle adopted by the Commissioner in his report, whereby the Appellant is charged with the greatest part of the demand of the Appellees, as a debt of the first dignity due from his testator, so as to exclude from his administration account, debts to a large amount, which he had paid, and by which a devastavit is thus established on him by the Commissioner, and the final Decree in the cause.

The original bill was filed in this case, by the Appellees, against Martin Shearman, the Appellant's testator, alleging that they were heirs at law and distributees of John Fleet: that Fleet was a man of unsound mind, incapable of making contracts or a Will; and that shortly before his death, the Defendant had, by fraud, imposition and threats, obtained from him a Deed purporting to convey the whole of his property, for the consideration of $5,000; none of which was paid; and had, about two months before, in order to fortify his title, also procured him to sign a paper purporting to be a Will, when he was utterly incapable of making one, which he had procured to be recorded in Lancaster Court in January, 1801, in consequence of no person appearing to contest it; although, if 59 *The Deed had been valid, there could have been no necessity for recording it, because it would have passed only the same property. This was not contested, they say, because many of the Plaintiffs then were, and some now are, infants, &c. They ask a Decree for their proportion of the lands, slaves, and other personal estate: that the Defendant may render an account of the slaves and hires, and of the rents of the lands, which came to his possession on the death of the said Fleet; and pay the same to them, &c.

The Deed purports to bear date on the 25th of April, 1800, and conveys, for the consideration of $5,000, a tract of land of six hundred acres, ten slaves, by name, also twenty head of cattle, four horses, and a variety of household furniture, hogs, sheep, &c. This Deed was admitted to record in September, 1800, on the acknowledgment of Fleet in Court.

The Will purports to bear date on the 17th of February, 1800, giving all his estate both real and personal, to the said Shearman, and appointing him executor. This was simply proved and admitted to record, on the 19th of January, 1801. No one, at that time, however, appears to have qualified as executor.

The answer denies the fraud, and insists that Fleet was of sound mind when he made both the Deed and Will. It admits that the consideration in the Deed was not the real one, which was, that he was to maintain the grantor, &c. He denies that the Will was made, as was alleged in the bill, to fortify his claim under the Deed; but that, after the Deed was made, it was discovered by Fleet that there was a negro and some outstanding debts, which were not embraced by it; and it being the intention of the parties to the contract that all his property was to be conveyed, the Will was executed to cure this omission. He says, that the recording of the Will was contested by some of the parties, and denies their right to come in to contest a Will three or four years more than seven (the time limited by Law) after it was recorded.

60 *Nothing further was done in the case, until Martin Shearman's death, which happened in 1814, except to take depositions.

In 1815, a bill of revivor was filed by the Appellees, to make the present Appellant, who was administrator with the Will annexed of Martin Shearman, a Defendant; and also to make the devisees of the land in question, Defendants. This bill merely states, that the Plaintiffs had theretofore filed their bill against Martin Shearman, for the purpose of setting aside a Deed and Will for a tract of land lying in Lancaster, made, as was said, by John Fleet, in favor of the said Shearman, on the ground that they had been obtained by fraud, in which certain proceedings had been had, &c.: that he had since died: that the Appellant was his administrator, and the others, devisees of the land. They are made Defendants; and the prayer is, that the suit may be revived and stand in the same plight, &c.

The Defendants answer, the one admitting that he was the administrator, and the others, the devisees; and agree to a revival.

After this, to wit, in May, 1817, an issue was directed to try the question of fraud, &c.; which was found in favor of the Appellees, both as to the Deed and Will. The verdict was rendered on the 12th of April, 1820; and being certified to the Chancery Court, there was a Decree pronounced on the 27th of the same month, setting aside both Deed and Will, and directing various accounts, both as to the real and personal estate, a surrender of slaves, &c.

It may be proper here to remark, that on the death of Martin Shearman, the regular course would have been, to have had someone qualified as administrator of Fleet, so as to represent the personal estate. This was not done, however, and the bill of the revivor above noticed, seems in its terms, to limit the case, as to the Plaintiffs, to the controversy so far as it regarded the real estate: and it seems to me, that legitimately, whatever to the contrary might have been intended, the controversy

61 between the parties then *before the Court, could only extend, so far as ultimate relief could be given, to the real estate. To be let in to the enjoyment of this, the heirs had a right to an enquiry into the alleged fraud, both as to the Deed and Will; for both must be set aside or nothing is gained. When they had succeeded as to both, they could only claim to be let into the enjoyment of the lands, and to have an account of the rents. All beyond this, could alone be claimed by the personal representative of Fleet. But no such representative was then before the Court, and none such existed. The Court, however, in the same Decree which vacated the Deed and Will, directs accounts, and amongst others, an account of the administration of Martin Shearman, on the estate of Fleet, directing the Commissioner to comprise in such account, to the debit of the said Martin, the price of slaves, and all the personal estate (except the slaves that may be surrendered under the Decree,) and that the said Martin claimed title to, by, or under the said papers; thereby, as it seems to me, very properly recognizing only his title as purchaser or legatee, no claim or possession, as executor, having been suggested in any of the pleadings.

Accounts were also directed of the rents and profits of the land, both in the lifetime of the said Martin, and since; reserving liberty to those claiming to be heirs or distributees of Fleet, whether Plaintiffs or Defendants, to interplead, &c. with a view to a division or distribution of the real and personal estate.

The Commissioner reported, and, in taking the accounts of the Appellant's administration, rejected his disbursements in payment of debts, so as to subject him, as aforesaid, for a devastavit. At the same time, and at the instance of the Appellant, he reported an account, according to his pretensions, allowing him those credits; and in this way, the point has been presented to the Court. In order to fortify these his pretensions, I presume, he files

62 several depositions to prove, that when a large execution of one *Dall, which issued on what is commonly called a stay-bond, executed by Martin Shearman, as security for Edmunds the debtor, was levied, late in December, 1818, the weather was very inclement, and he confined to his house by indisposition, so that he could not travel to Richmond or Fredericksburg. Whether any resistance to the execution, which such a journey would have enabled him to make, or what kind of resistance was thought of, does not appear. The object of these depositions seems merely to be, to prove that if he could, in any way, have made resistance, it was then out of his power to seek advice concerning it.

It is pertinent to my view of this case, here to remark, that at the time this Decree was pronounced, there was not only a want of a personal representative of Fleet's estate, but there had been no allegation in the pleadings or proceedings in the cause, that Martin Shearman had ever qualified as executor of Fleet. The original bill seems to negative such idea, by the allegation merely, that the Will had been obtained and recorded, for the purpose of fortifying the claim to the whole property, under the Deed; and is relied on as a circumstance of fraud in regard to that. There is nothing in the bill, charging any thing beyond a tortious intermeddling with the estate, on the pretence of a fraudulent Will. The bill of revivor seems also to negative any pretence to charge his administrator for his acts as executor, by confining the case to the land, as in Law it was then confined.

The Chancellor's Decree for account, it seems to me, therefore can only have gone on the ground, that as Martin Shearman was confessedly in possession of the whole estate, pretending to hold the greater part as purchaser, and the residue as legatee, and as those papers were both declared void, his estate should be answerable for the whole property, under whichever of those papers he claimed title; but, that however fraudulent or improper that possession was, yet a Court of Equity would allow him all just disbursements.

63 *It is true, that in the final Decree

it is stated, that an exhibit was then before the Court, showing that he had qualified as executor; but at what time, does not appear; nor do we know when this exhibit was filed. It is not now in the record. The copy of the Will, with the certificate of the proof of it, shows that he did not qualify as executor when the Will was proved; and it is highly probable, that when the bill was filed, and probably not until long after, it was not known to the Plaintiffs that he ever had qualified, as executor, and that, therefore, he was not charged by them in that character. It is not improbable, however, that when about to take the accounts, search may have been made as to the credits collected by him, and his qualification then discovered, and the document produced to the Commissioner, as has been suggested at the bar; who thereupon took the account in the manner aforesaid. Be this as it may, the report of the Commissioner, and this document, presented the question to the Chancellor on the final hearing, and he supported the Commissioner. I shall therefore consider the case, as if there was a document now in the record, proving that he did qualify as executor.

There is also another circumstance belonging to the statement of the case. The report and account were returned in February 1821; and in May following, the Plaintiffs had leave to file a supplemental bill, for the purpose of making one Armstrong, who was agent for a number of them in prosecuting the suit, a Defendant; alleging, that since the last continuance, he had taken administration on the estate of Fleet. This was done after the accounts were taken, as aforesaid, and preparatory to a final Decree. The bill was in fact filed at the same term the final Decree was pronounced. It alleges that the Plaintiffs are advised, that it is necessary to make him a Defendant, that a Complete Decree may be made, binding the rights of all parties. They agree, that any part of the estate, necessary for his administration, may be decreed to him, subject to their 64 eventual rights as distributees; and if none is necessary, *but if he is willing that an immediate distribution may be made, that the same may be decreed, &c. referring to the preceding proceedings.

To this bill, that Defendant answered instantler. He admits the statements it contains, and adopts all the proceedings in the suit, agreeing to be bound thereby, and agrees that distribution may be made.

In this way, and at this time, the personal representative of Fleet is finally brought into this cause. Up to this time, then, there is not only an absence of any charge in the bills of proceedings, setting out a claim against the Defendant, as representing an executor, but there was no party to the suit that could regularly make any such claim, which could at all affect the question under consideration. For, although Martin Shearman's estate would be answerable for the rents of the land, and to which alone the Plaintiffs were then entitled, it is admitted on all hands, and so decreed, that the occupation of the land was not as executor, and consequently, that rents and profits would not be considered a debt of the first dignity, under the Act, but only payable when assets.

Although Martin Shearman, then, may have committed a fraudulent spoliation on the rights and properties of these parties; yet, unless the Appellant has also been guilty of improper conduct, it can only be strict Law which will remunerate them therefor, out of the estate of an innocent man.

This statement of the case presents two questions:

1. Was Martin Shearman a qualified executor as to the personal estate comprised in the Deed, within the meaning of the Act of Assembly, 1 Rev. Code, 389, which declares, that executors or administrators of any person who shall have been chargeable with the estate of a dead person, committed to their testator or intestate, by a Court of Record, shall pay so much as shall be due from their testator or intestate to the ward, idiot or lunatic, or to the legatees or persons entitled to distribution, before any proper debt of their testator or intestate?

65 *2. If an account of this part of the estate could have been claimed and charged on the estate of Martin Shearman, as a debt of the first dignity, so as to take precedence of other proper debts of his, and to charge his administrator for a devastavit in paying such other proper debts, can such pretension be supported under the bill and proceedings above stated?

The Act of Assembly, I presume, must have intended one of two or three things; either that an executor or administrator, or an executor, administrator or guardian, &c. is bound to take notice of every case in which his testator or intestate acted in such fiduciary character, and must likewise be presumed to have knowledge of the state of the accounts, and whether any thing is due or not, and also of all claims which may, by possibility, be asserted in consequence of such trust: or, that he shall only be bound to take notice of such trusts as shall be actually made known to him, together with the extent and nature of the claim, by suit or otherwise; or, if he is bound to notice the trust itself, as one committed by a Court of Record, he is not bound to notice any claim, which may be asserted by the cestui que trusts, unless in cases where accounts have actually been settled by the Court, and made a matter of record, showing monies due; or, unless a specific claim has been made, by suit or otherwise, in such a way as to show that the claim is one within the Act.

It has been thought rather a hard case, that executors or administrators shall be bound by, and obliged to take notice of, all Judgments, wherever rendered within the State, though they are not only matters of record, but show precisely what is due, and enable the executor at once to defend himself against claims of inferior dignity. But where, so far from there being a Judgment to guide him, there is not even notice by suit or otherwise, actually given, either that there was such trust in relation to the matter claimed, or that there had been a breach of that trust in whole or in part, it would seem to me an intolerable 66 hardship, to make "the executor or administrator answerable, as he would be to judgment creditors. If you do this, you ought to extend to him the correlative benefit of pleading this trusteeship, and all possible claims arising under it, as a bar to all other actions, until such claims shall be exhibited and adjusted. All this would be monstrous, and was never intended by the Law. A trust of this kind may even be settled up by the Court, and the amount paid accordingly, but that account may afterwards be surcharged and set aside, and a much larger sum found due; but, before such claim is made known, the executor or administrator of the trustee may have paid his proper debts. It cannot be, that this is a devastavit under the Act.

If actual notice of the breach of trust, then, is necessary to be given in some way or other, this of course involves notice of the trust itself, and consequently, implied notice of it is not necessary to be inferred, in order to effect the purposes of the Law, as it is in case of Judgments; unless, indeed, it should be in the case I have above put, of a settlement of accounts, showing a particular balance, returned to Court and made a matter of record. As to this, I give no opinion. But it seems to me, that where the case depends on actual notice of the claim, the party cannot derive aid from any implied notice in Law, so as to charge another beyond the actual notice given. The notice given ought to show the nature and extent of the claim; and the party ought not to be permitted afterwards, by evidence or otherwise, to vary it so as to have a retrospective operation. The nature of the claim, as first announced, is that to which the attention of the executor or administrator is drawn; and he proceeds accordingly. The claim, for instance, as originally made, is, in substance, a charge of a trover and conversion by the testator or intestate, of the goods of the deceased. But, it turns out afterwards, that he held them as executor or administrator or guardian, and had not accounted for them. In the mean time, his executor or administrator has paid debts, &c. Is 67 *he bound to know contrary to the claim set up, that this is a trust fund, within the Act? And can he defend himself against other creditors on this ground? It seems to me not.

In general, then, before an executor or administrator or guardian, &c., can be subjected to a devastavit under the Act, he must have actual notice of the nature and extent of the claim, and that it is a charge which pertains to the fiduciary character of his testator or intestate.

The fair way, then, and the most, it seems to me, that can be asked by the Appellees, is to examine this case precisely as if this suit had, for the first time, been instituted at the time the bill of revivor was filed: that the administrator de bonis non of Fleet had united with the heirs at law in the bill; and that it had been couched in the same language, making the same charges, and no more, than those contained in the original bill above referred to.

The question then recurs, is the personal estate conveyed by the Deed, and held and claimed by Martin Shearman under it, as a purchaser thereof for value, a portion of the estate of Fleet, committed to him by a Court of Record, and which can be charged on his estate as a claim of the first dignity, under any bill that could have been filed in the cause? Would he have been bound by his oath, even if his claim was under a voluntary Deed, to make an inventory and appraisement of these goods, as of the goods of Fleet? I presume not. No one could have claimed this of him. The Court would not estimate his risk by its value. If there was not enough besides for the payment of debts, creditors could resort to this fund for that purpose; but, the Deed would only be void as to them. Actual fraud, as to them, would not be necessary. It would be enough that the Deed was voluntary. They can go against the fund, whether the volunteer is executor or not. The executor or administrator cannot sue the volunteer to set aside the voluntary Deed, in order to pay debts. It is no part of their duty, because it is no 68 *part of the estate committed to them; and if it is not in this case, I cannot see how it would be, if the executor or administrator was himself the donee. If he makes an inventory of it as part of the estate, it must be subject to distribution, as well as to payment of debts.

But this is not a case of creditors. It is a claim by an administrator and distributees, in which it is not enough to show the Deed voluntary; actual fraud in obtaining it, must be the ground of the claim. And though this ground of claim goes to show, that as well as it regards creditors as distributees, no title passed: but that as to both, the goods are to be treated as the goods of Fleet; yet, I have not been able to perceive how this will vary the case from that of a mere voluntary Deed, above put. In some respects, it seems to me to be a stronger case than that, in favor of the opinion I have advanced as to it. I can see no reason why, as to creditors, actual fraud shall make it a part of the estate committed by the Court, if the voluntary consideration or legal fraud would not. But, it is the estate of the deceased, because he to whom the estate of the deceased is committed has fraudulently obtained a Deed, vesting the legal title to it in him, before the death of him to whose estate it is said to belong. Suppose, when Martin Shearman qualified, the Court had been told by the Appellees, "This man holds the greater part of the estate of Fleet under a Deed obtained by fraud, and we intend to sue to set it aside, and now desire you to direct the appraisement of that property, and to take security for its amount." Could the Court have done either? It seems to me not. But would Shearman be bound to render an inventory, and thereby accuse himself of the alleged fraud? Surely not. When, then, does it again become part of the estate of Fleet? Not until the moment when the Deed is vacated; and even if this had been done in the life-time of Martin Shearman, and if there had been no Will also giving it to him, but he had been administrator, I would pause before I 69 would say, that his sureties should *be responsible for it. But, in this case, and as to these parties, both Deed and Will must be set aside, or nothing is done; and had that taken place in the life-time of Martin Shearman, the very act which made this property again a portion of Fleet's estate, would have virtually annulled all his power over it as executor. But, this Decree was not in the life-time of Martin Shearman. When he died, the legal estate was in him; and his administrator was bound to give security to its extent, to return an inventory of it, and to pay debts, &c., accordingly. From this latter, he will be excused, now, as soon as these goods are recovered from him, by those having a paramount title. This has been done, and they have got possession.

During his possession, then, and during his life, the legal title was in Martin Shearman, not as executor, but under the Deed. This state of things continues until the Decree. Up to that time, they are a part of Martin Shearman's estate, and liable for his debts. How then can it be said, that they were committed to him by a Court of Record, as part of the estate of Fleet?

For these reasons, as at present advised, I think that no bill could have been framed, so as to bring this case within the Act of Assembly. The necessary charge, in this case, of actual fraud in getting the legal title from one who did not intend to convey it, or was incapacitated to do so, is a charge which admits the legal title in him, but which seeks to avoid it. It charges an act in the nature of a tort by which an injury has been done; and, when prosecuted against Martin Shearman alone, it is only charged as a personal injury of this kind, as a fraud subjecting him to certain consequences; not as a violation of his duty as an executor, in not returning an inventory, and rendering an account of his property. If apprehensions had been entertained that he would remove the slaves, and an injunction or sequestration had been asked, would it have been refused because the sureties in the executorial *bond would be liable? I presume not; even if it had appeared in the bill, that he had qualified as executor. It is to the consequences arising from this fraud, then, that the estate of Martin Shearman is liable; and I have therefore been unable to perceive, how it could have been charged, as arising from his acts as executor, in relation to property committed to him, as such, by a Court of Record.

But, if it could have been so charged, it has not been; and if the administrator ought to have notice of the claim, so as to justify him in withholding the assets from other creditors, it ought to be so given or charged, I presume, that he would not only have notice that the demand was claimed as one of the first dignity, but presented in such a shape, that he might plead its pendency, in bar of debts of inferior degree. But, the bill treats the case simply as one of the nature I have above described, simply as a tortious possession under a fraudulent Deed and Will. The bill, in fact, was against Martin Shearman himself, filed in a case, in which, if he could have been charged as executor, in regard to this part of the estate, he was not so charged, and in which the party had a right to waive charging him as executor, had a right to exonerate his sureties, and to look to him personally, from the consequences of a fraud committed by him, before he was executor, and for which they could equally charge him, whether he had ever qualified as executor or not.

If a doubt had existed, whether the bill could have been filed in any other shape, the party had a right not to risque the consequences of that doubt, of a demurrer to his bill, &c. He had a right to go against Martin Shearman alone, in his individual character. If he did this from ignorance that he had qualified as executor, it is the same thing. That might have led to an amended bill, if indeed, it could have been amended. But, then, it could not have operated retrospectively, so as to make previous payments a devastavit. The bill was originally filed as a mere individual charge against Martin Shearman.

71 No other *part of the pleadings has changed the nature of that charge; nor is anything to the contrary perceived in the case, until the Decree vacating the Deed and Will. But even this, as I have above stated, does not seem to me necessarily to involve that question. If it does, however, the payments which have been rejected by the Commissioner, were all before that Decree.

On the whole, though I am not without my doubts, I cannot vote in support of this Decree subjecting this administrator to a devastavit. That, I believe, is the only point in contest. At all events, I do not perceive any other error.

The PRESIDENT.

My first impression of this case was, that the objections urged by Counsel to the Decree might be obviated by a minute attention to the pleading and facts in the record; but on a full examination of them, I have come to a different conclusion. The proceedings, nether expressly nor by intendment, exhibit any claim against E. G. Shearman administrator of Martin Shearman, who was executor of John Fleet; but charge him solely as administrator of Martin Shearman. The bill recites the Will of Fleet, but founds no claim on it, as its object was to set it aside, as well as the Deed; and though it be admitted, that E. G. Shearman had notice of the probate, and must be presumed to know that Martin Shearman, his testator, was the rightful executor of Fleet until the probate was repealed, no claim, founded on these facts, is exhibited against him in any of the pleadings. Nor do I think that his admissions (in the character of administrator of Martin Shearman, in which he is charged) on the adjustment of the accounts directed by the Chancellor, can obviate that objection; as the credits claimed by him, for the payment of the proper debts of Martin

Shearman as his administrator, including 72 Dall's debt, were anterior in date to these *admissions before the Commissioner. There is nothing in his admissions, therefore, to deprive him of the right to insist, that until suit was brought against him as the administrator of Martin Shearman who was executor of Fleet, claiming the balance due by his testator to Fleet's estate by the personal representative of Fleet, he could not resist the claims of Martin Shearman's proper creditors, on the ground that that balance, whatever it might be, was a debt of superior dignity to theirs. Such a pretence would delay, infinitely, the creditors of every one who was executor or administrator, and lead to great frauds.

But, in another point of view, E. G. Shearman, ought to have been allowed the credits claimed by him as administrator of Martin Shearman. The bill was brought to set aside the Deed and Will of Fleet, as fraudulent. It is admitted, that the Deed included all the property of Fleet, except an inconsiderable part of it, which passed by the Will. Until the Deed and Will were set aside by the Chancellor, Martin Shearman was in possession of the property included in them, according to their tenor and effect. When he qualified as executor of Fleet, he could not be said to be in possession of the property included in the Deed, as executor of Fleet, but in his own right, such as it was. As to that property, he could not have been required to give security by the Court of Probate, but as to the property in the Will only. That he might have been charged as executor in his own wrong, as regarded the property in the Deed, if he had lived until it was set aside, is admitted; but he died before that event; and his administrator can, I think, only be charged as representing him as executor de son tort, as regards the property in the Deed. In relation to it, a debt due by Martin Shearman to the representatives of Fleet, was a proper debt of his own, and not of no higher dignity than any simple contract debt. If the bill and pleadings in the cause, therefore, had charged E. G. Shearman, as administrator of Martin Shearman, the rightful 73 executor of Fleet, the *property in the Deed could not have been charged to him in that character. As regarded the property in the Will, the proceedings have been very irregular. To have attained the object of the bill, after the death of Martin Shearman, the personal representative of Fleet ought, by supplemental bill, to have been made a party, and on his answer, coming in, an order to settle the accounts should have conformed to the different responsibilities of E. G. Shearman, charged in the supplemental bill.

In every point of view, therefore, E. G. Shearman, when he was accounting both for the property in the Deed and Will, ought to have been allowed a credit for the payment of the proper debts of Martin Shearman, either as his representative as executor de son tort, as to the property in the Deed; or as rightful executor of Fleet under the Will.

I think the Decree, therefore, is erroneous in not allowing him these credits; and so much ought to be reversed; and there is no substantial objection to the residue, it ought to be affirmed.

Ball v. Payne.

November, 1827.

Wills—Construction—Fee Tail—Docking.—A devise of lands to the son of the testator for life, "and in case he should have heirs lawfully begotten, that he shall or may dispose of the said land, to either or amongst the said heirs, as he shall think proper; but in case that my son should die without such heirs, then my Will is, that the said lands be equally divided amongst my daughters," gives a fee tail, converted by the Act of Assembly into a fee simple.

This was an ejectment brought in the Superior Court of Lancaster County, by Ball against Payne. The question between the parties, depended on the construction of a clause in the Will of Jas. W. Ball. The Superior Court gave Judgment for the Defendant, upon a special verdict found by the Jury, and the Plaintiff appealed.

The case was argued by Leigh and Wickham, for the Appellant, and by Starnard, for the Appellee.

The Counsel for the Appellant, cited Pells v. Brown, as it is reported in Fearné on Cont. Rem. 395, Butler's Ed.; Warner v. Mason, 5 Munf. 242; Smith v. Chapman, 1 Hen. & Munf. 300, Roane's opinion; Goodrich v. Harding, 3 Rand. 282.

The Counsel for the Appellee, cited Doe v. Smith, 7 Term Rep. 531; Doe v. Goldsmith, 7 Taunt. 209; Doe v. Chandler, 7 Term Rep. 531.

November 9. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.†

This case depends upon the construction of the following words in the Will of James W. Ball: "At the death or marriage of my wife, I give unto my son Cyrus Ball, the use of all the remainder of my lands that I possess in the County of Lancaster, during his life, and in case he should have heirs lawfully begotten, that he shall or may dispose of the said land, to either or amongst the said heirs, as he shall think proper; but in case that my son should die without such heirs, then my Will is, that the said lands be equally divided amongst my daughters." The use of his land given to Cyrus in the first branch of the clause, and the power of appointment in the second, I do not consider as affecting at all the character of the devise. We know that an appointee takes immediately under the Deed or Will treating the power, and just as if he had been named in that Deed or Will. Southby v. Stonestreet, 2 Ves. 610; Fearné on Cont. Rem.

Wills—Construction—Fee Tail—Docking.—In Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 86, it is said: "That the power of disposing to such of his issue as he should think fit would not operate to restrict the general words, is shown, by the case of Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73, where a similar power of disposing amongst or to either of the heirs of the body, was contained in the devise: but the tenant for life was held to take an estate tail which by our statute was converted into an estate in fee simple." On this subject the principal case is also cited with approval in Griffith v. Thomson, 1 Leigh 829; Seekright v. Billups, 4 Leigh 96, 98, 99, 112; Doe v. Craigen, 8 Leigh 452; Tinsley v. Jones, 18 Gratt. 297, 298; Hood v. Haden, 82 Va. 597.

†JUDGES GREEN and CABELL, absent.

100. It was acknowledged by the Counsel for the Appellant, that the word heirs, as used by the testator, must be understood heirs of the body. This, then, is a devise to Cyrus for life, and if he have heirs lawfully begotten of his body, to such of them as he shall appoint; and if he should die without such heirs, the lands to be divided among the daughters of the testator. The question is, what estate Cyrus took; and that depends on another question, whether the words heirs, &c. in the second branch of the clause, are to be taken as words of purchase, or words of limitation.

Words of purchase, are such as give the estate, originally, to the heirs, &c. and not through the medium of, or by descent from, the ancestor. Words of limitation, are such as do not give the estate imported by them, originally, to the heirs, &c. described, but only extend the ancestor's estate to an estate of inheritance, descendible to the heirs described. As far back as Shelly's Case, it has been laid down as a rule (never since questioned) "that wherever in the same instrument, there is a limitation to the ancestor for life, and one to his heirs general or special, the heirs shall not take by purchase, but by descent." To this rule, there are a few, and but very few exceptions. They are all very learnedly and accurately defined by Mr. Fearné, in his Essay on Contingent Remainders, and have so often been the subject of discussion and decision in this Court, that it would be worse than useless, to attempt to enumerate them. Suffice it to say, that neither in a Deed, nor in a Will, would the words used in the case before us, present an exception. In Wills, it is true, a greater latitude is taken; for there, the intention of the testator, unless it violate some rule of Law, is the standard. But cases innumerable might be quoted, to show, that devises clothed in the same words with ours, to wit: to A. for life, then to the heirs of his body, and on his death without such heirs, over, have been construed to give A. an estate tail; the words heirs of his body, being, in all

76 such cases, *taken as words of limitation, and not of purchase. This is done, not because the testator did not intend to give A. an estate for life; for, it is admitted that he did mean to give him such estate; but it is equally clear, that he intended to provide, not only for the immediate, but the remote issue of A. and that the estate should not go over, before such issue was extinct; and to effectuate this, the general intent, the words heirs, &c. are taken as words of limitation, extending the estate of A. to an estate of inheritance descendible to the heirs described.

The latest English case I have seen on this subject, is that of Doe on the demise of Cole v. Goldsmith, cited by the Counsel for the Appellee from 7 Taunt. 209. That was, I think, a stronger case than ours. It was "a devise to F. G. and his assigns for life, and immediately after his decease, unto the heirs of his body lawfully to be begotten, in such parts and shares as the said F. G. should by Will or Deed appoint; and in default of such heirs of his body, then immediately on his decease, over to J. G." The Court, without the least doubt, held it to be an estate tail in F. G., and destroyed by the recovery which he suffered.

Under the doctrines of the English Law, then, there is no doubt on my mind, that the son Cyrus Ball would take under this Will an estate tail, enlarged by our Statute into a fee.

But it was insisted, that under our Statute dispensing with words of inheritance in Deeds and Wills, a different construction ought to prevail: that by it, we must consider a fee simple given to the heirs of Cyrus Ball, which they take as purchasers; and which prevents the enlargement of the estate of Cyrus into a fee tail. The words of the Law are, "Every estate in lands, which shall hereafter be granted, conveyed or devised to one, although other words, heretofore necessary to transfer an estate of inheritance, be not added, shall be deemed a fee simple, if a less estate be not limited by express words, or do not 77 appear to have *been granted, conveyed, or devised, by construction or operation of Law." I have considered this Law as meaning simply to dispense with words of inheritance, and transferring the fee, in those cases, where before, for want of such words, an estate for life only would pass. But, I have never supposed it was intended by it, to break up from their foundation, the ancient and general rules of construction, and convert those into words of purchase, which, for centuries, had been settled as words of limitation. So far from disturbing ancient rules, the framers of that Law seem to have taken especial care to preserve them.

Before, then, we can bring our Statute to bear upon any case, we must ascertain that by the established rules of construction, an estate for life would have passed. But, we know that where land is devised to one for life, then to his heirs or the heirs of his body, and on failure of such heirs, over, no estate passed to the heirs or issue; but, these words are used as words of limitation, describing the estate of the ancestor, and extending it to a fee tail. Here, then, is no case presented for the operation of our Act. In the same Statute of 1785, from which the clause above quoted is taken, we find a declaration, that every estate in lands which hereafter shall be limited, so that as the Law aforesaid was, such estate would have been an estate tail, shall be deemed to be an estate in fee simple. Now, we know, that by the Law, as it had long before been settled, if an estate had been given to A. for life, then to the heirs or issue of A., and if he die without such issue, over; A. took an estate tail; and this, the Statute says, shall be a fee. But, if we say, that under the Law dispensing with words of inheritance, the heirs of the body of A. become purchasers, and take the fee, we prevent A's life estate from being enlarged into a fee tail, and thus withdraw it from the Act. This would be setting one clause of the same act in direct opposition to another. This, too, would violate the rule laid down and steadily adhered to by this Court, in all the 78 *cases which have come before it. In the case of Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 273, I have more particularly noticed these cases, to which I refer.

I conclude, that Cyrus Ball took an estate tail, converted by the Act into a fee; which fee was conveyed to the Defendant Payne; and that the Judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the Decree was affirmed.

Glasscock, &c. v. Batton.

November, 1827.

*Conveyance of Personalty—Retention of Possession by Grantor—Fraud.—Where a slave has been mortgaged, and afterwards sold absolutely to the mortgagee, but the Bill of sale not recorded, and possession permitted to remain with the vendor, such sale is fraudulent, as against a subsequent purchaser; and Equity will, (under the particular circumstances,) entertain such purchaser to recover the slave against the fraudulent vendee who had clandestinely gotten possession of him. Nor can such fraudulent vendee prevent a recovery, by showing, that the Plaintiff did not take possession at the instant of the purchase: as such omission cannot make good the fraudulent sale.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Clarksburg, where Thomas Batton filed a bill against John F. Singleton and Enoch Glasscock, alleging the following facts: That in 1820, the complainant Batton purchased of John F. Singleton a negro boy named Garrison, of about 13 or 14 years of age, at the price of 440 dollars, 340 dollars of which were paid by the complainant to the said Singleton, leaving 100 dollars still due: that Singleton shortly afterwards delivered possession of the said slave to the complainant: that some time after he held the said slave, and had paid the said 340 dollars, he

79 found that *Glasscock held a conveyance by Bill of Sale or Deed of Trust from the said Singleton, bearing date a few days prior to the complainant's purchase, conveying, or purporting to convey, the said negro boy, with one or more other negroes, which conveyance, as the complainant is informed, was in fact given to secure a debt, or supposed debt, of about 600 dollars, which Singleton owed to Glasscock; and Singleton, notwithstanding such conveyance, was suffered to retain the entire possession of the said negro boy, and to remain as the visible owner, without any notice or knowledge, on the part of the complainant, of the said conveyance: that the said Glasscock, (who resided in Loudoun County,) heard of the complainant's purchase, and about six months thereafter, came to Lewis County, to see the said Singleton on that subject, and came to some agreement or compromise with him, with the terms of which the complainant is not acquainted; although he is now informed, and charges, that Glasscock received property or security, or both by way of substitute, or in lieu of the said

*Sale of Personalty—Retention of Possession by Grantor—Fraud Per Se.—See on this subject, discussion in foot-note to Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 422; monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348. The principal case is cited in Sydnor v. Gee, 4 Leigh 549; Rose v. Burgess, 10 Leigh 197; Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 450; Benjamin v. Madden, 94 Va. 68, 26 S. E. Rep. 392.

negro boy, and perhaps by way of satisfaction or security for his whole demand; that Glasscock then received of the said Singleton two other negro slaves, and also a bill of exchange, or draft, or written order, on some person in Loudoun, or elsewhere, for about $300, which order was paid to Glasscock, or he made the order his own by retaining the same, without returning it to Singleton, or giving him any notice of the dishonor thereof: that Glasscock, while in Lewis County, publicly declared, and sent word to the complainant, that he had no claim to the said negro boy; because Singleton had settled his business otherwise, and to his satisfaction: that the complainant continued to hold and possess the said negro boy, till the night of the 19th of November, 1821, when he was clandestinely taken from his possession by Glasscock, who had privately traveled to Lewis County, in which he lurked, till that night furnished an opportunity for the seizure, and the complainant has never since been able to regain him, 80 or to ascertain *what Glasscock has done with him. The bill prays for a Decree for the said slave with his profits, or, if that cannot be obtained, that the money paid by the complainant, with interest may be decreed, &c.

The answer of Singleton states, that it is true, that the complainant purchased the negro in question, and that the Defendant had previously given a lien on the same to Glasscock, and had paid the debt, by letting Glasscock have two other slaves, and giving him an order to a certain W. Byrne of Fauquier County for $440: that the said Byrne accepted the order, as the Defendant has heard, upon some terms agreed on between him and Glasscock: that Glasscock has never returned the said order, or called on the Defendant for payment thereof; but has, as the Defendant is advised, made the order his own, by detaining it: that the Defendant delivered the said boy to Batton, and that the latter lost his possession of the boy, without the previous knowledge or procurement of the Defendant.

Glasscock answered, saying, that about the end of 1819, or beginning of 1820, Singleton being largely indebted to him, executed a Deed of Trust on three negroes, one of which was the boy in question: that the Deed was duly recorded: that the Defendant went to the County of Lewis, for the purpose of having the said negroes sold under the Deed of Trust, and Singleton proposed to sell the negroes to the Defendant, in preference to have them sold under the Deed of Trust: that this proposition was accepted, and the negroes were sold to this Defendant, in discharge of the debt; and a Bill of Sale was executed by Singleton, and the negroes delivered: that at the time of this transaction, Singleton had a large crop to manage, and at his earnest solicitation, the Defendant was prevailed upon to leave two of the negroes with Singleton, one of whom was the boy Garrison, until about the succeeding Christmas, at which time Singleton undertook to return them; at the same time, the Defendant promised Singleton, that if he paid him $600 at Christmas, he would

81 let him have *the negroes back again, and indulge him further for the balance of the purchase money: that at the time last mentioned, Singleton failed to send on the negroes, as he had promised, or to send the $600; in consequence of which, the Defendant, after taking legal advice, went out to Lewis County to take possession of his negroes: that upon arriving at the house of Singleton, he got one of the negroes and received from Singleton, a letter directed to the complainant, directing him to deliver up the boy Garrison, stating that the negro was the property of the Defendant; and that although he had sold the said negro to Batton, he had no right to do so: that the Defendant accordingly called upon Batton for the negro, who denied that he had the negro, and stated that he had sold him, and that he was then half way to New Orleans, which statement the Defendant did not believe: that the Defendant returned to Singleton, and informed him of the fact: that the Defendant then proposed to Singleton to give him an order on his Agent in Fauquier County, William Byrne, for $440, the amount he was to receive for the boy; with an understanding, that if he received the amount of the order, the Defendant should not trouble himself further upon the subject; but, if he did not receive it, he should enforce his right to the boy: that Singleton accordingly gave the order hereto annexed; but, upon application to Byrne, there were no funds in his hands to meet the order: that Byrne offered a conditional acceptance depending on the event of a suit in Chancery; which the Defendant refused to accept, but was content to receive the money if it came to the hands of Byrne, by the time contemplated, to avoid litigation: that the Defendant, some time afterwards, was informed that the negro was in the possession of Batton, and that he had deceived him by a false statement of his having been sold: that in consequence of the advice of Counsel, he repaired to the neighborhood of Batton, and took the boy from the kitchen of Batton, &c.

82 *The Chancellor decreed that the Defendant Glasscock, should deliver to the complainant the slave Garrison, and that the Defendant should render an account of the profits of the said slave. The Defendant appealed.

Leigh, for the Appellant.

Wickham, for the Appellee.

November 13. JUDGE COALTER delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.*

The jurisdiction of a Court of Chancery, I think, can be maintained in this case, if on no other ground, on the one taken in the argument, that if the Plaintiff in Equity had sued at Law, he could have been successfully resisted by the mortgage, which was duly recorded. Even if the Bill of Sale had been produced there, it might not have been a clear case at Law, that it was a release of the mortgage, so as, in that Court, to divest the legal title, and leave the Defendant simply on his title under the Bill of Sale. This, however, would be the consequence in a Court of Chancery, where substance is looked to, as decided in the case of Clayborne v. Hill, 1 Wash. 177. There it was decided, that the mortgage, being recorded, was not fraudulent and void by reason that the possession remained with the mortgagor; but that the subsequent absolute Bill of Sale operated as a release of the mortgage, and became the title under which the bargainee held; and that a continued possession in the bargainor afterwards, rendered that conveyance void. But the Defendant could have kept that Bill of Sale in his pocket, so that a resort must have been had to a Court of Equity to extract it; and if, for this purpose, the Appellee had a right to come into Equity, I can see no reason why he should not claim relief also there;

83 so as *to have possession restored, and an account of hires and profits. Besides, he had a right to go into Equity, in order to enquire into the compromise between the Appellant and Singleton the bargainor, and the compensation received under that agreement. Had the slave not been taken from the possession of the Appellee in the manner he was, the Appellant must have sued at Law; and had he recovered there under his mortgage, the Appellee surely could have enquired into these matters, in a Court of Equity. The manner of that possession, admitting that it was not a stealing, (as it has been denominated at the bar) and was not absolutely illegal, provided the party could have shown a better title, is nevertheless such a procedure, as does not deserve the countenance of Courts of Justice, and cannot be insisted on, in Equity, as placing the party on higher ground than he would have occupied, had it not taken place.

As to the merits, it seems to me, that on both points, they are equally clear for the appellee. Twyne's Case, 3 Co. 80, where it was held that absolute conveyances of goods, not accompanied by possession, are fraudulent and void, "for that the donor continueth in possession, and useth them as his own, and by reason thereof he tradeth and trafficketh with others, and defrauds and deceives them," followed up by the cases of Edwards v. Harbin; Hamilton v. Russel, and by the case of Clayborne v. Hill, above noticed; Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 Hen. & Munf. 289, and Alexander v. Deneale, 2 Munf. 341, and other cases in this Court, clearly show, that the Bill of Sale to the Appellant was fraudulent and void as to the Appellee, at the time he made his purchase.

But, it is argued, that the Appellee cannot avail himself of this, because he also permitted the property to remain with the seller, and that his purchase therefore was void.

In the first place, it does not appear to me, that this is proved. Delivery at the moment of the sale, is not necessary. The possession must remain, and if it

84 did so, it *was a matter very susceptible of proof. The Appellee was found in possession by the Appellant, and although it does not appear when that possession was acquired, yet, as this Court will not presume a fraud, there ought to have been proof of it by him, who seeks to avail himself of such fraud. But, if it were otherwise, and if we must take it that it did so remain, still if he got possession before any one was deceived, and became a purchaser thereof, it is not void. I speak of subsequent purchasers, not of creditors. The Appellant is not such a purchaser, and I cannot perceive how this prior purchase, which was void as aforesaid at the time the Appellee purchased and paid his money, can be reinstated, so as to place him in the condition of a subsequent purchaser.

This seems, indeed, not to be contended for to this extent; but, it is said, that there is par delictum, and that there is equal Equity, and the Appellant, not only being prior in time, but being Defendant in Equity, must prevail. But, it seems to me, that this is not so as to either point. It is true, if there had been a subsequent purchaser to both, neither could have prevailed against him, if possession remained, as has been alleged. He would have advanced his money, and must have held the property; but, the Appellant was not so deceived, did not so advance his money. The Appellee, however, was so deceived by the conduct of the Appellant, and so there is no par delictum, and the Equity is not equal.

As to the compromise and compensation received by the Appellant from Singleton, it is clearly proved by many witnesses, and it is admitted, that it would have put this case to rest, had it not been entered into, as is alleged, in consequence of a false suggestion by the Appellee, that the slave was not in his possession when demanded. This suggestion, true or false, could only have operated on the Appellant, so as to prevent his summary mode of redress, afterwards resorted to. It could no more have 85 prevented a suit against the Appellee, or caused the appellant *to resort for satisfaction to Singleton, than if he had simply refused to deliver him. But, how was the fact? The Appellant admits in his answer, that he did not believe this statement; and he also admits, that before he made the compromise, he had taken the advice of Pindal, as to this summary redress. But he wished, probably, to avoid the scandal of such a transaction, and preferred trying to obtain satisfaction from Singleton. This he did, and procured an order for $440, bearing interest, the price which the Appellee gave for the slave. The price of the three negroes sold to this Appellant, being about $1,100, and the two he received, being about twenty years of age, and one about eighteen, whilst the one in dispute was about twelve, it is fair to presume that he considered he obtained more than he gave for him. Nor is it at all unlikely that he should so have expressed himself, when speaking of the transaction. The witnesses, who testify to this, are in no otherwise discredited, and ought not to be disbelieved from the mere improbability of such a conversation, especially as many others prove his declarations, that he had made the compromise and was satisfied.

On every ground, therefore, the Decree must be affirmed.

Bond—Promise to Pay—Suit on—Case at Bar.—A. being indebted to B. transfers, without written assignment, two bonds due by C. to A. In a conversation between B. and C. the latter promises to pay the amount of the bonds when they should become due. This conversation was previous to the transfer. When the bonds become due, B. brings an action against C. on the bonds, in the name of A. C. pleads non est factum, and B. is cast in the suit. B. then sues C. on his promise to pay the bonds. Such action may well be maintained.

Pleading and Practice—Non Est Factum—Conclusion of.—The plea of non est factum, whether general or special, must conclude to the Country; and in such case the Plaintiff cannot reply any new matter. He must either accept it by a similer, or demur.

Bonds—Alteration—Non Est Factum.—A consent given by an obligor to the alteration of a bond, given after the alteration is made, will not repel the plea of non est factum; but, a consent given before, or at the time of, the alteration, will be considered as a re-execution.

Nonnegotiable Instrument—Assignment—Promise of Payment to Assignee—Rights or Assignee.—In Bentley v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 786, 28 S. E. Rep. 586, it is said: "While the law yet is that a simple assignment of a nonnegotiable instrument gives the assignee only equitable title, yet it is true that where the debtor, with notice of such assignment, promises payment to the assignee, the assignee may sue in his own name, not because of the statute which gives the assignee right of action in his own name, but because of the debtor's promise to the assignee, based on the consideration of pre-existing liability and its assignment to the assignee, giving to the assignee by such promise a legal title in place of what, until the promise, was only equitable title." 2 Rob. Deeds—Alteration—Effect.—In Preston v. Hull, 28 Gratt. 615, it is said: "In Cleaton v. Chambliss, 6 Rand. 86, this question arose incidentally. According to my understanding, the proposition then announced, is, that any material alteration of a deed invalidates it, unless made under such circumstances of consent by the obligee as amounts to a re-execution or reacknowledgment of the writing. The reason is obvious: the alteration changes the contract. The writing is no longer the deed of the obligor or grantor. In its altered state, it must be re-executed by him, and then it takes effect from the re-execution. Now whether it be the re-execution of an altered deed, or the execution of a new one, or the completion of an imperfect one, there can be no well-defined distinction; and the same principles must govern in each case in respect to the act necessary to a valid instrument." See principal case also cited on this subject in Rhea v. Gibson, 10 Gratt. 220. See further, monographic note on "Deeds" appended to Floitt v. Com., 12 Gratt. 564; monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

Pleading and Practice—Former Judgment—Effect as Evidence.—In Ches. & O. R. Co. v. Rison, 99 Va. 33, 27 S. E. Rep. 386, it is said: "A distinction has been taken in England, and in some of the United States, and several times recognized in this state, between the effect of a judgment as an estoppel where it is pleaded, and where it is only relied on in evidence. In the first instance, it is held to be conclusive; in the last instance, it is held that the jury are not estopped, but must find their verdict upon the whole evidence in the case, and may find against the former judgment." Cleaton v. Chambliss, 6 Rand. 94; Craddock v. Turner, 6 Leigh 129; Carroll County v. Collier, 22 Gratt. 809; Hayes and Wife v. Va. Mut. Ass'n, 76 Va. 231." tween the same parties, upon the same point, which, if pleaded; would have been a perfect bar, is, when used as evidence under the general issue, not conclusive on the Jury, but only evidence to be weighed by them.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Greensville County, where John Chambliss brought an action of trespass on the case, against Thomas Cleaton, junior. The Declaration contains nine counts. The first three are common money counts. The remaining six are stated with sufficient minuteness in the opinion of Judge Carr, which follows. The subsequent proceedings will also be found in the same opinion.

Johnson, for the Appellant, contended:

1. That the sustained counts in the Declaration are bad, because they do not allege that the bonds were not paid. The general averment at the conclusion of the Declaration is not sufficient.

2. The assumpsit is merged in the bond. Ashbrook v. Snape, Cro. Eliz. 240; 87 Com. Dig. tit. Action K. 2, 3, "is a very short and loose note, and is opposed by 1 Com. Dig. 233, 240; Reade v. Johnson, Cro. Eliz. 242; Symcock v. Payn, Ib. 786; Clerk v. Palady, Ib. 859; Cowp. Rep. Anonymous, 128; 1 Com. Dig. 321, 316.

3. The seventh and ninth counts are bad, because the Judgments set forth in those counts are conclusive, and a complete bar to this action. Chambliss had an election to bring assumpsit or debt; and he has made his election by bringing debt in the first instance, which was decided for the Defendant. 1 Com. Dig. 228, 229. The parol agreement might have been given in evidence in an action on the bond. It would be a legal estoppel to the Defendant, to plead that the bond had been forged. Buckner v. Smith, 1 Wash. 296; Shep. Touchstone, 68; Ib. note 1, p. 79; 4 Com. Dig. 294, tit. Fait. F. 1; Woolley v. Constant, 4 Johns. Rep. 54; Penny v. Corwithe, 18 Johns. Rep. 499; Speake v. U. States, 9 Cranch, 28.

4. This was an agreement to pay the debt of a third person, and ought to be in writing.

5. The demurrer to the second plea ought to have been overruled. 1 Chitt. on Bills, 307.

6. The Judgment on the plea of nul tiel record is erroneous, on account of a variance between the Judgment recited in the declaration, and the Judgment itself.

The Attorney General, for the Appellee, said, that the variances between the Declaration and record, are unimportant. Cabell v. Vaughan, 1 Saund. 291; see Hall's Dig. tit. Variance. The second plea was clearly demurrable. It was not important whether the bonds had been altered before the promise or not, as proved by the case of Buckner v. Smith, and 1 Mass. Rep. 139.

The 6th and 8th counts of the Declaration, and the 7th and 9th counts, are not uncertain, in alleging whether the bonds were valid or not. It must be taken that they were valid, as the promise gave an assurance that they were so.

Short, Salk. 25-7, 2 Ld. Raym. 759, S. C.

As to the merger, see Calvin v. Cooke, Com. on Contr. 283; Noy's Rep. 83; Latch. 53. The case in Cowper says, that a man cannot sue upon a promise to pay a bond; but says, at the same time, that a promise by a third person is not extinguished. In a Bill of Exchange, the holder may sue each of the parties before him, and one right of action does not extinguish another. Com. on Contr. 204; Cotterel v. Hooke, Doug. 97; 1 Com. Dig. 224 to 249; Foster v. Allanson, 2 Term Rep. 479; Com. Dig. 306, C.; Cro. Car. 314; 2 Term Rep. 483, note; 1 Caine's Rep. 47; Fenner v. Meares, 2 Wm. Black. Rep. 1269; Harria v. Richards, Cro. Car. 272.

The passage in Buckner v. Smith, is a mere dictum; but if it is Law, it could not apply to this case, because here, the suit was brought in the name of the obligee, and not of the transfer. No form of pleading could allow such a defence. Cox v. Prentice, 2 Mau. & Selw. 344.

November 27. JUDGE CARR.

This is an action of trespass on the case, founded on the alleged promise of the Defendant to pay the amount of two bonds, which the Defendant and another had executed to one Wessen, and of which the Plaintiff had been induced by the said promise, to take of Wessen a verbal transfer. The Declaration sets out the case in nine counts; the first three, money counts; the others, founded on the special promises and assurances of the Defendant. To all the special counts, there is a special demurrer, assigning ten causes of demurrer. The Court sustained the demurrer as to the 4th and 5th counts, and overruled it as to the others. The Defendant also pleaded six pleas. First Non Assumpsit, on which issues was joined. Then four special pleas to the special counts; and last, Nul Tiel Record to the 9th count.

89 *To the second plea, the Plaintiff demurred, and the Court sustained the demurrer. To the third plea, he replied specially, the Defendant demurred, and the Court overruled the demurrer. To the fourth plea, the Plaintiff replied specially. The Defendant rejoined specially. The Plaintiff demurred, and the demurrer was sustained. The issue joined on the plea of Nul Tiel Record was found by the Court for the Plaintiff, to which the Defendant filed exceptions, making the record a part of his bill. The Defendant also filed exceptions to the opinion of the Court, refusing certain instructions asked, and giving others not asked for.

This brief outline fully supports the assertion of Counsel, that there has been much ink shed in this case, fairly attributable to the rage for special pleading, which seems to have possessed the parties in the Court below; for the merits, as it seems to me, lie within a narrow compass, and might have been presented by short and simple pleadings.

The argument here, was chiefly on the demurrer to the four last counts. These counts, I consider all good, and to be supported by the same reasoning. I will, therefore, confine my examination to one of them; and will take the ninth, as it seems to present most exactly the real case between the parties.

The case made by this count is substantially as follows: that Wessen was indebted to the Plaintiff, and being possessed of two single bills, purporting to have been executed by the Defendant and Thos. Cleaton, senr. his surety, for the sum of $440 each, proposed to transfer them to the Plaintiff, in payment of the sum due him, and a further sum to be paid to the said Wessen by the Plaintiff: that in a conversation between the Plaintiff and the Defendant, concerning the debt due the Plaintiff from Wessen, and concerning the said single bills, the Defendant promised the Plaintiff, that if he would take the single bills from Wessen, he the Defendant would pay him the sums of money specified in the same, when they 90 should *become due: that the Plaintiff, confiding in this promise, did take a transfer (without written assignment) of the said single bills in payment of the money that Wessen owed him, and paid him the excess: that the Plaintiff afterwards brought suits in the name of Wessen (but for his own benefit) on the said single bills, against the Defendant: that the Defendant pleaded to each non est factum; and issues being joined on the said pleas, such proceedings were had, that in each case a Jury found the issue for the Defendant, and Judgments were rendered by the Court in his favor; as, by the records, &c., more fully appears; and the Plaintiff saith, that the single bills which were the subjects of the said verdicts and Judgments, were the same which the Plaintiff had previously shown to the Defendant, and which he had promised to pay, if the Plaintiff would take a transfer of them, and further, that they had not been in any manner altered from the time of the said promise, till the rendition of the said Judgments, whereby the Defendant became bound and liable to the said Plaintiff to pay, &c., with the usual conclusion. The demurrer admits all these facts to be true; and the question is, are they sufficient in Law to support the action?

The general rule is, that "any damage, or any suspension or forbearance of his right, or any possibility of a loss, occasioned to the Plaintiff by the promise of another, is a sufficient consideration for such promise, and will make it binding, although no actual benefit accrues to the party undertaking." 3 Burr. 1673; 3 Term Rep. 24; 2 H. Black. 312; 1 Saund. 211, b.; 2 Saund. 136. There can be no doubt, that the promise here comes within the rule; and indeed, I understood this to be admitted at the bar.

But, it was insisted, that the count was demurrable, because (setting out the records of the Judgments on the bonds) it showed on its face, that the promise to pay them might (if available at all) have availed the party in those actions; and therefore, could not be the foundation of a 91 *separate and distinct action. The examination which I have been able to give this subject, leads me to a different conclusion, both as to the position taken, and the consequence derived from it. I do not think, that in the actions on the bonds, the promise of Cleaton to pay them to Chambliss could have been resorted to; nor if it could, does it seem to me, as at present advised, a necessary conclusion, that therefore the promise would support no separate action. It was contended, that in actions on the bonds, the promise might be resorted to in two ways: 1st, by way of replication to the plea of non est factum; 2, by way of evidence to rebut the plea of non est factum, if issue was taken on that plea.

As to the first, a little attention to the form and nature of the plea of non est factum, will show, I think, that no such replication could have been taken to it. Every plea, which amounts to a negation of the existence of the cause of action set out, must conclude to the Country. If it confesses and avoids, it should conclude with a verification. The plea of non est factum, whether general or special, is a denial of the existence of the Deed; and therefore, the uniform conclusion is to the Country. See 2 Chitt. Pl. 460-1-2-3-4, where various forms are given, and many cases referred to. See also Rastal's Entries, 179, a. b., 180 a. b., where many forms are given, such as that the writing was delivered as an escrow, &c. and so is not his Deed; or that he is illiterate, and the writing was read to him as if given for ten marks to A., which he believing, sealed and delivered it; and so he says, that the writing now brought into Court, expressing that he is bound to the said A. in twenty marks, is not his Deed; and of this he puts himself upon the Country. This (I repeat) is the uniform conclusion of every plea of non est factum; and so are Cleaton's pleas to the bonds concluded. Now, we know, that when a plea concludes to the Country, the Plaintiff can never reply any new matter. He must either accept, by a 92 similiter, the issues tendered, or demur. There could, *then, have been no replication, that Cleaton had promised to pay the bonds to Chambliss.

Could this have been given in evidence on the issue joined? That issue was, whether it was the Deed of Cleaton or not. The plea admitted the original execution of the bond, but averred that it had been, since the delivery, materially altered, without the knowledge or consent of the Defendant, and so was not his Deed. It was contended, that if the alteration had been made with the assent of the Defendant, he would still have been bound by the bond; and that the promise to Chambliss, that if he would get a transfer of the bond, the Defendant would pay it, was proof of such assent, and proper, on that ground, to be resorted to. To prove that an alteration of the Deed, if assented to by the obligee, would not vitiate it, Shepherd's Touchstone, 68; 11 Co. 27. Com. Dig. 294; 4 Johns. 54; 18 Johns. 499; and 9 Cranch, 28, were referred to. I have examined these cases. Some of them say, that the alteration, if made by the obligor, will not annul the bond; others, if made by his consent. But all contemplate a case of consent given prior to, or at the time of, the alteration made; and it seems to be considered as a re-execution, or re-acknowledgment, of the Deed. In our case, the promise of Cleaton to pay the bonds was made after the alteration, to a third person, and without a knowledge that any change had been made in the bonds. How then could this promise avail to prove, that Cleaton authorised such change, or assented to it; that he re-acknowledged or re-executed the bonds, with a view to make that change a part of them?

But, suppose this the case, and I cannot think it follows, that no separate action can be sustained on the promise. It does not seem to me to be one of that class, relied on at the bar, where the party has his choice of two remedies, and is bound by his election. In those cases, the cause of action is the same, it is one; here it is not so. Cleaton had bound himself to Wes-sen in two bonds. It was these 93 *bonds which Chambliss bought. His natural and proper course was, first, to sue on them; if he recovered, it would be by force of the sealing and delivery of the bonds; and the promise of Cleaton, which induced him to take them, would be entirely out of view. If Cleaton, by his defence to these bonds, defeated the recovery, then would seem to be the time to resort to the promise; for then only, would it be ascertained, that by that promise the Plaintiff had sustained loss. Then Chambliss might well say to Cleaton, "You have induced me to take these bonds by your assurances. They have proved nought, and you must answer it."

But is not this whole discussion misplaced? How can we, in considering the demurrer to the Declaration, take into view the effect of the Judgment on the bonds, or the evidence which might or might not be admitted on that trial? The mode in which a party must avail himself of a former Judgment for the same cause of action, is by plea in bar, or in an action like this, by way of evidence on the general issue. If pleaded, it operates as an estoppel, unless the Defendant can avoid it by demurrer or replication. Suppose the Judgment on the bonds had been pleaded in bar here. The plea must have averred that the verdict and Judgment were directly upon the same point, and between the same parties, or privies; for, as it is well expressed by Lord Ellenborough in Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 358, the question on such plea is, "whether an allegation on record, upon which issue has been once taken and found, is, between the parties taking it and their privies, conclusive according to the finding thereof, so as to estop the parties respectively from again litigating that fact, once so tried and found." Suppose then, that the former Judgment had been thus pleaded, concluding (as it must do) with a verification by the record, and the Plaintiff had replied, that there was no such record. Would the production of the record of the Judgment on the bonds have supported the plea?

94 Would it have shown an issue *taken and found on the same allegation, and between the same parties, or their privies? The parties here are Chambliss v. Cleaton; there, Wessen v. Cleaton, and it seems questionable, whether the privy of estate between Wessen and Chambliss (not appearing upon the record) could have been averred in the plea; such is the strictness in pleading matter in estoppel. See 2 H. Black. 530; Doug. 159; Com. Dig. "Estoppel," E. 4; Co. Litt. 352, b. But take it, that the privy could have been averred and shown, as it would seem reasonable that it might. Yet the record must also show, that issue was taken and found, on the same allegation, which is the foundation of the second action. Here, the foundation of the action is the promise of Cleaton to Chambliss; there, the foundation is the bond of Cleaton to Wessen. The issue there, was upon non est factum; that was the point decided, the allegation taken and found; an allegation not put in issue, and which could not possibly be put in issue, in the case before us. If then, the Judgment on the bonds had been pleaded, the plea could not have availed; for, if it had stated the record correctly, a demurrer would have lain; and if incorrectly, the replication of nul tiel record would have overthrown it.

Whether the records of the Judgments on the bonds would have been admissible evidence; on the plea of non assumpsit in this action, need not be discussed; for, if admissible, we must presume that they were before the Jury; and they having found for the Plaintiff we must take that finding to be right. For, we know, that even a Judgment between the same parties, upon the same point, and which, if pleaded, would have been a perfect bar, is, when used as evidence under the general issue, not conclusive upon the Jury, but only evidence to be weighed by them; the doctrine being, that though the party is estopped if the matter be pleaded, yet that the Jury, upon the general issue, are not estopped, but must find their verdict upon the whole evidence in the case, and may find 95 against the former * Judgment.

Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346; Vooght v. Winck, 2 Barn. & Ald. 652, and the cases there cited. Thus, it would seem, that if the party had made the most of the former Judgment, either by pleading it, or using it as evidence, it could not have availed him. Much less can it have that effect in a demurrer to a Declaration, where it is stated merely as inducement, and where we can neither estimate its force as an estoppel, nor its weight as evidence.

We are next to consider the second plea of the Defendant. This is a plea to the special counts; that the Plaintiff ought not to have his action, because he says, that the single bills, in the said counts mentioned, had, subsequently to their execution, and before the promises in the said counts mentioned, been forged, erased, and materially altered, by the said Wessen, without the knowledge or consent of the said Defendant, &c. and were then and there, (unknown to the said Defendant,) void in Law, and this he is ready to verify, &c. To this plea there is a demurrer. We must, therefore, in considering this point, take the facts of the plea as true. What are they? 1st. That the bonds, after execution, and before the promise, were, without the knowledge or consent of the Defendant, materially altered by Wessen; and 2ndly, that they were (unknown to the Defendant) void in Law. I had thought from the argument, that this plea averred, that the Defendant was ignorant of the alteration of the bonds, when he promised the Plaintiff to pay them. But there is no such allegation. On the contrary, the Defendant seems cautiously to have avoided putting that fact in issue. He may have been fully apprised of the alteration in the bonds, when he promised to pay them to the Plaintiff, and yet every allegation in his plea be true. For instance; he alleges that the alteration in the bonds was made without his knowledge or consent. This may be entirely true, and still, before he made the promise, he may have been fully informed of the change. Again; he alleges that he was ignorant that 96 *the alteration rendered the bonds void in Law. Now, this ignorance of the legal effect of the change, is not only consistent with, but seems to suppose, a knowledge of the fact. May we not, then, from the plea itself, fairly and rationally take this as the state of the facts; that the Defendant executed the bonds to Wessen: that he made such an alteration in them as would support the plea of non est factum, (which we know, a change of date, or even the most trivial change made by the obligee, will do:) that afterwards, when Chambliss was about to trade for the bonds, an examination of them took place, in which Cleaton probably discovered the alteration, but conscious that he owed the money, and ignorant that he could get clear of it, promised Chambliss to pay the bonds? Taking this as the true state of facts, there could not be the hesitation of a moment, (I should think,) in supporting the demurrer; for, the Defendant's ignorance of Law could never be supposed to invalidate his promise. Even if we suppose that the plea meant to aver an ignorance of the alteration at the time of the promise, I do not think that that alone would render the promise invalid. The plea (we must remember) acknowledges the execution of the bonds, without alleging that the sums originally stated in them were less, than they now bear on their face. The plea also admits a promise to pay the bonds to Chambliss; and whether this promise was made after an examination of the bonds or not, common sense, and the uniform course of such transactions, assure us, that the amount of the bonds must have been mentioned. It could hardly have happened otherwise. Chambliss would naturally say to Cleaton, "Here are your two bonds to Wessen, for $440 each. They are offered to me in trade; are they good?" If the amount was truly stated, and he had no objection to make, he would answer, "The bonds are good, and if you get them, I will pay them." When, upon the faith of this promise, Chambliss has given the full value for these bonds, is the promise to be gotten over and ren-97 dered null, simply by the *fact, that at the time of making it, some change in the bonds had been made by the obligee, which would support the plea of non est factum? After inducing the Plaintiff to expend his money, ought not the Defendant to show something more than this, before he can escape from his promise? Ought not his plea to allege, in addition, that he does not owe the money in conscience? If he does not do this, must we not conclude, that though from the strictness and severity of the Law, pointed against forgers and spoliators, he has been able to defeat the action on the bond, yet that in justice and conscience, he owes the money? And if so, ought he not to be held to the promise, by which he had induced an innocent man to take his paper; paper, for which he had himself received value? This is clearly my opinion; and therefore, I think on every ground, that the demurrer was rightly sustained.

Let me not be misunderstood. In supporting the recovery of the Plaintiff, I mean to decide, that where a man, by his promise of payment, has induced another to take his paper, he shall not release himself from the obligation of that promise, by a legal objection taken to the bond, while it is apparent that in conscience he owes the money. To show what I do not mean to decide, I will state another case. A. gives his bond to B. for $100, in payment of a horse. The day after the purchase, C. comes to A. and says, "Your bond to B. for $100 is offered to me. Is it good?" A. says, "Yes, I know of no objection to it, and will pay it when due." Upon this, C. gets the bond. Soon after comes E. who claims the horse, and proves that he is his property, and was stolen from him. Here, the consideration of the bond wholly fails; and which of these two innocent persons shall lose it, I do not mean to decide. It will be time enough to do that, when the case comes before us.

I have taken up so much time already, that I shall say nothing further, except, that I think the Court were right, both in their decision on the plea of nul tiel record, and *in the instructions they gave to the Jury. I am for affirming the Judgment.

JUDGE COALTER concurred on every point; and JUDGE CABELL concurred on the general ground presented by the seventh and ninth counts; but dissented as to the sixth and eighth counts, which he thought not good on demurrer.*

I. KINDS OF ALTERATIONS.

A. MATERIAL ALTERATIONS.—An alteration is material when it changes the legal effect of the contract—changes the contract in a material particular. Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 537.

Hence, an alteration, to be material, must be of an essential stipulation of the instrument and not of a mere memorandum only endorsed thereon for convenience, as an earmark. Thus a memorandum of a collateral agreement between maker and endorser, endorsed on a bill, is not a material alteration. The same is true of added words, which are senseless and inoperative, either for the injury or benefit of anybody, especially when the note or bill is complete in itself. Bank of Ohio Valley v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 302.

For examples of material alterations, see Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 431.

B. IMMATERIAL ALTERATIONS.—From the foregoing statements, it may be inferred that an immaterial alteration may be defined as an alteration of some collateral or inoperative part of an instrument which has no bearing upon its execution. Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 412.

II. EFFECT OF ALTERATIONS.

A. IN GENERAL.—The effect of an alteration depends upon the materiality or immateriality of such alterations. Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 537.

B. MATERIAL ALTERATIONS.

1. IN GENERAL.—After determining that the alteration is material it is, nevertheless, necessary to inquire by whom or by whose authority it was made.

2. BY GRANTEE OR PROMISEE.

a. In General.—Whenever a material alteration is made wilfully by the promisee or grantee; only the consideration, that it was made with the knowledge of the other contracting party, will prevent it from having a vitiating effect. Connor v. Freshman, 4 W. Va. 693. See also, Newell v. Mayberry, 3 Leigh 250; Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 537; Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 392.

b. Without Consent of Promisor or Grantor.

(1) General Rule.—Thus any material alteration of a written instrument, made after its execution by one of the parties to the contract, without the knowledge or consent of the others, will invalidate the instrument as to the nonconsenting parties to such an extent that the party procuring such alteration will not be permitted to recover either upon its altered form or original terms. Newell v. Mayberry, 3 Leigh 260. See also, Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 544; Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 106; Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 417; Yeager v. Musgrave, 28 W. Va. 111; Piercy v. Percy, 5 W. Va. 199; Elgin v. Hall, 82 Va. 680; Keen v. Monroe, 75 Va. 426; Morehead v. Nat. Bank, 5 W. Va. 77; Consumers Ice Co. v. Jennings, 100 Va. 719, 42 S. E. Rep. 880.

Reason for the Rule.—The chief reason of this rule is in the fact that the alteration destroys the identity of the contract; and, therefore, if a party to the contract who has not consented to the alteration, were to be held bound by it, it would be, in effect, imposing upon him against his will a new contract, to whose terms he had never agreed. Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 537.

And further, 1st, because the alteration must affect the question of identity; and 2d, because such an unauthorized act of a party having the custody of a deed, should be construed most strongly against himself, and if legalized, might facilitate injuries and irremediable frauds. Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 199.

For no man will be permitted to take the chances of gain by the commission of a fraud without running the risk of loss in case of detection. Newell v. Mayberry, 3 Leigh 250; Elgin v. Hall, 83 Va. 684.

Application of Rule.—Though the effect of the alterations of a legal instrument is generally discussed with reference to deeds, yet the principle is applicable to all other instruments. The early decisions were chiefly upon deeds, because almost all written engagements were anciently in that form; but they establish the general proposition that written instruments which are altered, in the legal sense of that term, are thereby made void. Elgin v. Hall, 83 Va. 683; Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 199; Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 392.

Deeds.—Material erasures and interlineations made in a deed after its acknowledgment will vitiate it, thereby rendering it null and void. Deem v. Phillips, 5 W. Va. 168. See monographic note on "Deeds" appended to Flott v. Commonwealth, 12 Gratt. 564.

Bonds.—And the authorities are numerous that, if the bond is altered by the obligee in a material point, it thereby becomes void. Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 199. See monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

Negotiable Instruments.—But, owing to its general use of negotiable paper, the rule is probably more rigidly enforced with regard to it than any other form of written instruments.

For a full list of examples, see Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 421. Also monographic note on "Bills, Notes and Checks" appended to Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 632.

Receipts.—Likewise, if a receipt is materially altered by the party holding it, or by the procurement of such party, it is thereby vitiated as an instrument of evidence. Elgin v. Hall, 83 Va. 680.

As to Sureties.—And so also the doctrine that a material alteration of a written instrument renders it void, applies a fortiori in favor of a surety. Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 108.

C. IMMATERIAL ALTERATIONS.

1. BY GRANTEE OR PROMISEE.—An immaterial alteration made by a grantee or promisee, innocently and without any fraudulent intent, even though the other party has no knowledge of it, will not render the instrument void. Keen v. Monroe, 75 Va. 428; Whiting v. Daniel, 1 Hen. & M. 390.

As where it is obvious on the face of a paper, that a word or phrase has been omitted by mistake, or inadvertence, and such words are obviously and naturally suggested, upon the mere inspection of the paper, as the words which the parties might have intended to use to express their meaning, such word, or words of like import may be supplied. Peyton v. Harmon, 23 Gratt. 643. And so the fact that a deed has immaterial interlineations will not exclude it as evidence. Va., etc., Iron Co. v. Fields, 94 Va. 102, 26 S. E. Rep. 426.

2. BY A STRANGER TO THE CONTRACT.—And so it is universally agreed, that, if a bond, deed, or other agreement be altered in an immaterial part by a stranger without the privity or knowledge of the obligor, it will not avoid the deed or other instrument. Yeager v. Musgrave, 28 W. Va. 90.

III. MATERIALITY OF ALTERATIONS.

A. IN GENERAL.—An alteration to be material must be of a material part of the instrument and affect the rights of the parties thereto. Newell v. Mayberry, 3 Leigh 250.

1. EXAMPLES.—Hence an alteration which changes the legal effect of the instrument will be material. Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 537.

Erasures of Names of Parties.—So the erasure or exclusion of the name of one of the principal obligors in a bond is a material alteration thereof, which vitiates it as to the other obligors. Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 202.

Change in Amount of Principal.—And an alteration which increases the amount of the principal of an instrument conditioned for the payment of money is a material alteration. Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 108.

Change in Place of Payment.—Accordingly, where a bill of exchange was, without the privity of the acceptor, altered by inserting the words "payable at the Bullhead, Aldgate," and afterwards endorsed to the plaintiff for value, who took it bona fide, and without knowledge of the alteration, it was held that this was a material alteration, which discharged the acceptor. Moorehead v. Nat. Bank, 5 W. Va. 77.

For further examples, see Bank v. Lockwood, 13 W. Va. 421; monographic notes on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801; "Bills, Notes and Checks" appended to Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 632; "Deeds" appended to Flott v. Commonwealth, 12 Gratt. 564.

IV. FILLING BLANKS.

A. BY EXPRESS PAROL AGREEMENT.—Undoubtedly blanks in an immaterial part of an instrument may be filled in by express parol agreement without the knowledge and consent of the grantor whether the instrument is sealed or not. Keen v. Monroe, 75 Va. 424; Whiting v. Daniel, 1 Hen. & M. 390.

But with respect to insertions which are material the converse of the above rule is true, especially as to instruments under seal. Preston v. Hull, 23 Gratt. 600.

1. PERFECTING MERELY INCOMPLETE INSTRUMENTS.—Thus the insertion, by parol authority, of the name of an obligee in a bond otherwise perfect, but without the knowledge of one of the obligors, as to him such bond is invalid. Preston v. Hull, 23 Gratt. 600.

And so, a blank piece of paper signed by sureties and afterwards filled in by principal is the deed of the principal but not binding upon the sureties. Penn v. Hamlett, 27 Gratt. 337.

2. IMPLIED AUTHORITY.—A promissory note sent to the payee with the amount left blank to be filled in by him is good as evidence of nil debet. Jordan v. Nelson, 2 Wash. 164.

Filling in Amount after Indorsement in Blank, as to Bona Fide Purchaser.—It is well settled, that a blank indorsement on a negotiable instrument, blank as to date or amount at the time of the indorsement, if made for the purpose of giving credit to the drawer, is as effectual to bind the indorser for any amount with which the instrument may be filled up by the drawer, or an innocent holder for value, as if the instrument had been complete at the time of the indorsement. Orrick v. Colston, 7 Gratt. 194; Douglas v. Scott, 8 Leigh 43.

2. RATIFICATION OF ALTERATION.—And where an obligor in bond, knowing the fact of its alteration by the obligee, promised the transferee of the bond that he would pay it; the fact of such alteration will not support a plea of non est factum in a suit by the transferee on such promise. Cleaton v. Chambliss, 6 Rand. 86.

V. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

Question of Law and Fact.—Whether an alteration is material or not, should be decided by the judge, while all questions, involving a determination of the existence of an alteration should be submitted to a jury. Ramsey v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 349; Newell v. Mayberry, 3 Leigh 250; Keen v. Monroe, 75 Va. 424; Connor v. Freshman, 4 W. Va. 693; Consumers' Ice Co. v. Jennings, 100 Va. 719, 42 S. E. Rep. 880.

Burden of Proof of Alteration.—And if on the production of the instrument it appears to have been altered, it is incumbent on the party offering it in evidence to explain this appearance. Every alteration on the face of a written instrument detracts from its credit and renders it suspicious, and this suspicion the party claiming under it is bound to remove. But if any ground of suspicion is apparent upon the face of the instrument, the law presumes nothing, but leaves the question of the time when it was done, as well as that of the person by whom, and the intent with which, the alteration was made, as matters of fact to be ultimately found by the jury upon the proofs to be adduced by the party offering the instrument in evidence. Hodnett v. Pace, 84 Va. 873, 6 S. E. Rep. 217; Keen v. Monroe, 75 Va. 427; Elgin v. Hall, 82 Va. 680; Ramsey v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 349; Consumers' Ice Co. v. Jennings, 100 Va. 719, 42 S. E. Rep. 880. See also, Priest v. Whitacre, 78 Va. 151; Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 202.

But while it is incumbent on party offering instrument as evidence to explain any appearance of alteration on its face, if a witness mentions a written contract and the opposite party demands its production, it is not incumbent on the other party who does not offer, or claim under it, to explain any appearance of alteration on its face. Priest v. Whitacre, 78 Va. 151.

Presumption as to Time of Alteration.—It is generally agreed, that, inasmuch as fraud is never to be presumed, therefore, if no particular circumstances of suspicion attach to an altered instrument, the alteration is to be presumed innocent, or made prior to its execution. Ramsey v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 364. But see Hodnett v. Pace, 84 Va. 873, 6 S. E. Rep. 217.

Objection to Alteration Must Be Made in Lower Court.—The objection that a material alteration has been made in a note in suit cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. Tate v. Bank, 96 Va. 766, 33 S. E. Rep. 476.

Auld v. Alexander, &c.

December, 1887.

Chancery Practice—Assignment of Specific Portion of Debtor's Property.—There is no case in which a Court of Equity can assign to a creditor a specific portion of his debtor's property.

Same—Substitution.*—How far the doctrine of substitution extends.

This was an appeal from the Winchester Chancery Court, where Colin Auld filed his bill against Alexander and others. The whole case is stated in the following opinion.

Nicholas, and Johnson, for the Appellant.
Leigh, for the Appellees.

December 18. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.†

In 1792, John Alexander, together with his son Richard B. Alexander, and his son-in-law, John Brown, as his sureties, executed his bond for a considerable debt, to one Donaldson, and also a mortgage 99 on a tract of land of "about 1800 acres, to indemnify his sureties in the bond. In 1795, he sold 314 acres of the land to one Wilson, and conveyed to him, with general warranty and covenants against all incumbrances, and for a good title, and further assurances. Wilson, it is alleged, paid the purchase money to Donaldson by the order of Alexander, in part payment of the debt due him by Alexander; in consequence of which, the sureties released their lien on the land sold to Wilson. The bill charges that John Alexander, in surveying the 314 acres sold to Wilson, fraudulently carried the surveyor to a corner, so as to include 139 acres of land, which did not belong to him. In 1800, Wilson sold to one Ramsay, with general warranty and covenants against all incumbrances by him. When this conveyance was made, one Greenup was in possession of 139 acres, (wrongfully included in the survey as it is alleged,) claiming a fee-simple title in it; and in the same year, Ramsay brought an action of ejectment for the recovery of the possession; and in 1804 he sold to Auld, the plaintiff. In 1807, he conveyed to Auld, with special warranty against himself, and all persons claiming under him; after which, Judgment was rendered against him in the action of ejectment.

The bill of Auld is against Wilson, Ramsay, and the heirs of John Alexander, claiming to have assigned to him so much of the 1800 acres out of which the land was sold to Wilson, as will compensate him in value, for the 139 acres, lost by Greenup's title; or, to have the remainder of the 1800 acres sold under the Deed of Mortgage to Alexander's sureties in the bond of Donaldson, which, it appears, had been before released by the sureties; and for general relief, &c.

The mortgage is not exhibited; though its existence is admitted. Nor does it appear, that it has been regularly recorded, being only proved by one witness. It seems that all the residue of the 1800 acres of land, was conveyed by John Alexander to his children in severalty, for 100 what "consideration does not appear; except that Charles B. Alexander, one of the sons, says, that the portion conveyed to him, was in consideration principally of money paid by him for his father, and that he purchased Richard B. Alexander's part. None of the other heirs of John Alexander hold any part of the land, which he at any time held; the residue of his real estate having been sold in his life time to other persons. Nor are any of the Deeds from him to his sons impeached by the bill. There is, therefore, no ground on the pleadings, on which the Plaintiff is entitled to relief, unless he is entitled to a specific lien on the land in the possession of Charles B. Alexander, paramount to his title. His claim to have satisfaction for the loss of the 139 acres held by Greenup, by an assignment to him of a portion of the 1800 acres of equal value, has no foundation.

There is no case, in which a Court of Equity can assign to a creditor a specific portion of his debtor's property, in satisfaction of his demand. His claim to be substituted for Wilson and to have his rights, by which to get a lien on the land of Alexander, paramount to the title of Charles B. Alexander, one of his sons, is not better founded. Wilson himself, had no claim to the lien given for the benefit of Alexander's sureties, for the debt to Donaldson. If he did pay the purchase money to indemnify them, (which is not satisfactorily proved,) he did not pay it for the sureties. The money was due by himself; and though paid for Alexander, it was not paid for his sureties. But, if it had been so paid, there is no ground on which Auld, the Plaintiff, could be substituted for him. He had no claim to indemnity from Ramsay, from whom he purchased, nor upon Wilson. Not upon Ramsay, because his warranty was special, and never broken; nor upon Wilson, for whatever claim Ramsay might have upon him, none was assigned to Auld. Wilson's covenants were with Ramsay and his assigns of the land, and could only pass to an assignee of the land, as incident to it. That being in the adverse possession of Greenup when the conveyance was made to Auld, no title nor interest in the 139 acres passed to him; and though Ramsay might be estopped by his Deed to say that no title passed from him, yet others, not claiming under him, are not estopped.

Decree affirmed.

Payne v. Britton's Executor.

January, 1828.

Bail Bonds—Recitals—Immaterial Errors in.—A Bail Bond which recites a Writ at the suit of A. B., administrator, &c. while the writ is at the suit of A. B. executor, &c., is not an error for which a Judgment will be reversed.

Same—Sufficiency of.—A Bail Bond given to the Sheriff of — County, without naming the County, is good.

Same—Same.—The condition of a Bail Bond need not designate the time and place of appearance. Bond with Penalty—Necessity of Demand on.—A special demand need not be made before the Writ issued on a single bill under a penalty: and interest may be recovered without such demand.

Pleading and Practice—Venue.—In this State, it is not error that the venue is laid in one County, and the action brought in another, unless the Defendant is an inhabitant of another County and moves to dismiss the suit for that cause.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for the County of Fauquier. The executor of Britton brought an action of debt against White on a bill penal executed by the latter to the Plaintiff as executor. The bill was for $181 57 cents, payable on demand, and the penalty, in case of failure to pay, was in double that sum. The Writ is in the name of Joseph D. Smith, executor of George Britton. Payne became the appearance bail of White; and executed a Bail Bond to the Sheriff of — County, without mentioning any County; it recites the Writ as being at the suit of "Smith administrator of George Britton; deceased."

102 *&c., and the condition only requires the Defendant to "make his appearance agreeably to Law, as the said Writ requires." Judgment was entered by default, against the Defendant and the said Payne, for the penalty, but to be discharged by the payment of $181 57 cents, "with six per centum interest thereon," &c. The Declaration lays the venue in the county of Culpeper.

Payne obtained a Supersedeas from a Judge of this Court.

Harrison, for the Appellant.

Briggs, for the Appellee.

January 23. JUDGE GREEN.

In this case, the Judgment was by default for want of appearance; and according to the former decisions of this Court, the Statute of Jeofails does not apply to it.

The first objections taken, are to the Bail Bond; and first, that the Writ, being at the suit of Joseph D. Smith, executor of George Britton, and the Bail Bond reciting a Writ at the suit of J. D. Smith, administrator of G. Britton, the bond is, for this variance, fatally defective and void, under the 20th section of the 78th chapter of the Revised Code of 1819. It is doubtful, whether the hieroglyphic in the bond, of which the Clerk gives a fac simile, was intended for exor or admor; but, if it were the latter, I should not think that it vitiated the bond. The suit was by J. D. Smith, in his individual right, upon a bond given to him as executor of Britton. The addition of executor in the original bond, and of administrator if it was so, in the Bail Bond, were merely descriptive; and a variance in that description was not material. Under the Statute of 23 Hen. 6, ch. 7, from which this provision of our Statute is taken, it has been held, that an immaterial variance of the Bail Bond from the Writ, does not vitiate the bond;

103 *as where the Writ was to answer A. in a plea of debt for 300l. and the Bail Bond, to answer of a plea of debt only, not mentioning 300l. it was held to be good; "for, the Statute does not prescribe any strict form, but that it ought to be made to the Sheriff by his name of office, and to express the day and place of appearance; and though it vary in other brought anywhere the defendant can be found. Thus, for instance, an assault and battery committed, or a contract made. In one state may be the subject of an action in another, if process can be served on the defendant in the latter state. 3 Bl. Comm. 294. Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowp. 161. Livingston v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. 308. Payne v. Britton, 6 Rand. 101. Watts v. Thomas, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 488. McKenna v. Fleck, 1 How. 441; 2 Smith Lead. Cas. (9th Ed.) 967." See further, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phlippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

*Bond Payable on Demand—When Due.—A bond payable on demand is due and payable from its date. The case of Payne v. Britton, 6 Rand. 104, is a distinct authority to sustain this proposition. Carter v. Noland, 86 Va. 570. 10 S. E. Rep. 605. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt. 383. See further, monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

*Personal Actions—Jurisdiction.—In Nelson v. Ches. & O. R. Co., 88 Va. 974. 14 S. E. Rep. 838, it is said: "At common law all personal actions, whether ex delicto or ex contractu are transitory, and may be circumstances, it is not material." Villena v. Huatinga, Cro. Jac. 286; 2 Saund. 78.

The next objection is, that the bond is given to William Gibson, Sheriff of ——— County, without naming the County, of which he was Sheriff. By the English Statute, the bond was required to be given to the Sheriffs, "only to themselves and by the name of their office;" and in Male v. Cowper, 2 Roll's Rep. 365, and in the same case in Palm. 378, it was held, that the name of the County being in the margin, and the bond being given to A. B., Sheriff of the aforesaid County, was void, not being given to the Sheriff in his name of office, which required that he should not only be named as Sheriff, but of what County. But, in a subsequent case, Kirkebridge v. Wilson, 2 Lev. 123, it was held, that a bond given by N. W. and T. R. of the County of C. to J. R. Sheriff, (without saying of what County,) to answer the Plaintiff generally, (without saying in what action,) was good. But, however this might be under the English Statute, which in terms requires the bond to be given to the "Sheriff by his name of office," it is not necessary under our Statute, that the Sheriff's name of office should appear; that requiring only, that the bond shall be payable "to the Sheriff as Sheriff;" and such is this bond.

The last objection taken to the Bail Bond, is, that the condition does not sufficiently designate the time and place of appearance. It recites the date and return day of the Writ issued from the office of the Superior Court of Law for the County of Fauquier; and that the Defendant shall "make his appearance agreeably to Law, as the said Writ requires." The words of the Court in Gardner v. Dugdale, 104 *2 Show. 51, are a sufficient answer to this objection. "The Bail Bond to the Sheriff is to make the party appear according to the Writ; and not according to the condition of the bond; and the bail are, by virtue of the bond, engaged that he shall answer according to this Writ." "Every bail ought, at his peril, to see and take notice of the Writ, before he be bound, and thereby he may know what it is he engages for. If he do otherwise, he is bound to do he knows not what; and he must suffer for it." In respect to the condition of the bond prescribed by the Statutes, the English Statute and ours are verbatim the same.

An objection is taken to the proceedings at Rules; that it does not appear from the record, that the 2d day of July, the 6th day of August, and the 3d day of September, 1821, were the first Mondays of those months respectively, or the succeeding days; as if the Rules could not legally be taken on any day but the first Monday of a month, or the next day. Those days must have been within six days after the first Mondays in those months (within which the Rules may be taken) if the first Mondays occurred on or before the 2d, 6th, and 3d days of those months respectively; and I think that the Clerk stating that the Rules were taken on those days it ought to be presumed, that they were taken on the legal Rule days. If there had been any irregularity in this respect, the Court below was the proper tribunal to correct it. At all events, a Judgment should be reversed on that ground, without resorting to a Certiorari, or inspecting the Almanacs of that year.

The next objection is, that this being a bill, promising to pay a sum of money on demand, under a penalty, and there being no averment of a special demand, the penalty was not incurred; nor could Judgment be rendered for interest, without a Writ of Enquiry ascertaining the time of the demand; since the party was not in default until demand made and refusal to pay. The cases to which we have been referred, only prove, that an obligation to 105 *do something collateral upon demand, under a penalty, cannot be the foundation of an action, until demand made, and a failure to do the thing stipulated to be done. But, an obligation to pay money on demand, is evidence of a present debt payable instant, and the Writ is a demand, which entitles the Plaintiff to the penalty. The interest is allowed, not because the penalty is forfeited, but because the debt was, from the beginning, due and payable. However refined the doctrine may be, that the institution of the action is a demand which entitles the party to sue, it is so convenient and just, and so settled by authority, that I yield a ready assent to it.

The last objection taken, is, that the venue is laid in the County of Culpepper, whilst the action was in Fauquier.

In England, the venue is material as serving for a direction as to what County, the issue, if any should be made up, is to be sent for trial; but even there, it is of such little consequence, that the venue generally determined by the name of the County written in the margin of the Declaration, as with us, if it be wrong, does not hurt; and if it be right, helps; as, if the venue in the margin be wrong, and that in the body of the Declaration be right, or vice versa. With us, it is of no consequence whatever, in transitory actions, as I believe all personal actions are. For, upon a Declaration filed in the Court of Fauquier, stating the contract to be made in Culpepper, the Court of Fauquier is the proper tribunal to try it, if the party is arrested in that County, unless he is an inhabitant of another County, and moves to dismiss the suit for that cause.

The Judgment should be affirmed.

JUDGES CARR and CABELL concurred, and the Judgment was affirmed.*

106 *Gardner's Administrator v. Vidal.

January, 1828.

Administrators—Suit against—Plea of Fully Administered—Verdict.—A verdict upon the plea of fully administered ought to ascertain the amount of assets in the hands of the Defendant, at the commencement of the suit, and at the time of the plea pleaded.

Same—Same—Judgment—To What Time it Refers.—The Judgment when assets refers to the time of

*The PRESIDENT, and JUDGE COALTER, absent.

Administrators—Suit against—Plea of Fully Administered—Verdict—Judgment.—In Brizendine v. Tisdale, 5 Leigh 51, there was an action of debt on the plea pleaded, and, as to 'assets received after that time, no inquiry can be made in that suit.

Same-Same-Verdict-Sufficiency.—A verdict which merely finds that assets sufficient to pay the Plaintiff's demand, "have come" to the Defendant's hands, without saying, when, is erroneous.

Verdict-Setting Aside.—When a verdict is set aside, as to one issue, it must be set aside in toto.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law of Caroline County, where Vidal brought an action of debt against Rowe, administrator of Gardner, on a bill penal, said to have been executed by the said Gardner in his life-time. The Defendant pleaded, 1st, that the writing aforesaid is not the Deed of the said Gardner; 2d, payment; and 3d, fully administered. On these pleas, issue was joined. The Jury found a verdict, "that the writing obligatory in the Declaration mentioned, is the Deed of the Defendant's intestate; and the debt in the Declaration mentioned hath not been paid, &c., and that "assets sufficient hath come to the hands of the administrator to pay the same: that he hath not fully administered the said assets." The Court gave Judgment for the amount of the penalty in the Declaration mentioned, &c., to be discharged, &c.

A Bill of Exceptions was also filed to the opinion of the Court, excluding from the Jury, sundry papers containing, as alleged, the hand-writing, and particularly the signatures of the attesting witness, Benjamin Faulkner, and of the obligor, Anthony Gardner, with the evidence of certain witnesses, that they saw the said Faulkner and Gardner sign the said papers; for the purpose of enabling the Jury to compare the said writings, when so proved to be authentic, with the signatures of the said attesting witness and obligor in the bill penal, on which this action is founded.

This evidence was offered, after conflicting evidence *had been given by the Plaintiff and Defendant, of the hand-writing of the subscribing witness and obligor. As this question, however, is expressly waived by the Court, in their opinion, no further notice need be taken of it.

The Defendant appealed.

bond against an administratrix. The administratrix pleaded fully administered: the verdict was in general terms, that the defendant had not fully administered; and judgment was rendered thereupon for the debt demanded to be levied de bonis testatoris. An appeal was taken, and the supreme court, referring to the cases of Sturdivant v. Raines, 1 Leigh 481, and the principal case, reversed the judgment of the lower court, and ordered a venire de novo.

The plaintiff may admit the defendant's plea of fully administered, and take judgment, to be levied of the goods and chattels of the testator or intestate which may hereafter come into the defendant's hands to be administered; and, if he take issue upon the plea, and it is found against him, he will still have the like judgment quando acciderint. Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. 35, citing the principal case as authority.

January 25. JUDGE GREEN.

The verdict in this case is clearly insufficient, in respect to the plea of fully administered. The verdict upon that plea should ascertain the amount of assets in the hands of the Defendant, at the commencement of the suit, and at the time of the plea pleaded, to enable the Court to pronounce the proper Judgment. If, at the institution of the suit, there be outstanding debts of superior dignity, or unsatisfied Judgments, the Defendant must plead them specially, or he cannot avail himself of them upon the general plea of plene administravit, unless he has actually paid them before pleading; in which case, those payments would be embraced in the terms of the plea and issue. So, if assets came to the Defendant's hands after the commencement of the suit, and before pleading, he would be chargeable in respect to them, in that suit: for, the plea must allege that there were no assets in the hands of the Defendant to be administered, either at the time of the commencement of the action, or at any time since; and the Judgment when assets refers to the time of the plea pleaded; so that, as to the assets received after that time, no inquiry can be made in that suit: and upon a Scire Facias upon a Judgment when assets, such assets can be subjected, although received pending the former suit after pleading; and payments made after the same 108 time, to debts of equal *or superior dignity to the Plaintiff's Judgment, would be available as a defence to the Scire Facias. The verdict ought, therefore, to find, not only the amount of assets in the hands of the Defendants at the commencement of the suit, or that they were sufficient to pay the Plaintiff's demand; but, also the amount in his hands at the time of pleading, or that they were sufficient to pay the Plaintiff's demand; since the Defendant might have received or duly disbursed assets, or both received and disbursed, between the commencement of the action and the time of pleading. If the Defendant is found to have in his hands, assets not sufficient to pay the Plaintiff's demand, at the time of pleading, the Judgment would be for so much of the debt as the amount of assets in hand, de bonis testatoris; and for the residue of the debt, out of the assets of the testator, which came to the Defendant's hands since the plea pleaded, or might thereafter come to his hands. And as to the costs, they would depend upon the fact, as it appeared upon the record, whether the Defendant was in default or not. 2 Chitt. Pl. 451; 1 Saund. 336, a., note 10; Booth's ex'r v. Armstrong, 2 Wash. 301; Rogers' Adm'r v. Chandler's adm'r, 3 Munf. 65.

The verdict in this case finds, that assets sufficient to pay the Plaintiff's demand "hath come" to the Defendant's hands, without saying when. It might have been between the institution of the suit, and the filing of the plea; in which case, it might affect the question of costs, in some cases, if not in this: or after the plea pleaded, in which case, they could not have been subjected in this suit, and would have been entirely out of the issue. Nor does this part of the finding negative the allegation, that the Defendant had fully administered the assets which came to his hands; but, the verdict proceeds further to find, that the Defendant hath not fully administered, without ascertaining how much remained unadministered, at the time of the plea pleaded. If a Judgment de bonis testatoris were entered on this verdict, 109 such a Judgment would not, *it is true, bind the Defendant in respect to the quantum of assets, for which he was responsible, in a subsequent action suggesting a devastavit; but, would leave the question entirely open, as if the issue on that point had not been joined in this cause. But, the Defendant had a right to have that question tried, and finally decided in this suit; a right, of which the Court cannot deprive him.

For these reasons, the Judgment must be reversed in toto, the verdict set aside, and a venire de novo awarded. There is no example of a verdict being set aside as to one issue, and suffered to stand as to others, and trying a cause by piecemeal.

The Court purposely avoids deciding the point raised by the Bill of Exceptions; that question being of great importance, and the Court not being full, and it may not occur upon the new trial, or may be presented in another or more distinct form.

The other Judges concurred, and the Judgment was reversed in toto, the verdict set aside, and a venire de novo awarded.*

†Verdict—Surplusage.—In Lewis v. Childers, 13 W. Va. 10, it is said: "It is very true, if a verdict finds matter out of the issue, it is void for so much. It is also true, that if a jury give a verdict of the whole issue, and of more, that which is more is surplusage and should not stay judgment. It is also true, that on the general issue it is perfectly well settled, that the jury cannot in the case find, to any effectual purpose, any matter not within the issue, which they are charged to try. If they do, the court is bound to reject such finding as surplusage; and if the verdict be otherwise sufficient to justify a judgment, then to give such judgment, as would be proper, if there had been no such finding of matter out of the issue. This rule is founded on the best of reasons." Garrard v. Henry, 6 Rand. 110.

On the same subject the principal case is cited in Brugh v. Shanks, 5 Leigh 601.

‡Writ of Right—Nonjoinder of Demandants—Must Be Pleaded in Abatement.—In Bell v. Snyder, 10 Gratt. 365, it is said: "The nonjoinder of the omitted heir was clearly a matter in abatement, and was not therefore available on the mise joined. The cases of Green v. Lister, 8 Cranch R. 229; Garrard v. Henry, 6 Rand. 110, and Walker v. Boaz, 2 Rob. 486, only prove the same general doctrine that on the mise joined matter of abatement cannot be taken advantage of by the tenant; but none of them touches the question arising in this case." Bell v. Snyder holds that upon the mise joined every affirmative matter going to the right and title of the defendant, the want of which might have been pleaded in bar of others, (and therefore could maintain this Writ jointly with them,) this, like the other finding, being matter of abatement, cannot be given in evidence, nor found by the jury, on the mise joined, but must be pleaded in abatement.

Pleas in Abatement.§—The rules that govern pleas in abatement.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Law of Kanawha County. The following opinions will give a full view of the matters in controversy.

James Wickham, and Leigh, for the Appellants.

Johnson, for the Appellees:

JUDGE CARR.

This is a Writ of Right. The Demandants, in the form prescribed by the Act of Assembly, count of a tract of land, to which they set out by metes and bounds, and say that they have right to have the said tenement with the appurtenances, and offer proof that such is their right. The Tenants come and defend the right, &c.; and after describing the tenement in the words of the count, they put themselves on the Assize, and pray that recognition be made, whether they have greater right to hold the tenement aforesaid with the appurtenances, as they now hold it, or the said W. Garrard, and Frances his wife, W. Barnes and Sarah his wife, James Bream, Thomas Bullitt and Alexander Bullitt, to have as they now demand it. And the Demandants, in like manner, put themselves upon the Assize, and pray recognition to be made, whether they have greater right to hold the 111 tenement aforesaid, *as they demand, or the said Tenants, as they hold it. The mise being thus joined, a Jury were sworn, the truth to say, whether the Defendants have more right to hold the said land and appurtenances, which the Demandants claim against them, by the said Writ of Right, or the Demandants to have it, as they demand.

I have stated the pleadings thus specially, to show in the clearest light, the single point in issue, upon which the parties have staked their rights; to which the evidence and the Jury are tied down; to which, and to which alone, the verdict must respond. That point is simply an enquiry into the mere right; a comparison of the title, whether the Tenants have more right to the action, is necessarily put in issue and he is put to proof of same.

In Howard v. Rawson, 2 Leigh 784, it is said: "Pleas in abatement are regarded with great strictness; and no example is found of the reception of such plea after a plea in bar (except for matter arising purs darrain continuance) although it must frequently happen, that matter in abatement arising before suit brought, is discovered after issue joined. In Garrard v. Henry, 6 Rand. 112, 113, it is said by JUDGE CARR, that the death of the demandant pending the action, abates the writ, and the court will ex officio abate the suit, at whatever stage the fact may come to its knowledge; but that the death of a party before the commencement of the suit, is a fact which does not itself abate the writ, but only falsifies and renders it abateable by plea; and that, if the tenant passes by the fact of such death, and joins the mise on the mere right, he thereby acknowledges the demandant is in life, and forever precludes himself from taking advantage of his death, in any manner or form. This is conclusive upon the first point."

The principal case is also cited with approval in Walker v. Boaz, 2 Rob. 490; Warren v. Saunders, 27 Gratt. 268.

§Pleas in Abatement.—See generally, monographic note on "Abatement, Pleas in" appended to Warren v. Saunders, 27 Gratt. 269.

hold, or the Demandants to have, the land in controversy.

How have the Jury answered this enquiry? They find, "that the Demandants have more right to have the tenement which they demand against the Defendants, by their Writ of Right, than the Defendants have to hold the same." If they had stopped here, there could not have been the shadow of a doubt. They had fully discharged themselves of the issue in the very terms of their oath. But they go on, and find two other facts, the influence of which on the cause, they submit to the Court: 1. That Alexander Bullitt, one of the Demandants, was dead before the institution of the suit, leaving children; 2. That Bream, who claims a part of the land in controversy, under a Deed from Mrs. Huie, was not in possession by authority of any of the representatives of C. Bullit, previous to the execution of that Deed; and also that Mrs. Huie was not in actual possession, when she executed that deed, but was in legal possession of the title to her distributable part of the said land.

Upon this verdict, the Court below rendered Judgment for the defendants; and this Judgment, if it stands, will be an eternal bar to the claims of all and each of the demandants; for, the Books all tell us, that when once the mise is joined on the mere right, the Judgment must be final. Thus *Co. Litt. 295, b. "Seeing the mise is joined on the mere right, albeit, the verdict of the Grand Assize be given upon another point, yet Judgment final shall be given. And so it is, if the Tenant, after the mise joined, make default, or confess the action, or the Demandant be non suit; and yet, in none of these cases, they of the Grand Assize gave their verdict upon the mere right." Does it not seem a strange anomaly, that where the whole and sole enquiry, the Jury could, under their oaths, make, was, whether the Tenants or Demandants held the better right to the land, and where they have explicitly answered, that the Demandants had the better right, a Judgment should be entered, the effect of which is, that the Tenants have the right, and that this Judgment should be final and conclusive upon the right? Let us examine the nature of the two facts, which have wrought this startling effect.

Matter of defence is either in abatement, or in bar. Where it goes to destroy the cause of action, it is in bar. Where it merely defeats the present proceeding, and does not show that the Plaintiff is forever concluded, it is in abatement. This definition shows at once, that the facts added by the Jury to their verdict, present matter in abatement, for, that one of the Demandants was dead at the issuing of the Writ, or that Bream held in common with others, could never destroy the cause of action, though if properly pleaded, either might defeat the present proceeding. Matter in abatement is either intrinsic, appearing in the Writ, Declaration, Replication, or some pleading of the Plaintiff; or it is extrinsic. For intrinsic matter, the Court will, ex officio, abate the suit. Extrinsic matter is such as either de facto abates the suit, or such as renders it abateable. Of the first sort, is the death of the Demandant, or one of the several Demandants in a Writ of Right, pending the action; and at whatever stage of the suit, this fact comes to the knowledge of the Court, they will abate the suit. Carr v. Carter, and Drago v. Stead, in our books are cases of this kind. But, the death of a party *before the commencement of a suit, is a fact which does not, of itself, abate the Writ, but only falsifies and renders it abateable by plea, put in, in due time, and proper form. If the Defendant, passing by the fact of such death, pleads generally, or as here, joins the mise on the mere right, he thereby acknowledges that the party is in life, and forever precludes himself from taking advantage of his death, in any manner or form. So of the second fact found, that Bream was not in possession previous to the Deed of Mrs. Huie, and that she had only a legal possession, it is evident that by this finding, the Jury meant to present the question, whether, under such circumstances, the Deed conveyed the title of Mrs. Huie; and it is equally clear, (and indeed was conceded at the bar,) that any conveyance, whether at Common Law or Statutory, would, under such circumstances, carry the title.

But, it was relied on, that this finding was important in another point of view; that it showed, that Bream held as tenant in common with the other Demandants, and could not, therefore, properly join with them in the action. However true this may be, it is most clear, that it is extrinsic matter, purely in abatement, and not abating the Writ, but rendering it abateable only: that as such, it should have been pleaded before the mise joined, and could never be touched afterwards. Suppose, that after the mise joined, the tenants had made formal application to the Court, to be permitted to plead both these matters in abatement. Would it not have been gross and palpable error in the Court to have received such plea? The Books all tell us so. But, if it could not have been pleaded, is it not most strange to suppose, that it might on the trial of the mise have been given in evidence, when the issue was wholly different, and the opposite party having no notice, could not be prepared to rebut it, though he might have known of twenty witnesses who could directly disprove it? On this point, I refer to the case of Bolling v. The Mayor of Petersburg,

3 Rand. 563, and the cases there cited. *But, these facts have been found; they form a part of the verdict; and the question is, what shall we do with them? I answer without hesitation, reject them as surplusage. The verdict, without them, is a perfect answer to the issue. These facts are wholly out of it, and ought not to prevent a Judgment for the Demandants. It is settled Law, founded on the soundest and clearest reason, that the verdict is void so far as it goes out of the issue. Thus, in Foster v. Jackson, Hobart, 53, it is said, "First lay this for a ground, that if the Jury find any thing that is merely out of the issue, that such verdict, for so much, is utterly void and of no force though it conclude in general for or against the Plaintiff or Defendant; whereof the reason is plain, which is, that the Juror are triers of matter of fact put in issue between the parties, and their oath, which contains their commission, is, that they shall truly try the issue between party and party. So that whatsoever they do try besides the issue is per non juratos: as a cause judged by the Court that hath no jurisdiction of the cause, is coram non iudice, and utterly void; for, a verdict must not be to the action that might have been pleaded, but to the issue which is pleaded, and in their charge. And if that other point had been pleaded, it might have had another answer and evidence. And so upon the matter, if that extravagant part of the verdict be false, it is no perjury, neither doth an attain lie upon it." The reason here seems to me most conclusive. Again, 1 Lev. 66, cited Com. Dig. tit. "Pleader," S. 18, it is said, "If a verdict finds matter out of the issue, it is void for so much, though the matter out of the issue destroys the Plaintiff's title." Again, Co. Litt. 227, a. "But, if the Jury give a verdict of the whole issue, and of more, &c., that which is more is surplusage, and shall not stay Judgment; for, utile per inutile non vitiatur. But, necessary incidents required by Law, the Jury may find." 21 Vin. Abr. D. 9, 2, Pl. 8. "If the Jury find the issue and more, the surplusage is void."

Pl. 9. "Where surplusage is found by 115 *verdict in Assize, as jointenancy, &c., which abates the Writ, yet this is only surplusage when it is not pleaded, and shall not prejudice the Plaintiff." These authorities put the point beyond question. I refer also, as well on this, as the other legal positions taken before, to the many Authorities collected by my brother Green, which I have examined, and know to be correctly stated.

Upon the whole, I am clearly of opinion, that the Judgment of the Court below be reversed, and final Judgment entered for the Demandants.

JUDGE GREEN.

The pleadings having been made up, and the mise joined in the usual form, as prescribed by the Act of Assembly, the Jury found that the Demandants have more right to have the tenement as they demand it, than the Tenants have to hold it; unless the right of the Demandants to recover, is affected by two facts; 1st, that one of the Demandants was dead before the emanation of the original Writ, leaving children, his heirs; and 2dly, that one of the Demandants received a conveyance for H. G. Huie for her distributable share of the land in controversy, when he was not in possession, under, or by authority of any of the legal representatives of C. Bullitt; and when the said Huie was not in actual possession of the land, but was in legal possession of her title to her distributive share.

The obvious purpose of finding the last of these facts was to submit to the Court the question, whether H. G. Huie, being entitled to a distributable part of the land in question, and having conveyed her interest therein to one of the Demandants, when she was not in actual possession, and when he was not in possession under the legal owners, her Deed passed her title. If not, it is clear that all the Demandants were not entitled as they claimed to be, and the question would have arisen, whether, in that case, even those who were entitled could have had any judgment? *The question, however, on that point does not arise, since it is clear that H. G. Huie's Deed passed her title, whether it was by feoffment with livery of seisin, (as could hardly be the case; for, in that case, she would have been in actual possession at the time of the conveyance,) or by Deed of bargain and sale, or lease and release, or covenant to stand seised to uses, or otherwise; for, no adverse possession being found, she had a legal seisin, which might be transferred to another by any Common Law or Statutory conveyance; and the seisin, so transferred, was sufficient, under our Act of Assembly, to maintain a Writ of Right. But this finding shows, that whether she was seised in parcenary with the other Demandants, (as is implied by the finding) or jointly, or in common, her grantee must have been a Tenant in common with the other Demandants; all of whom are found to have better right than the Tenants. And it is equally clear, that Tenants in common cannot properly join in a Writ of Right; and a joint Writ, alleging a joint right in them, is false. So the other finding, that one of the Demandants, who, if alive, would have had title, was dead before the emanation of the Writ, leaving children who were his heirs, also falsified the Writ. Either of these facts might have been pleaded in abatement of the Writ, and if they can now be taken notice of, a Judgment of abatement, or a final Judgment upon the right, in favor of the Tenants, must be the consequence.

To determine whether these facts, brought in this form to the notice of the Court, can be properly assumed as the foundation of their Judgment, an attention to some of the settled doctrines of the Law in respect to abatements, is necessary.

Matter of abatement is either intrinsic, appearing on the face of the Writ, or shown by the pleadings on the part of the Plaintiff; in which case, the Court will, ex officio, abate the Writ or suit, as the nature of the matter of abatement, so appearing, may require, and at any stage of the suit at which it is brought to the attention of the Court in 117 *any way, even after verdict on the general issue, unless cured by the pleadings or verdict; or it is extrinsic, which can only be shown by plea in abatement, or suggestion, to the Court either by one of the parties or an amicus curiæ; and the party making such a suggestion, makes it, not as a party, but as amicus curiæ. Of these extrinsic matters of abatement, some only make the suit abateable; and they must be pleaded in due time or they cannot be afterwards available to him in any possible way. In all such cases, extrinsic matter of abatement, existing before the suing out of the Writ, and before the proper time for pleading in abatement, must be then pleaded, or they can never after be pleaded or insisted on; and such matter thereafter arising, must be promptly pleaded puis darrien continuance, or the party loses the benefit of the plea forever. Other extrinsic matters of abatement are such as abate the suit de facto, and these after the Defendant has lost the right of pleading them, being made known to the Court at any stage of the cause, and in any way, abate the suit; and if not made known to the Court, and Judgment be given either for Plaintiff or Defendant, such matter may be assigned upon a Writ of Error, as error in fact, for which the Judgment would be reversed. And finally, the same matter may, in some cases, be pleaded in abatement or in bar, at the election of the Defendant.

Considering the death of one of the Demandants before the suing out of the Writ, and the several tenancy of the Demandants, found by the Jury in this case, for the present, as matters going only in abatement of the suit, which is their effect as they are presented to the Court? They are extrinsic matters, and such as do not, (as the death of a party pending the suit does,) de facto abate it. Nothing existing before the suing out of the Writ can de facto abate the suit, since it only falsifies the Writ, and makes it abateable, and that only by a timely plea in abatement. After pleading in bar, no plea in abatement is admissible, unless it be of something which has happened since the last 118 continuance, *and which makes the suit abateable only, and does not ipso facto abate it. The tenants, therefore, could not, after joining the mise, avail themselves of these facts by plea, although they might have done so, upon their first appearance; and a Judgment for the Demandants generally, although one of them was dead at the institution of the suit, could never be impeached upon the allegation of those facts, since nothing can be assigned as error upon a Writ of Error, which might have been pleaded in the original action.

Does the finding of these facts, by the Jury, vary the case, and make it the duty of the Court to consider them as properly upon the record? I think not. Although a Jury may find, upon the trial of the general issue, or any other, against an estoppel operating in respect to a matter involved in the issue, yet it is perfectly well settled, that they can in no case find, to any effectual purpose, any matter not within the issue which they are charged to try. If they do, the Court is bound to reject such finding as surplusage; and if the verdict be otherwise sufficient to justify a Judgment, then to give such Judgment, as would be proper, if there had been no such finding of matter out of the issue. This rule is founded on the best reasons. The parties cannot be supposed to come to trial, prepared to give evidence as to any matter, except that put in issue; and no evidence, not tending to prove the very matter in issue, can be properly allowed to go to the Jury. The finding of such collateral matter, must, therefore, be upon ex parte and illegal testimony, and is entitled to no respect whatever. It has been held here, and in the Supreme Court of the U. States, upon the fullest consideration, that no matter of abatement can be given in evidence, upon the trial of the mise joined upon the mere right; and if we could, after the mise joined, give a Judgment of abatement, or any other than a final Judgment on the right, in any case except where the suit abates by matter which abates it de facto, or is pleaded in abatement puis 119 darrein *continuance, I should clearly think that we could not in this case.

I refer to a few cases in a summary way relating to these various points.

When the Jury find the issue and more, the surplage is void, Ibid. D. g. 2, Pl. 8; as where jointenancy, &c. which abates the Writ, is found by verdict in Assize, this is only surplage when it is not pleaded, and shall not prejudice the Plaintiff. Ibid. Pl. 9.

In waste, the Plaintiff declared that the Defendant made feoffment to the use of himself for life, remainder to the 121 Plaintiff in fee. The Defendant pleaded that he was seised in fee, absque hoc that he made a feoffment. The Jury found, that he made feoffment to his use for life without impeachment of waste, remainder to the Plaintiff; and Judgment for the Plaintiff, because the finding of the provision of the feoffment without impeachment of waste, was out of the issue. Ibid. Pl. 12; see too, Ibid. E. g. 4, Pl. 3, where in maintenance against two, the Plaintiff, in his replication, admitted that the maintenance was several. Held, that this abated his suit, though the finding of the Jury to the same effect would not.

It was argued, however, that if the Tenants were precluded from availing themselves of the fact, that one of the persons named as a Demandant was dead, before the emanation of the Writ in abatement, the fact that he was dead, leaving children and heirs entitled to one twentieth undivided part of the land, was admissible in bar of the action; because the remaining Demandants, exclusive of him who was dead, had not right to the whole of the land, as they demand it. They do not allege that they had; but that they, and the other named as a Demandant, had right to the whole; and this allegation is true. The plea in bar was an admission on the record, that he was alive and competent to sue; which could not afterwards be controverted by the Tenants, in any form. This was an estoppel, against which they could not make any allegation, nor the Jury find with any effect. When, therefore, it was proved, that a right to one-twentieth part of the land had devolved upon, or in any way been acquired by, Alexander Bullitt, although it was competent to the Tenants to show, that he had transferred to some other his right, by his own act, in bar of the demand asserted in his name, in this scit; they could not show in evidence, that his right had devolved by his death on his children, since they had admitted on the record, that he was alive and capable of suing. Although a Jury may find the truth upon an estoppel in pais, as by Deed, if it be not pleaded; 122 yet they cannot find "against an estoppel or admission in the same record in which the issue is joined," Goddard's Case, 2 Co. 4; nor in any subsequent suit between the same parties or their privies, can the Jury find against such an estoppel, whether it be by express admission, or by an omission to deny an allegation in the pleadings in the former suit, "nient dedire." Dicken v. Molland, Palm. 509; Sir H. Wallop's Case, Ibid. 19, cited 21 Vin. Abr. "Trial," R. f. Pl. 1, n; see also, Vin. Abr. same title, C. q. Pl. 29, 30, 31. And to prevent this estoppel in any subsequent suit, is the only purpose of a protestation in pleading, which admits the fact protested against, for all the purposes of the suit in which the protest is made. This case is therefore to be considered, as if Alexander Bullitt was alive, both at the emanation of the Writ, and the trial of the issue, notwithstanding the finding of the Jury to the contrary; and the objection made on this ground, does not exist.

The remaining objection founded on this finding is, that it appears upon the evidence necessarily offered by themselves, that the Demandants, who demand as jointly seised or entitled, were in fact Tenants in common seised severally of the undivided proportions of the land in question, to which they respectively had right; and that as Tenants in common cannot join in a Writ of Right, the Demandants have not more right to have as they demand, than the Tenants to hold as they hold, according to the terms of the mise; the Tenants having a perfect right to hold as they do, by virtue of their actual possession, against all who have not a right to have the land against them, as they demand it. This objection would have much plausibility, if this cause were to be decided upon the Common Law, independent of our Statute; according to which, the Demandants, when there were several, were obliged to allege a joint or entire and actual seisin in themselves, such as parceners and jointenants had. For, if they alleged a several seisin, they thereby abated their suit; or, they must allege an actual seisin in their common ancestor, and show 123 *that they were entitled to claim as his heirs. If they showed in their count, that any one of the Demandants claimed otherwise than as a parcener with the others, they would thereby also abate their suit. Being obliged to make such allegations, if upon the trial it appeared, upon their own evidence, that they were not true, and that some one of the Demandants was a Tenant in common with the others, it might be said, with some plausibility, that they failed in the proof that they were entitled to have the subject claimed, as they demanded it. Yet, no question upon a case of this sort has ever occurred in England, as far as I can discover, as it surely must have done, if evidence upon the trial of the mise, that one of the Demandants was a Tenant in common with the others, would have defeated the action, and entitled the Tenants to a final Judgment upon the right. For if so, it would have been extreme folly to plead several tenancy of the Demandants in abatement, which would have subjected the Tenant to new actions, founded on the same rights. Nor can I suppose it possible, that the Common Law could have permitted such a monstrous consequence, as that parties clearly entitled should lose their rights forever, in consequence of a misconception of the form of their action.

We are, I think, relieved from any difficulty on this question, by the terms of our Act of Assembly prescribing the form of the count in the Writ of Right. This alleges no seisin either joint or several by the Demandants or their ancestor; but, only that they have right to have the tenement in question; an allegation fully supported by proof, that the Demandants, in exclusion of all others, have a right to the whole of the tenement demanded, no matter in what proportions or by what title, whether as Jointtenants, Parceners, or Tenants in Common; the manner in which they were entitled not affecting the question of their mere right.

I do not mean to insinuate, that our Statute has altered the Writ of Right in any of its fundamental principles. It 124 *is still appropriate only to a claimant of an estate in fee simple, by the very terms of our Statute, and is a possessory action, founded on the actual or legal seisin of the Demandant or his ancestor only; as appears from our Statute of Limitations. These essential matters, although not alleged in the count, are necessarily to be given in evidence, or the Demandant must fail. The principles of the Common Law, also, requiring that Tenants in common shall sue severally and not jointly, and jointtenants, jointly and not severally, and parceners, in some cases jointly, and in some severally, and that jointtenants and parceners shall be sued jointly, and several tenants severally, are all in force. But these being matters of abatement, are only available by plea in abatement, and if not so pleaded, cannot be insisted on after the mise joined on the mere right, in any form whatever, since they do not affect the question of mere right.

The Judgment should be reversed, and final Judgment be given for the Demandants.

JUDGE CABELL, concurred, and the Judgment was reversed.*

Equitable Relief—Judgment at Law—What Must Be Shown.*—After a trial at Law, a Court of Equity

*THE PRESIDENT, and JUDGE CALTER, absent.
Equitable Relief—Judgment at Law—What Must Be Shown.—A party who had a defense at law, but failed to make it, and seeks relief in equity against a judgment, whether confessed or rendered on a will not grant a new trial, merely because injustice has been done; but, the party applying for the new trial, must show that he has done every thing that could be reasonably expected from him, to obtain relief at Law.

Bill of Discovery—When It Must Be Filed.—A Bill of Discovery, to obtain evidence which might have been useful in a trial at Law, must be filed pending the suit at Law, unless some sufficient excuse is shown, why it was not filed at that time.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court, where the Administratrix of Thomas Faulkner filed her bill against contest, should allege and prove facts that constitute a fraud perpetrated by the adverse party in procuring the judgment or preventing the defense; or facts that indicate that though the complainant used proper diligence, or such diligence would not have availed, he was, by accident, mistake or surprise, prevented from discovering important facts, or from adducing material evidence and making adequate defense. Morehead v. DeFord, 6 W. Va. 320, citing principal case. And in Knapp v. Snyder, 15 W. Va. 441, it is said: "It is well settled, that a court of chancery will not entertain a party seeking relief against a judgment which has been rendered against him in a court of law, in consequence of his default, upon grounds which might have been successfully taken in the court of law, unless some reason founded in fraud, accident, surprise, or some adventitious circumstance beyond the control of the party be shown why the defense at law was not made. This wise rule springs out of the positive necessity that there must be some period at which litigation shall cease. A court of equity will not grant relief merely because injustice has been done. The party seeking the relief must show that he has been guilty of no laches, but that he has done everything that could have been reasonably required of him under the circumstances of the case. But courts of equity have always granted relief in such cases when it is shown that the reason why the defense was not made at law, was founded in fraud, accident, surprise, or some adventitious circumstance beyond the control of the party. Mosby v. Haskins, 4 Hen. & M. 427; Degraffenreid v. Donald, 3 Hen. & M. 10; Herd v. Dishman, 5 Call 379; Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125; Mason v. Nelson, 11 Leigh 227; Holland v. Trotter, 23 Gratt. 139; Polindexter v. Waddy, 6 Munf. 418; Smith v. McLain, 11 W. Va. 655; Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 79, and cases cited."

To the same effect the principal case is cited in Norris v. Hume, 2 Leigh 338; foot-note to Donally v. Ginatt, 5 Leigh 359; Tapp v. Rankin, 9 Leigh 490; Slack v. Wood, 9 Gratt. 43; Green v. Massie, 21 Gratt. 359; Goolsby v. St. John, 25 Gratt. 153; Perkins v. Clements, 1 Pat. & H. 153; Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 89, 94; Graham v. Citizen's Nat. Bank, 45 W. Va. 705, 32 S. E. Rep. 247; Zinn v. Dawson, 47 W. Va. 45, 34 S. E. Rep. 786.

In Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 884, it is said: "It has been a favorite policy in this state, especially of late, not to afford relief in a court of equity to a party who has a plain remedy at law, except in cases of concurrent jurisdiction. In all other cases, he must avail himself of his legal remedy. If without his default, he be deprived of all remedy at law, equity may relieve him; but if any legal remedy remain to him, though he may have lost by his misfortune, and without the fault of his adversary, other concurrent legal remedies, he must resort to his remaining legal remedy. This policy is illustrated by the cases cited by the counsel for the appellee, especially Cabell v. Roberts, 6 Rand. 580; Collins v. Jones, 6 Leigh 530; Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125; Haden v. Garden, 7 Leigh 157; Allen v. Hamilton, 9 Gratt. 256, to which may be added Slack v. Wood, 9 Gratt. 40."

And in Smith v. McLain, 11 W. Va. 668, it is said: "In a bill brought to obtain relief in the nature of a new trial, the bill should allege, not only the discovery of new evidence, but also what that evidence is, that the court may see that it is material in its object and not merely cumulative, corroborative or collateral; and also that it is such that it ought to produce an opposite result on the merits. And the bill must do more than this: it must show that the evidence is such that reasonable diligence on the part of the defendant could not have secured it at the former trial. See Griffith v. Thompson, 4 Gratt. 147; Slack v. Wood, 9 Gratt. 40; Brown v. Speyers, 20 Gratt. 296; Floyd v. Jayne, 6 Johns Ch. 479; Hendrickson v. Hinkley, 17 How. 446; Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Leigh 137; Meem v. Rucker, 10 Gratt. 506; Waltou v. Hamilton, 9 Gratt. 256; George v. Strange, 10 Gratt. 499."

‡Bill of Discovery—When It Must Be Filed.—To the point that a bill of discovery to obtain evidence

John M. Harwood, to injoin a Judgment recovered by the Defendant against the Plaintiff. All the facts of the cause are sufficiently detailed in the opinions which follow.

Leigh, for the Appellant.
Johnson, for the Appellee.

February 11. JUDGE CARR.

Harwood having a claim to several slaves then in litigation, sold this claim to Royston, for 187l. 10s., for which sum Royston executed his bond to him. Royston sold his bargain to Faulkner; and Faulkner, by a contract with Harwood, gave him several notes or orders, &c. in exchange for Royston's bond. Among these, was the order of Mrs. Stepoe for $210 58 cents, which had been given to Gaines an Attorney, to sue on, and which was transferred to Harwood by an assignment on the receipt of Gaines. Faulkner afterwards contesting the right of Harwood to the money due on this order, received the amount of it himself, and having died, Harwood sued his Administratrix in assumpsit for the amount, and recovered Judgment.

126 *The bill was filed to injoin this Judgment, on the ground that Harwood sold, not his right and interest to the slaves merely, but such a share of the slaves themselves, and warranted that share: that this order was given in part satisfaction of that share: that the share has turned out to be nought, the suit having been decided against Harwood's title; and therefore, Harwood has no claim upon the order: that this would have been proved to the Jury on the trial at Law, if the exhibits B. and D. had been in the knowledge or power of the Plaintiff, at the time of trial; but, that these papers had been put by Faulkner into the hands of Hoomes, an Attorney, who died before the suit was tried; and that these documents had been but lately found among his papers. The bill asks an Injunction, but does not designate the further and final relief expected.

If the Court ought to interfere at all, I presume it must be to grant a new trial, as it is a matter wholly at Law. But, the first question is, as to the jurisdiction.

It is a fundamental principle in Equity, that if a party will suffer a Judgment to pass against him, through neglect, he cannot have relief in Equity, for a matter of which he might have availed himself at Law. Lee & ux. v. Boles, 1 Ch. Cas. 95; Williams v. Lee, 3 Atk. 233. In this last case, Lord Hardwicke lays it down, that it must appear that the Defendant was ignorant, at the time of trial, of the fact which renders the verdict contrary to Equity.

In Bateman v. Willoe, 1 Sch. & Lefr. 201, Lord Redesdale says, "The inattention of parties in a Court of Law, can scarcely be made the subject for interference in a Court of Equity. There may be cases cognizable at Law, and also in Equity, and of which might have been useful in a trial at law, must be filed pending the suit at law, unless some sufficient excuse is shown why it was not filed at that time, the principal case was cited in George v. Strange, 10 Gratt. 506; Hazeltine v. Brickey, 16 Gratt. 180; Green v. Massie, 21 Gratt. 860; Zoll v. Campbell, 8 W. Va. 227.

See further, monographic note on "Bills of Discovery" appended to Lyons v. Miller, 6 Gratt. 497.

which, cognizance cannot be effectually taken at Law, and therefore Equity does sometimes interfere; as in cases of complicated accounts, where the party has not made defence, because it was impossible for him to do it effectually at Law. So, where a verdict has been obtained by fraud, or where a party has possessed himself improperly of something, by means of which he has an "unconscientious advantage at Law, which Equity will either put out of the way or restrain him from using. But, without circumstances of that kind, I do not know that Equity ever does interfere to grant a new trial of a matter, which has already been discussed in a Court of Law, and over which the Court of Law had full jurisdiction." He adds, "A bill for a new trial, is watched by Equity with extreme jealousy. It must see that injustice has been done, not merely through the inattention of the parties; but some such reasons as those I have mentioned, must exist."

Cases might be multiplied beyond number, to show that this is the settled doctrine. This question has been often decided also in this Court; and though sometimes with a little more latitude than may seem to accord with the true practice, yet generally, and particularly in the later cases, in conformity with the decisions I have quoted. I would particularly refer to the case of Oswald, Denniston & Co. v. Tyler, 4 Rand. 19, where the subject is ably discussed and placed by the majority of the Court, on the true ground. That is not a binding authority, but it has my entire approbation; and I trust we shall not depart from the course there laid down. There is nothing more difficult than to keep this encroaching jurisdiction within due limits. When a case seems to address itself strongly to our justice, we are too apt to yield to the particular call, without considering its effect upon the general rule. Now, let us apply this rule to the facts in this case. Does it appear that the documents B. and D. were out of the knowledge and power of the Plaintiff at the trial at Law? She states, that they were found but lately among the papers of Hoomes, who died before the trial. The answer puts her on the proof of this, by the allegation, "that it was extremely improbable, that a defence at Law was prevented by any such cause," and that "a small degree of industry and attention would easily have removed all difficulties on that head." Surely after this, she ought to have proved the fact. It was said, that she was an 128 Administratrix, and "might well be supposed ignorant of the facts and papers necessary for her defence at law. This may be admitted; but surely, it does not dispense with some proof before us, to justify the setting aside a verdict and Judgment at Law. If the papers were placed in the possession of Hoomes, the person who found them after his death, might have given evidence of that fact. As it stands, there is certainly no such fact in the cause; no evidence that the papers were not perfectly within the power of the Administratrix. It will not be said, that her statement in the bill is evidence.

If so, the rule would be a nullity. Every one would state enough to give Equity jurisdiction. But here, the answer puts her on the proof. If it ought not to be produced in this case, it would be difficult to state one where it would be necessary. Though an Administratrix, as she has stated the fact in her bill, she might prove it, if the proof existed. The absence of such proof takes away all ground of jurisdiction.

But, another ground to support the jurisdiction is taken. It is said, that this is a Bill of Discovery; and that this is founded on that part of the bill, where the Plaintiff charges, that the consideration of the assignment of the order, was the price of the slaves sold by Harwood to Royston, and by him to Faulkner; which she was unable to prove in a Court of Law, and still may be unable to adduce positive evidence of it, without a discovery from the Defendant; and in the close of her bill, she calls upon him to answer as to this charge.

If there is any thing in authority, this position is wholly untenable. The objection to it rests on the same ground with that just discussed, that if a party suffers a Judgment to pass against him, through neglect, he will not get relief in Equity for a matter, of which, with due diligence, he might have availed himself at Law. Now, the Administratrix nowhere states, that she did not, before the trial, discover, that the assignment of the order, and the purchase of the slaves, were con-

129 nected. It is clear, indeed *from her bill, that she was aware of that fact, while the case was pending at Law: and the exhibit C. forming a part of the Law Record, shows that the fact was attempted to be used at the trial. If, then, her evidence to establish it was defective, she ought, at once, while the action was pending, to have filed her Bill of Discovery, to enable her to defend herself at Law. This is the settled practice. Speaking of a Bill of Discovery, Lord Redesdale says, Mitf. 52, "This bill is commonly used in aid of the jurisdiction of some other Court; as to enable the Plaintiff to prosecute or defend an action at Law," &c. And the bill must be filed as soon as the party discovers the necessity of appealing to the conscience of the adversary. Equity will not suffer him to spin out litigation, take the chance of a Jury, and failing there, file his bill for a discovery. Leicester v. Parry, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 305. A plea that a Writ of Right had been tried and determined against the Plaintiff, was held a good plea to a bill for discovery of matter relative to the title. See also Duncan v. Lyon, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 351; Ibid. 395; Thompson v. Berry, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 479, where the subject is very well treated.

In the case before us, then, it is a full and decisive answer to the Bill of Discovery, that it is after verdict, and no reason shown why an earlier application was not made. There is no hardship in this rule. It is only saying, that a party shall use ordinary diligence, shall seek a discovery as soon as he ascertains that he wants it. But, the contrary practice would be fraught with much mischief. Where the application is in due time, the effect is only a suspension of the proceeding at Law till the discovery is had; and then, the case proceeds to Judgment in the proper forum, and the facts are tried by a Jury. But, if you depart from the rule, you encourage negligence, protract litigation, harass and exhaust the parties, and draw within the jurisdiction of Equity, the general review of trials at Law. Upon both grounds, then, respecting jurisdiction, I am 130 *strongly opposed to the bill; and as jurisdiction precedes discretion, it would seem unnecessary to go further. But, as the question was much discussed, I will briefly state what would be my view of the contracts, if the exhibits B. and D. are considered in connection with exhibit C.

B. is the first contract, made 10th of January, 1811. It is drawn very obscurely. The commencement looks like a mortgage; but, the latter part shows distinctly, that it was a sale; whether of the interest, or the share of Harwood, is by no means clear. There are expressions which look each way. But, as I deem this point very immaterial, I shall not further consider it.

Take it that it was a sale of the share; it will be denied by nobody, that parties may modify or abrogate their contracts; and that a subsequent agreement about the same subject, does change the former, so far as it differs from it. In other words, that the last is the agreement, and the only agreement. On the 4th of March, 1811, not two months after the first contract, the parties made a second so clearly expressed, that it seems to me beyond the reach of doubt. By it, Harwood sells to Royston all his right, title, claim, and interest, to seven negroes, (who are named) and stated that he claimed under the Wills of his father and a Mr. Orrell; which right, title, claim, and interest, he goes on to warrant. Now, if there can be a contract so drawn as to express a sale of the right and interest of the party to a subject, without a sale of the subject itself, it seems to me, that this contract is so expressed; and this, I thought, was acknowledged in the argument, but for the warranty. It was asked however, "how will you reconcile the warranty, to a sale of the interest only." I reply, the clause of warranty can never be resorted to, to ascertain the thing or the interest sold. That is by no means its function. These must be gathered from the premises, the words expressing what is bought and sold. These govern the warranty; for, a man never warrants more than he has sold.

When, then, it is expressly stated, 131 that Harwood sells his "right, title and interest, how could he warrant more? But, the warranty is as express as the sale. He warrants his right, title and interest. If you ask me, to what such a warranty amounts? I answer, to very little that I can see; certainly (I think) to no more than this, that he has done nothing, and will do nothing, to affect his right, title and interest, such as existed under the Wills. It seems to me still more strange, to resort, for explanation of this contract, to the former one; especially when this has no reference at all to that. It often happens, that parties, by a subsequent writing, explain a former contract. This is the natural flow of the stream. But to resort to a former contract, and by it, to change the clear meaning of a later one, would be to turn the current back upon its source. That Royston understood the contract as a sale of Harwood's interest only, is further evidenced by his endorsement on exhibit C. With respect to the slave Daniel, who is stated by the contract to be in Ball's possession, he says in October, 1811, "I have this day conveyed to George Ball, and to him relinquished all my interest in said slave," &c. Here we see a conveyance of his interest only. Then his assignment to Faulkner, "I do hereby assign all my right, title and interest in and to the within mentioned slaves, to Thomas Faulkner and his heirs," &c. Now, it would hardly be contended, that Faulkner could have recourse to Royston, in case the claim turned out bad; and yet Royston meant (no doubt) to sell as he bought, to sell his bargain. If Faulkner could have no recourse to Royston, it would seem strange to say he could have an Equity against Harwood, to stop the money on the order he had assigned him, when this assignment took place, not in a trade about the slaves at all, but in the purchase of the bond of Royston to Harwood. This fact is stated in the answer, and proved by two witnesses, Thrift and Newcomb; who further say, that Faulkner told them he had bought of Royston, Harwood's claim or right in the slaves.

132 "But it is said, that exhibit D. shows the meaning of the parties in these contracts. This bears date November, 1811, after the contract by which Faulkner had gotten of Harwood, Royston's bond, in exchange for various orders, &c. "I do hereby relinquish all my right, title and interest, in certain negroes conveyed and sold by me to C. Royston, who sold and conveyed the same to Thomas Faulkner. I sold to Royston my right to only one half that property," &c. stating, that he after discovered that he had a right to two thirds, and had that day received satisfaction of Faulkner for the two thirds. This paper was intended, it seems to me, merely to sell the additional claim, and acknowledge satisfaction; and not, in the slightest degree, to change the nature of the former contract. Where it refers to that contract, it is mere recital; "negroes conveyed and sold by me to Royston, who sold and conveyed to Faulkner." But, how sold and conveyed? Why, as by the contract is declared. But we see, that when he relinquishes, it is still his right, title and interest; and when he speaks of his sale to Royston, he says, "I sold my right to one-half;" always clearly evincing, that it was his claim, his right, his interest, whatever that might be, that he meant to sell. All this, it seems to me, would be the natural course of such a trade. All the parties knew, that the slaves were in litigation. They were, of necessity, a subject for speculation. They might be something or nothing, as the suit should eventuate. Any one who wished to speculate, would enquire into the title, and regulate his bids accordingly. In all such cases, the party weighs the chance of gain, against the hazard of loss. He makes his bargain with his eyes open, and he has no shadow of Equity to be relieved from loss, when it falls on him.

My opinion, therefore, clearly is, that 1st, the party has no right to be heard in Equity, and it is on this ground distinctly, that I choose to place my opinion; 133 but 2ndly, *if the party were received, I think he shows no case for relief; and therefore, that the Decree of the Chancellor be affirmed.

JUDGE COALTER.

I would have been strongly inclined to grant relief in this case, had the Appellant proved the two important matters stated in her bill, to wit: the discovery of the papers amongst those of Hoomes, after the trial, and the failure of the consideration of the assignments on which the suit at Law was founded. The answer, by doubting the truth of the first, and stating that it was extremely improbable, put the Appellant on the proof of it, which she has failed to adduce. The bill does not state, in what manner the consideration failed; whether because the Appellee never had any just claim to the slaves, and that so the suit was decided against him; or, because he had sold them previous to the sale under which the Appellant's intestate claimed them.

The Appellee admits, that the suit was decided against his title; but says, that an appeal was taken, which was dismissed for want of prosecution; which, being the fault of the Appellant's intestate, for whose benefit it was taken, he ought not to be responsible; and he examines a witness to prove his title to them, as the dower slaves of his father's widow. The record of the suit concerning these slaves, is not before us; nor is it even stated, what has become of it, except in the answer as aforesaid. It is not material, therefore, what my opinion might be, as to the true meaning of the contract of sale, inasmuch as, for these reasons, I am obliged to affirm the Decree of the Chancellor.

The PRESIDENT.

After a trial at Law, new trials should not be granted by a Court of Equity, merely because injustice may have 134 *been done at Law. A party, to entitle himself to a new trial, must show that he has been guilty of no laches: that he has done every thing that could be reasonably required of him, to obtain relief at Law. Without such excuse, which is to be judged of according to the circumstances of the case, he cannot get relief in a Court of Equity. It does not appear, that the documents B. and D. were out of the power of the Defendant, at the time of the trial of the suit at Law; and being put on the truth of that fact by the answer, some evidence of a matter so susceptible of proof ought to have been adduced, to entitle him to relief in Equity. Indeed, it is not probable, that as the document C. which belonged to the same transaction, was before the Jury, the documents B. and D. were not also in the power of the Plaintiff in Equity, if due diligence had been used to procure them.

As to the other ground of relief, a discovery from the Defendant, if at all expected by the Plaintiff, it was more necessary in the absence of the documents B. and D., which are all now in the record, than since the trial at Law; and although I would not, in every case, limit the right of a party to a Bill of Discovery, to the pendency of the suit at Law, I think, in this case, there has been evident negligence in the Plaintiff, in not filing her bill, pending the suit at Law, if any discovery was expected from the answer of the Defendant.

In addition to this, I see nothing in the answer, which ought to change the verdict of the Jury. On neither ground, do I think that there is any error in the Decree, and I am therefore for affirming it.

Decree affirmed.*

135 *Durham and Wife v. Dunkly.

February, 1828.

Gift of Personality—Retention by Donor—Effect.—A slave is given to an infant, by Deed, with a reservation expressed in the Deed, that the donor is to keep the slave and raise it for the donee, until she arrives at the age of thirteen. The slave is delivered to the donee on the day of the execution of the Deed, and on the same day, taken back by the donor. The Deed is never recorded, and the donee never lived with the donor. This gift is void under the Act of Assembly, 1 Rev. Code, 432, sec. 51.

Same—How Evidenced.—A gift of slaves can only be evidenced by Deed or Will duly proved and recorded or by possession passing from the donor to the donee, and remaining with him, or one claiming under him.

Same—Same—Nature of Possession.—The possession here meant, is an actual, abiding, permanent possession.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Halifax County.

Micajah Durham and Nancy his wife, brought an action of detinue against Moses Dunkly, for a slave named Jenny. The whole case is so fully unfolded in the following opinion, that it is unnecessary to give it here.

Leigh, for the Appellant.
Johnson, for the Appellee.

February 16. JUDGE CARR.

This is an action of detinue. The facts are these: On the 4th of January, 1804, the Defendant Dunkly executed a Deed of Gift, conveying Jenny, a slave, to the female Plaintiff, then an infant of tender years. The Deed has this clause: "I have delivered the above named negro to the said N. W. Sawyers, which I am to keep the said negro, and raise it for the above named N. W. Sawyers, until the said Nancy is thirteen years old." There were two subscribing witnesses to the Deed; by one of whom it was proved in the County Court of Halifax in June, 1804; but, no further proof being made, it was never recorded.

The execution of the Deed was proved 136 at the trial by a subscribing witness.

Before the execution of the Deed, but on the same day, the slave was delivered to N. W. Sawyers; and immediately after the Deed was executed, she was taken back into the possession of the Defendant, upon the terms mentioned in the Deed; the said slave and the said Nancy being both at that time under one year old. The Defendant had (excepting the aforesaid delivery and taking back) remained in possession of the slave, from her birth; nor had the donee ever lived with him. On this state of facts, the Court (on the motion of the Defendant) instructed the Jury, "that the said Deed did not pass such an estate, as to enable the Plaintiffs to recover in this action: that to make the gift of a slave valid, such gift must be evidenced by Will or Deed, proved by two witnesses, or acknowledged and recorded within eight months, or the slave must be delivered to, and remain in, the possession of, the donee, or some third person claiming under such donee, so that the possession of the donor must be entirely broken up." Upon this instruction, the Jury found a verdict for the Defendant; and this Court awarded a Supersedeas. We are to enquire whether the instruction of the Court be correct. That question depends on the construction given to the 51st section of our Act concerning slaves, &c., 1 Rev. Code, 432: "No gift of any slave shall be good, or sufficient to pass any estate in such slave, &c. unless the same be made by a Will duly proved and recorded, or by Deed in writing, to be proved by two witnesses at the least, or acknowledged by the donor, and recorded according to Law. This section shall be construed to extend only to gifts of slaves, whereof the donors have, notwithstanding such gifts, remained in the possession, and not to gifts of such slaves, as have at any time come into the actual possession of, and have remained with, the donee, or some person claiming under such donee."

It was contended for the Plaintiffs, that this was a gift in futuro; and that to such gifts, the Act does not apply.

137 *The Deed says, however, that "I, Moses Dunkly, for the consideration of love, &c., have given and granted, and by these presents do freely give and grant, unto Nancy Sawyers and her lawful heirs, &c., one negro girl named Jenny," &c. These seem clearly to me, to be the words of a present, and not of a future gift; and if this Deed had been proved, or acknowledged, and recorded according to Law, there would have been an end of the question. No future act of Dunkly could have affected the title of the female Plaintiff. The Deed adds, "I am to keep the said negro and raise it for the said Nancy, till she is thirteen." But, these words relate to the possession merely, and do not postpone the vesting of the right. This, then, being a gift in presenti, it is not material to consider whether a gift in futuro be within the operation of the Act.

Gift of Personality.—In Virginia for more than a hundred years there have been statutes prescribing what is necessary to make a valid gift of slaves. Dickeschied v. Bank, 28 W. Va. 367, citing the principal case.

On the subject of gifts of personality, the principal case is also cited in Hansbrough v. Thom, 3 Leigh 160; Slaughter v. Tutt, 12 Leigh 159; Thomas v. Lewis, 89 Va. 66, 15 S. E. Rep. 389.

See further, monographic note on "Gifts" appended to Barker v. Barker, 2 Gratt. 344.

It was contended, in the second place, that taking this as a gift in præsent, still it was good, because the possession of the slave being delivered to the donee, and resumed by the donor, for the purposes, and upon the terms, of the Deed, the subsequent possession of the donor was the possession of one claiming under the donee; and so, that the Act was substantially complied with, which requires, that the slave, "shall have come into the actual possession of, and have remained with, the donee, or some person claiming under such donee."

I confess that my first impressions were strongly in favor of this conclusion; but, subsequent reflection and investigation have compelled me to change them. There are but two classes of gifts of slaves which the Law tolerates. 1. A gift evidenced by Will or Deed, properly proved and recorded. 2. A gift evidenced by possession passing from the donor to the donee, and remaining with him, or one claiming under him. To place this matter in the clearest light, we must look back to the old Laws on this subject. The Act of 1757, 7 Hen. Stat. at Large, 118, entitled "An Act for preventing fraudulent gifts of slaves," after stating in the Preamble, "Whereas many 138 *frauds have been committed, by means of secret gifts made of slaves, by parents and others, whereby creditors and purchasers have been frequently involved in expensive Law suits, and often deprived of their just debts and purchases," enacts, that no gift of slaves shall pass any estate, unless by Will or Deed, duly recorded.

In 1758, 7 Hen. Stat. at Large, 237, there is a Law with exactly the same title, and with enactments almost exactly like the last. The only material difference respects the continued possession of the donor. Thus, "whereas many frauds have been committed by means of secret gifts, made, or pretended to have been made, by parents and others, (who have notwithstanding remained in possession of such slaves, as visible owners thereof,) whereby creditors," &c. just as in the former. Here, we see what was meant by possession remaining with the donor.

These Acts remained in force unaltered, till October, 1787, 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, 505, when an Act passed to "explain and amend the Acts for preventing fraudulent gifts of slaves." The Preamble is uncommonly long and particular in its recitals. It first recites substantially the whole of the Acts of 1757-8; and then states, that "whereas, in the general construction of these Acts, it has been understood, that they were not intended to interfere between donor and donee, further than to prevent deceptions and frauds, and that the enacting parts of the said Acts extended only to secret gifts of slaves, and whereof the donor retained possession; and not to gifts where the possession had been in the donee; and many parents and others have, since the said recited Acts, made gifts of slaves to their children and others, without Deed in writing, and such donees have continued in possession of the slaves so given, under a delivery at the time of making, or after such gifts, by which the donees have been considered as the owners of such slaves, and have obtained credit thereby; and whereas, from a late adjudication, in a question arising on the said recited Acts, it was determined that 139 all *gifts of slaves, since the said Acts, are void, unless made in writing, or confirmed by Will, as in the said Act is directed; which late adjudication, by disquieting and disturbing possessions, will tend to produce infinite disputes and litigation, and contrary to the intent of the donors, to deprive children of the provisions made for them by their deceased parents, injure husbands who have married women, possessed of slaves under such gifts, defraud creditors and purchasers under such donees, and multiply the mischiefs the said Acts were intended to remedy; for prevention whereof, Be It Enacted, that the said recited Acts for preventing fraudulent gifts of slaves, shall, from and after the passing of this Act, be construed to extend only to gifts of slaves, whereof the donors have, notwithstanding such gifts, remained in possession; and not to gifts of such slaves, as have at any time come into the actual possession of, and remained with, the donee, or some person claiming under such donee."

I have quoted the Preamble and enacting clause of this Act, thus specially, because they seem to me to show more clearly than any argument, what the Legislature meant. 1. We have stated the mischief intended to be remedied. "Gifts, made or pretended, of slaves, by parents, &c. who have, notwithstanding, remained in possession of such slaves, as visible owners." To remedy this evil the Acts of 1757-8 were passed. When the Courts came to act upon these Laws, they pronounced all gifts of slaves void, unless by Deed or Will, although possession had been delivered at the time of the gift, and remained ever after with the donee. The Preamble declares, this construction wrong: that the Laws only intended to avoid gifts of slaves, where there was no Deed or Will, and the donor had retained possession; and did not extend to gifts, where the possession had been in the donee. The Preamble then points out the mischiefs which the adjudication tended to produce; and every case it puts, shows that the possession of the donee was meant to be an actual, 140 abiding, permanent *possession; one wholly incompatible with a continuing possession of the donor. This, then, is my conclusion. A gift of slaves may be by Will or Deed, properly proved and recorded. In this case, no matter where the possession is, the solemnity of the instrument, and the record, give notice to the World. A gift of slaves may also be without Will or Deed. But then there must be something to give fair notice to the World, of the change of ownership: and for this, nothing less will answer than that possession (the indicium of title) shall pass from the donor to the donee, and remain with the donee, or some person claiming under him.

Does the gift before us, belong to either of those classes? It is by Deed properly executed and attested, but never recorded; and the Act declares, that no gift of a slave shall pass any estate in such slave, unless by Will or Deed in writing, to be proved by two witnesses at least, or acknowledged and recorded, according to Law. This gift, then, by Deed never recorded, passes no estate in the slave. The Deed at least is wholly inoperative; and, if the gift be valid, it must be on the only other ground known to the Law; possession.

On the day of executing the Deed, the donor delivered to the donee (not then one year old) the slave Jenny; and upon the execution of the Deed, immediately resumed possession, to hold for the donee; and has held the slave ever since. Is this such an actual and abiding possession in the donee, or one claiming under her, as will satisfy the Law? I am obliged to say, that I think not. The very mischief which the law intended to prevent, was "the donor's remaining in possession of the slave as the visible owner," notwithstanding the gift. Is not this case within that mischief? A man, at his own house, makes a mere formal delivery of the slave, for a moment, to an infant of a few months old; then resumes it, and holds it ever after.

But, it is said, he resumes and holds it for the child; and that his possession is hers. What is the evidence of this?

141 *A witness proves it, and the sealed paper declares it. But, is this the evidence required by the Law, to give notice to the World, that though the possession remains with the donor, its character is changed? No! Such evidence can only be furnished by a Deed, to be proved by two witnesses at least, or acknowledged by the donor, and recorded according to Law.

It was said in the argument, suppose, when a gift of a slave is made to an infant, possession is delivered by the donor, to a third person, (the father, for instance,) to hold for the infant; will not this be a valid gift? I answer, yes, undoubtedly; for, in such case, the reason and policy of the Law are satisfied. The possession of the donor is broke up. He is no longer the visible owner; no longer retains that indicium of title, calculated to deceive the World: the possession passes substantially to the donee, and remains with the father as a trustee for him. The object of this Act being to prevent fraudulent gifts of slaves, and thereby to protect creditors and purchasers, it would seem reasonable to have placed unrecorded Deeds of gift of slaves, on the same ground, on which the Statute of Frauds places those Deeds which it declares fraudulent and void, as to creditors and purchasers; but which it still pronounces valid between the parties. This, however, was matter of Legislative discretion. The Law is not so written; for, it declares that the Deed shall pass no estate in slaves, unless executed and recorded according to Law.

I think the instruction of the Court was right, and that the Judgment must be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the Judgment was affirmed.*

*Arthur v. Chavis.

February, 1822.

Chancery Practice—Judgment—New Trial—Newly-Discovered Evidence.—After a verdict and Judgment at Law, Equity will not grant a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, unless the applicant has used proper diligence to procure such evidence before the trial at Law, or the case is involved in great doubt and obscurity.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Lynchburg. The case is fully reported in the opinions of the Judges.

Stanard, for the Appellant.

Johnson, for the Appellee.

February 19. JUDGE CARR.

In January, 1821, Milly Chavis exhibited her petition to the County Court of Pittsylvania, praying to be permitted to sue Jas. Arthur for her freedom, and stated the facts of her case. The Court proceeded in the regular way to grant the petition. The case progressed; and after two continuances, came on for trial at the March Term, 1822. Both parties seem to have considered themselves ready, and to have gone willingly to trial; as the record discloses no motion for a continuance. The Jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff, on which the Court rendered Judgment. (The Chancellor states in his opinion, that a motion for a new trial was made to the Law Court, and overruled; but, the Law record attached to the copy of the Chancery record in my possession, shows no such motion. It may, however, have been omitted, as I see that the Declaration itself is left out. It is clear, that there was no motion made, or that it was overruled.) The Defendant at Law then offered to the Chancellor a bill for an Injunction and a new trial, on the allegation of additional evidence discovered since the trial. The Chancellor refused the Injunction, and that refusal was 143 approved by a Judge *of this Court.

A second bill was offered to the Chancellor, alleging a further discovery of new evidence. It was refused, and the refusal acquiesced in. A third bill was offered, refused by the Chancellor, and granted by a Judge of this Court. The Defendant answered. A vast volume of evidence was taken, and on hearing, the Injunction was dissolved, and the bill dismissed; from which Decree, the appeal is taken.

The ground on which the pauper claimed her freedom, was, that she was the daughter of one Winny Chavis, a free woman; that between forty and fifty years before,

+New Trial—After-Discovered Evidence.—In Zickfoose v. Kuykendall, 12 W. Va. 39, it is said: "It is admitted that after-discovered evidence, to afford a proper ground to awarding a new trial, whether the application be made to a common-law court, or to a court of equity, must (1st) have been discovered since the former trial; (2d) be such as reasonable diligence on the part of the party seeking the new trial could not have secured at a former trial; (3d) be material in its object and not merely cumulative, corroborative or collateral; (4th) must be such as ought to produce an opposite result on the merits. Read's Case, 22 Gratt. 946; *Adams v. Equitable Relief—Judgment.—On this subject, see foot-note to Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125. The principal case is cited on the subject in Tapp v. Rankin, 9 Leigh 480; Slack v. Wood, 9 Gratt. 43.

when she was a girl of six or seven years old, living with her mother in Brunswick County, she was stolen from her, carried to Pittsylvania by one Davis, and sold by him to Bennett, who gave her to Arthur, his son-in-law. She is claimed by Arthur as a slave, born in Goochland County, the property of Humphrey Parish, who bequeathed her to his son Moses, who sold her when a girl of three or four years old to Davis, who sold her shortly after to Bennet, who gave her to Arthur. This is the chain of title on each side.

There seems no doubt, that there was a girl name Milly kidnapped from her mother Winny Chavis, and never after recovered by her. It is also pretty strongly proved, that there was a girl named Milly sold by Moses Parish to Davis, and also that Davis sold a girl of that name to Bennet. It was, therefore, a question of identity. As grounds for a new trial, the bill states, that since the trial and the adjournment of the Law Court, the Plaintiff has discovered evidence to prove, that Polly M'Kinney, the principal witness of the Defendant, is unworthy of credit; also to prove the manner in which the Defendant received a scar on her thigh, which at the trial was relied on strongly, as identifying her with the stolen child: that he has also, since the trial, discovered the Will of Humphrey Parish, bequeathing to his son Moses a girl named Milly; the inventory of Humphrey Parish's estate, in which Milly is named; a Bill of Sale from Moses Parish to Davis; and the widow of Moses, who gives evidence to the fact of her husband's owning such a girl, and selling her to Davis. The bill does not give us any information as to the time or manner, how and when all these discoveries were made.

The answer contests every inch of ground; puts the Plaintiff on the proof of his whole case; insists that from the nature of the case and the evidence, much of it must, and all of it might, with ordinary diligence, have been known to him before the trial at Law; and that the allegation of these after-discoveries, ought not to be received by the Court, as no particulars of time, place, or manner, are stated, so as to put it in the power of the Defendant to disprove them.

In ancient times, when the Courts of Law were strict and technical, and narrow in their proceedings, and new trials rarely granted by them, Courts of Equity were in the habit of exercising jurisdiction over trials at Law, and compelling the successful party to submit to a new trial, or be perpetually enjoined from proceeding on his verdict. But, even then, they never interfered, unless a clear case of fraud or injustice were made out, or upon newly discovered evidence, which could not, with due diligence, have been used at the trial. As the Law Courts have become more liberal in granting new trials, Equity has, very properly, receded from the jurisdiction. I will not quote cases on this subject. The English Books are full of them; and our own Court has often acknowledged their correctness. There is one Authority to which I will refer; it is the case of Bateman v. Willoe, 1 Sch. & Lefr. 201. Lord Redesdale, after laying it down as settled Law, that the inattention of parties in a Court of Law, cannot be made a ground for the interference of a Court of Equity, and that unless where a verdict has been obtained by fraud, or a party has possessed himself improperly of something, by means of which he has an unconscientious advantage at Law, Equity does not interfere, adds, "But, without circumstances of that kind, I do not know that Equity ever does interfere to grant a new trial of a matter, which has already been discussed in a Court of Law, a matter capable of being discussed there, and over which the Court of Law had full jurisdiction. A bill for a new trial at Law, is watched by Equity with extreme jealousy. It must see that injustice has been done, not merely through the inattention of the parties, but some such reasons as those I have mentioned, must exist." Let us apply these principles to the case before us.

The first defect in the Plaintiff's case which strikes me, is, that he states not one fact or circumstance, as to the means by which, or the manner in which, he came to the knowledge of the new evidence; nor does this vast mass of testimony contain one atom of evidence on this subject. The cases all state, that, "it must appear to the Court;" that "the Court must see," &c. that the evidence has been discovered since the trial, and could not have been produced at it. Appear, how? How must the Court see it? By the bare statement of the Plaintiff, unsupported by proof, though it is called for in the answer? Surely no! It must appear by evidence. The Court must see it by the proofs. If you hold the Plaintiff to state in his bill, how and when he came at the new evidence, and to support his statement by proof, you enable the Defendant to meet this proof; you give him something tangible, something that he can grapple with. But, leave it on the general statement, that the evidence has been discovered since the trial, without specification, without proof; and you not only relieve the Plaintiff from the burthen of proof, but put him beyond the power of disproof. Where is the hardship of requiring him to state and to prove the means by which he acquired the new evidence? They must be within his knowledge, and susceptible of proof. Upon this general ground, then, I think the Plaintiff's case wholly defective. *But, I will go further, and show (I think) from the nature of the new evidence, either that it must, or that with ordinary diligence that it might, have been known before the trial.

The first ground for a new trial, is, to enable the Plaintiff to impeach the credit of Polly M'Kinney. In the first place, it is a settled rule, that a new trial will not be granted to enable a party to impeach the credit of a witness, examined at a former trial. Huish v. Sheldon, Sayer 27; Ford v. Tilly, 2 Salk. 653; Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. 256; Duryee v. Deulson, 5 Johns. 249. But, passing that by, let us see whether, with due diligence, all the evidence since adduced to impeach the credit of Polly M'Kinney, might not have been had at the trial. Although the affidavits accompanying the petition of the pauper do not appear, it is most probable, that Polly M'Kinney's was one of them; because the petition, referring to the evidence, relies on the scar, as one of the grounds to establish the pauper's freedom; and Polly M'Kinney is the only witness who proves that the stolen child had such a scar. But, if this were not so, Polly M'Kinney's deposition was taken in March, 1821, only two months after the suit brought, and twelve months before the trial. From the first it was known, that Polly M'Kinney was an important witness. She had always lived in Brunswick, had moved in a low and narrow sphere; her first deposition was taken in Brunswick, in the presence of an Agent of Arthur. All the evidence to impeach her (and this evidence could only consist of general reputation as to her credibility, not particular facts) must of course be looked for in her neighbourhood; and it cannot be conceived, that, with tolerable diligence, the Plaintiff could not have examined every witness, who knew any thing about her, before the trial. The answer, indeed, states that her character was assailed by evidence before the Jury; and this allegation is responsive to the bill.

147 *The next allegation is, that he has, since the trial, discovered evidence of the cause of the scar, shewing that it was received while Milly was in the service of Bennett, and after she was a woman. The principal witness as to this, is Sally Wallace. She lived within a mile or so of the Plaintiff. Two or three others of the County are also examined, who speak of seeing her lame, of seeing blood, of hearing it said that Milly had fallen into a potatoe hole and hurt her thigh; and Bennett, the father-in-law of Arthur, and former owner of Milly, is one of them. Now, is it conceivable, that this evidence should not have been known (if true) before the trial? What was there in the trial itself, to open these new floods of light upon the Plaintiff? It was known from the first, that the scar being on the kidnapped child, and on Milly, was relied on as a strong proof of identity. It must have been, (and the answer says, was) the subject of much conversation in the neighbourhood; among the parties especially, it must have been frequently talked of. How can we imagine, that Arthur and his father-in-law did not canvass the matter, and that the latter did not tell of the fall and wound which Milly had received while in his service. With me the conclusion is strong, either that Bennett told Arthur of this before the trial, or that it is all a fabrication, and made up since; and this, by the way, is one of the strong objections to granting these new trials for after discovered evidence, especially when that evidence does not consist of written documents, but of vive voce testimony. On a trial at Law, all the strength and the weakness of the case is disclosed. To suffer the loser, after this, to hunt up evidence, and get a new trial, on the bare statement that he did not know of it before, would be to hold out a strong and dangerous temptation to subornation of perjury; and the mischief of such a practice could not be more strongly exemplified than in the present case. The party went freely to trial. As soon as the Judgment went against him, he, by various agents, scours the Country, and the adjoining States of Tennessee *and Kentucky; and a first, a second, and a third bill is filed for a new trial; each successive attempt fortified by additional evidence, as the stock on hand was found insufficient; and the result is such as might have been expected. For, no one can look into this record, without sickening at the mass of pollution which it presents. With respect now to the documents, which are supposed to show that Milly was a slave, and came from Goochland; could not the Plaintiff, with reasonable diligence, have discovered this evidence before the trial? From the moment the claim to freedom was set up, his mind must have been turned to tracing the title of those under whom he held the pauper. It is acknowledged on the record, that before the trial at Law, the Plaintiff had the depositions of the Parishes of Goochland, stating, that on the division of their father's estate, a small mulatto girl, named Milly, was allotted to their brother Moses, and that he told them he had sold her to one Davis, of Pittsylvania. This proves, that the Plaintiff knew where to look for evidence. Nothing was more natural than for him to look in the Clerk's Office of Goochland for the Will and Inventory of H. Parrish, if he thought them material; though I cannot see that they were, as the facts of which they speak, were equally proved by the Parishes. Are we not bound, also, in reason, to conclude that when the Parishes gave evidence of the possession by their brother of the girl, and his sale of her to Davis, they would also tell the Plaintiff that Moses had removed to Kentucky, and that his widow still lived there. We see that soon after the trial he sent to Kentucky, and took her evidence. There was nothing in the fact of the trial to give him this information; though that fact might quicken his diligence. Several witnesses, too, state, that before the trial, they heard the Plaintiff speak of getting the evidence of Mrs. Parish of Kentucky. I rely, however, much more on the circumstances, to show, that with diligence, her evidence might have been had, than on their testimony; for, their credit is strongly impeached.

149 *The only remaining evidence, on which the new trial is asked, is, the Bill of Sale from Parish to Davis. It is equally clear to me, that this also might have been had at the trial, with proper diligence. It was known from the first, that Bennett got Milly from John Davis. The Bill of Sale from Davis to Bennett (in possession of the Plaintiff) showed that fact. Davis had lived in Pittsylvania. It is well known in that County, that about twenty-one or twenty-two years before, he had removed to East Tennessee, Green County, and settled on Lick Creek, near Jonesborough. This is proved by Kirby. Parker and Walker also prove his removal to Tennessee. These witnesses are examined by the Plaintiff. Why, then, could not the Plaintiff, as well before as after the trial, have sent to Tennessee? Ought he not, in common prudence, to have made enquiry concerning this link in his chain of title, and must he not naturally have gone to make enquiry, to the neighborhood from which Davis had moved?

I have thus gone through the grounds stated for a new trial. I have shown (I think) that they ought not to be considered, because they are so defectively stated, as to disable the Defendant from meeting and disproving them; but if considered, that they are utterly insufficient to support the motion for a new trial.

I ought, perhaps, to have noticed a fact, which, though not stated in the bill as a cause for a new trial, the Plaintiff or his Agents seem to have been at great pains to prove; that is, that the Plaintiff is a man of very weak mind, incapable of attending to business, and that by interrogation he may be made to say almost any thing. If this be so, how is it that we have before us three long bills, stating, in the person of the Plaintiff, with great minuteness of detail, a variety of complicated facts, and sworn to by him? No man can examine these bills, without coming to one of two conclusions; either that the Plaintiff is not the man this evidence would make him, or that there has been foul play in this business. But, if the Plaintiff was weak, 150 it would *furnish no ground for a new trial. He had sons, we see, who acted for him. He had other agents also. In addition to this, it seems, that the children of Milly were owned by several persons; and every owner would of course feel an interest, and take a part in the matter. Surely, all this array must be considered fully equal to bringing out all the Plaintiff's evidence at the trial, and more than a match for the pauper, a woman of colour, who had been held from her childhood in slavery; and who had to take the burthen of proof, and establish her claim to freedom. Let no one take alarm at this remark, as if I were placing the question of freedom on different grounds from any question of property. I mean no such thing. But surely, it ought to stand on equal ground. When the imbecility of the master, who claims property, is urged as a cause of new trial, the imbecility of the pauper, who is claiming freedom, should also be considered, especially as every application for a new trial is to the sound discretion of the Court.

The case of Swinerton v. The Marquis of Stafford, 3 Taunt. 91. was cited in the argument, to show that a Court will sometimes grant a new trial, although conflicting evidence has been submitted to the Jury, and they do not think the verdict wrong. It must surely be admitted, that this is in direct opposition to the general rule. That rule, as drawn from the latest cases, especially the case of Cairstairs v. Steene, 4 Mau. & Selw. 192, is thus clearly laid down by Starke on Evidence, vol. 1, p. 437: "The Courts do not interfere for the purpose of granting new trials, but in order to remedy some manifest abuse, or to correct some manifest error in Law or fact. Where there is a contrariety of evidence, the Court will not grant a new trial, unless it clearly appear that the Jury have drawn an erroneous conclusion, even although there are circumstances in the case, pregnant with suspicion, and which lead to a contrary conclusion; or, although the verdict be contrary to the opinion

151 and direction of the Judge who *tried the cause;" that is, his opinion upon the weight of evidence. This is unquestionably the general rule. If, then, the case in Taunton be good Law, it must be because the special circumstances of that case make it an exception; and this is the ground, on which the Court who decided it, seem careful to place it; and every case which leans on that as Authority, must bring itself clearly within it; as these exceptions to general rules are taken strictly, particularly where latitude would trench seriously upon the province of a Jury. The case from Taunton was an issue under an Inclosure Act, to try whether the Defendant, who was seised in fee of a tenement in the occupation of a Tenant named Knight, had a right of common in respect of that tenement, over Mothersall Common, the waste directed to be inclosed. It was a question, which carries the parties back into remote antiquity. The trial was in 1810. An old grant to the priority of Stone, brought from the Cottonian M. S. was offered in evidence; also another grant made to the same priority in 1342. There was much conflicting parol testimony also, on both sides, as to the question whether the Tenants had been accustomed to turn out their cattle on the locus in quo, or on one of the two adjoining commons; the three commons being of great extent, running for miles, all uninclosed, and cattle passing from one to another. There were only seven months from the decision of the commissioners, to the trial of the issue. Under these circumstances, the Court decided, that where there has been but a short time for investigating a question of real property, of a doubtful and obscure nature, and of great value, although conflicting evidence has been left to the Jury, and the Court does not think their verdict wrong; yet, if the inheritance is to be bound forever by the verdict, the Court will grant a new trial, on payment of costs. This is the abstract of the Reporter. Now, I ask, is our case within this exception to the general rule? That was a question involving real property;

152 this, personal only. From their very nature, *such questions about the realty, go back far into the past; and here, the Chief Justice says, "The point that weighs most in this case, on the part of the application for a new trial, is, that it is a question involved in great doubt, great obscurity, and of great value; and the verdict in this case binds the right forever." In our case, a woman upwards of fifty years old, had in the first place, to show her right to freedom. Then the Plaintiff had only to show, that Bennett had bought her of Davis, who had bought her of Moses Parish, whose father had held her as a slave, from her birth; and I have shown, that before the trial of the cause at Law, the Plaintiff was in possession of the clue, which led to the whole claim of title, and might, with ordinary diligence, have produced it. Again; in the case cited, the whole time given to investigate a most intricate and obscure land title, depending upon old customs, old grants, and parol evidence, was seven months; here, there were fourteen months from January to the March twelve months after. The value involved here, can, strictly speaking, be taken to be only the remnant of this old woman's life. We hear, indeed, that she has children; but, this is not assigned by the bill as a ground of new trial. We see from the record, that suits for the freedom of some of those children were depending, when this cause was tried. They are probably all decided before this; but, we know not how. The bill asks for no new trial in those cases. In all the material features of the two cases, therefore, there is so radical a difference, that the one cannot govern the other; and a further reason against granting a new trial for this cause, is, that the bill does not place it on this ground at all, but exclusively on the ground of new evidence.

The Counsel for the Appellant also cited in favor of a new trial, the case of Jackson on the demise of Walcot v. Crosby, 12 Johns. 354. That was a case, in which both parties claimed under a soldier, to whom the patent had issued for the land in contest. The Court considered the new evidence as important: that the party 153 had not been guilty of gross neglect: that this was a peculiar class of cases, not governed by the rules adopted in ordinary cases, and upon the whole, thought it best to grant a new trial. They cite no authority in support of their decision, while they acknowledge that it is a departure from the general course. I have shown (I think) that in this case, there is nothing peculiar, nothing to withdraw it from the general rule; that with ordinary diligence, all the evidence might have been procured before the trial; and that to grant the new trial, would be to encourage negligence, and set a precedent most mischievous in its consequences.

Although I have examined carefully, and taken a note of every material deposition in this case, and could easily give my view as to the weight of evidence on the question of freedom, I shall not do so, because I do not think that question before us. It was exclusively for the Jury. If there was any evidence, of which due diligence would have informed the Plaintiff, he must be taken to have known it. If he was not prepared to bring his case fully before the Jury, he should have moved for a continuance, and showed that the evidence was material, and that he had used due means to obtain it. To have refused him a continuance in such a case, would have been error. But here, there was no motion for a continuance. The parties went freely to trial. The Plaintiff, in his bill, does not complain of fraud or unfairness in the trial. He puts his case simply on the ground of new evidence. If he has shown that he has discovered this evidence since the trial, and that he could not, with due diligence, have discovered it before, he should have a new trial. But, if he has utterly failed, (as I think he has,) he ought not to have a new trial, however strongly the evidence now produced may bear upon the question of freedom.

I am for affirming the Decree.

154 *JUDGE COALTER.

The Writ in the action at Law was issued on the 20th of February, 1821, returnable to the third Monday in March. Neither the Declaration, nor the proceedings in the Office, are copied into the record, nor the affidavits, on which the petition to be permitted to sue, was founded. In August, 1821, the suit was continued at the Defendant's costs, and in November, at the Plaintiff's. The trial took place on the 20th of March, 1822. The body of the deposition of Polly M'Kinney, the principal witness for the Plaintiff, was taken on the 8th of March, 1821, before the return day of the Writ; and a supplement to it, on the 20th of June, 1821, the day on which the issue was made up. The depositions of Humphrey Parish, Booker Parish and Aaron Parish, filed also in this same cause, were taken on the 12th of March, 1821, and are said to be taken in a suit of Milly Chavis against William Bennett. They are said to be taken in pursuance of a commission and notice annexed. So that, probably, she had first sued Bennett, her former master. How this matter is, it is not material to enquire into. Those depositions, either for this reason, or because they were hearsay principally, were not read. These matters are merely stated to show, that the suit was prosecuted with great celerity, and little delay on either side, so as to give but little time to search for distant witnesses.

The first witness proves, that in 1772, on a division of their father's estate, Milly, a mulatto girl, then aged about two years old, fell to Moses Parish their brother, and that he told him in 1773, or 1774, that he had sold her to John Davis of Pittsylvania. The others prove similar declarations by their brother Moses, and that the girl in 1774, was about three or four years old. It is in proof, that the Appellant is an aged and infirm man, entirely incapable of attending to the defence of such a suit. He states in his bill, that he did not know 155 of the existence of the widow of

*Moses Parish, who, it appears, lived in Kentucky at the time of the trial; and that he was also ignorant of the existence of the Bill of Sale made by Moses Parish to Davis, which has since been found amongst the old papers of Davis in Tennessee, he being long since dead. He proves by the deposition of Sally Davis, taken in December, 1823, that in January preceding, Samuel Barger, who appears to be the agent of the Appellant, made enquiries concerning a Bill of Sale, supposed to have been made by Moses Parish to John Davis, sen'r for a negro girl named Milly; and that her husband Jesse Davis, now deceased, told him there was a number of old papers of his father's then in a desk in the house; and on examination, they found the Bill of Sale, of an ancient date, and of a very ancient appearance, and which Barger took away with him: that John Davis, sen'r removed to that place about nineteen years before, and died about two years after his removal. Elizabeth Davis, daughter of Jesse Davis, and Field Davis, a son, prove also the search for, and finding, the Bill of Sale. This Bill of Sale is exhibited. He also proves by the deposition of Molly Parish, the widow of Moses Parish, that her husband sold a bright mulatto girl to John Davis, about four years of age at the time, about forty-nine years ago last April, (her deposition was taken in December, 1823:) that she has heard of her since, understood that Davis has sold her, and that she had had seven children, but never saw her since. The other evidence in the record proves, that Davis immediately sold her to Bennett.

The only evidence of identification of the Plaintiff at Law, said to have been stolen, then six or seven years old, was a scar on her thigh, proved by Mrs. M'Kinney. The Appellant, in his bill, states, that at the time of the trial, he did not know of any witness, who could prove the manner in which the Plaintiff obtained the scar on her thigh. He now proves this by one witness positively, who saw the wound when dressed. Her credit, however, 156 *is assailed. But, several other witnesses saw the Appellant when lame with a wound said to have been received in her thigh by a fall into a potatoe hole.

Suppose it had been competent for the Court of Law to have heard a motion for a new trial on these grounds, after the discovery of this new evidence; ought it to have been granted? If only the poor remnant of this old woman's life, had been in controversy, probably it would not, except as a protection to the Parish; though, if she was really of any value worth contending for, it might be another matter. But, when we consider the effect that this verdict may have on her progeny, whether in the hands of the Appellant or others, there can be no question that the case is one of sufficient value and magnitude to have demanded the attention of the Court. The Appellant's age; the short time between the institution and trial of the suit; the foreign residence of the witnesses; the existence of the Bill of Sale from Parish to Davis, not even known to those in possession of it until searched for; are all facts corroborative of the statement in the bill, that he did not know of their existence at the trial. The failure to state the time and manner in which the Bill of Sale was discovered and came to his knowledge, when both are proved, ought not to deprive the Appellant, it seems to me, of the benefit of his allegation. So, too, as to the discovery of the witness Mrs. Parish. It is no where proved, that her existence was known to any one, from whom he could have gotten the information. He says he made enquiries, but could not learn.

What effect this evidence ought to have on another trial, or how far the witness who proves the wound on the thigh, corroborated by the other evidence, would be credited by the Jury on such trial, it would not be for a Court, in granting a new trial, to say. The evidence, both written and parol, is certainly pertinent to the issue, and might have an important effect on the trial; and I think, if it could be now exhibited to the Court of Law, that Court, 157 considering *the present liberality in granting new trials in such cases, ought to grant it. But, the party is deprived of that remedy by the adjournment of the Court, before the discovery of the new evidence; and by this means, will be deprived of what he would otherwise be entitled to, unless a Court of Equity can relieve.

Under these circumstances, I think it is the province and duty of that Court to interfere, and direct an issue to be made up in the usual way, in order to re-try before the Jury and a Court of Law, the right of the Appellee to her freedom.

The PRESIDENT.

It does not appear that any negligence is imputable to the Appellant; on the contrary, his inability, from age and infirmity to attend to the defence of the suit, which is proved by the testimony in the record, would, in a less difficult case, have been some excuse for his failing to procure his testimony, in time for the trial at Law. Nor, is any fault imputable to the Appellee. Her delay in making her claim to freedom, may be attributed to her condition as a slave. But this, if she is entitled to freedom, is not imputable to the Appellant. She claims her freedom on facts, which, if true, occurred more than forty years ago; the evidence of which was to be met, by testimony to be found in another State, and a remote County; and such is the obscurity of the cases that it is not surprising, that it was not known to the Appellant, within the fifteen months that elapsed, between the Writ and the verdict. It may be hard, that the Appellee should lose the benefit of a verdict in her favor; but, it would be unjust, that the Appellant should lose his property, without having the opportunity to prove that it is his, by the evidence which is now in the record. If it had been discovered after the verdict, and before the end of the Term in which it was found, I 158 think there can be no doubt, that on motion, *the Appellant would have been entitled to a new trial. The obscurity of the case, and the effect of the verdict on the interests of others not parties to it, would, upon the facts in the record, have been a proper ground for a new trial. In the case of Swinnerton v. The Marquis of Stafford, 3 Taunt. 91, though conflicting evidence had been left to the Jury, and the Court did not think the verdict wrong, yet, as the case was involved in great doubt and obscurity, and of great value, a new trial was awarded. In the case before us, the main point turned on the identity of person; as to which, after the lapse of more than forty years, nothing can be more obscure and doubtful. The verdict, also, will materially affect property of great value to the holders of it. In the case of Jackson v. Crosby, 12 Johns. 354, the identity of a soldier or patentee of land, was the turning point in controversy; and though that was a recent case, compared with the one under consideration, as the Defendants, as was said by the Court, were not chargeable with gross negligence, in not having discovered the evidence before the trial, and the identity of the soldier, entitled to the land in question, involved in much doubt and difficulty, and about which there is usually much contrariety of evidence, granted a new trial; remarking, at the same time, that these were peculiar cases, as they certainly are, and not to be governed by the rules adopted in ordinary cases. I do not cite this case as having any authority in this Court; but, as the decision of able Judges on a question quite analogous to the one before us, and in which I entirely concur.

I think that the Decree is erroneous, and ought to be reversed.

Decree reversed.*

159 *Talbert, &c. v. Jenny, &c.

February, 1828.

Chancery Practice—Suit for Freedom—When Allowed after Suit at Law.—Under what circumstances, a pauper, who has brought a suit at Law for his freedom, and failed, may afterwards go into Equity for the same object and obtain relief.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Wythe, where Jenny, and her three children, obtained leave to sue in forma pauperum, for their freedom. The Chancellor decreed in favor of the Plaintiffs, and the Defendants appealed. The whole case is given in the following opinions.

Johnson, for the Appellants.

Leigh, for the Appellees.

February 27. JUDGE CARR.

The facts of this case seem to be, that B. Talbert, when he purchased the woman Jenny, made her a promise that when she should have a child for every one of his, (he then having five) he would set her free. This promise, though no way binding, the old people, (and especially Mrs. Talbert,) seem to have been anxious to comply with. In 1792, B. Talbert made a Deed to his youngest son, Charles, then, and always after, living with him, conveying to him Jenny and her son Moses. This Deed was confessedly voluntary, made, as some of the witnesses say, to cover the property from an apprehended claim, afterwards compromised. No change of possession followed the Deed. It seems, that either at the time of this Deed, or soon after, some division of the other slaves of the father was made among the other children. Things remained in this way, the father still in possession of the property, till 1803; when it was agreed among B. Talbert and his children, that the former division should be done away, and a new division take place. For this purpose, the children were called to their father's house, and all attended but one (Thomas.) Jenny had now six children; and it was agreed, that the five children should have one each; and it was distinctly understood, that the former division was to be done away, and the Deeds (as the witness expresses it) to be forgotten and laid aside; and Jenny and her youngest son were to be set free. That the Appellant

Charles, assented to this arrangement, is fully proved; for, several witnesses state, that while the division was pending, one of the sons-in-law finding Jenny not included in the scheme, asked "what is to be done with big Jenny?" To which the Appellant answered, "Never mind big Jenny. Our mother" (who was then dead) "wished her to be free, and she shall be free." Accordingly, B. Talbert, by Deed, emancipated Jenny, the day after the division; and some time after, he, by Deed, emancipated her son Lorenzo. Both these Deeds were recorded. Jenny had two other children afterwards. From the time of her emancipation in 1803, till 1813, Jenny acted in all respects as a free person, and kept her three youngest children with her. B. Talbert died in 1809. The Appellant never objected to the Deeds of emancipation; nor, that we hear of, ever made any claim to Jenny or her children, during the life of his father; nor after his death, till the year 1813, when he took possession of the three children, leaving Jenny at large. She sued at Law for the freedom of her children, and a verdict was found for the Defendant.

Two objections were taken for the Appellant, on the argument. 1. That Equity has no jurisdiction of the cause. 2. That the Judgment at Law is a bar, so far as it relates to the children.

As to the first. Though not fond of extending Equity jurisdiction, I think this is a case which it may fairly reach; at least, concurrently with a Law Court. See Dempsey v. Lawrence, Gilm. 333.

161 *The more serious question is, can it take cognizance after a trial at Law? And in common cases, I should be clear that it could not, if the trial at Law was fair. But there is something peculiar in this case. I do not mean that this is a claim for freedom. That, we all agree, must stand on precisely the same ground with any question of property. Nor do I mean, that this is the case of a mother, who had herself been a slave, and was suing as next friend for infants who were held in slavery. This circumstance would prepare us to expect, that the cause of the paupers would not probably be presented to the Jury in its best shape; but that would furnish, of itself, no ground for a new trial of the question. The peculiar feature is this: The arrangement by which the five children of Jenny were divided among the children of Talbert, the former conveyance done away, and Jenny and her last child freed, was a family matter entirely. The children called together, and the business settled without writing, the only persons who could give evidence of this settlement, were the children; and they were strongly interested in keeping fair weather with their brother Charles. For, if the Deed of 1792, under which he succeeded, was good to hold the three youngest children of Jenny, it was equally so to hold the four born between 1792, and 1803, and divided among the brothers and sisters of the Appellant. They might well, therefore, be tempted to withhold their evidence, upon a compact expressed or understood, that if Charles might be permitted to recover the three youngest children, he would suffer them to retain their portions; and so sensible does the Appellant seem of this, that he told a witness, he had his brothers and sisters feed; for, if they said any thing against him, he would take away their negroes. And in the last examinations we find, that one of the principal witnesses, Mrs. Elizabeth Scott, said, that as Charles had offended her, she would now let out the whole truth; from which it would seem, that it had not before been let out. These considerations satisfy me, that *the case was not fully before the Jury, nor the evidence such as it now appears; and that this proceeded, not from negligence in the paupers, but from causes beyond their control.

*JUDGES GREEN and CABELL, absent.

The case of Isaac v. Johnson, 5 Munf. 95, is much stronger than this. There, the pauper sued for his freedom at Common Law, had a verdict against him, and moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and Judgment entered. He was then sold. Afterwards, he petitioned, and had leave to institute another suit in the Corporation of Lynchburg; which was removed to the Superior Court of Law. Pending this suit, being advised by Counsel that the former Judgment might be pleaded in bar against him, he filed a bill in the Superior Court of Chancery in Richmond, setting forth sundry grounds of relief, and praying that the former Judgment might be set aside, &c. The Injunction was granted, and afterwards, on hearing of the bill, answer and exhibits, dismissed, with costs; and a non-suit was suffered in the action at Law, and afterwards another suit in Chancery brought by Isaac in the County Court of Campbell. In this suit a final Decree was pronounced by the County Court in Isaac's favor; which, on appeal, was reversed by the Court of Chancery, and the bill dismissed; and on appeal to this Court, the Chancellor's Decree was reversed, and that of the County Court affirmed. This was going vastly beyond what is asked in this case, and further, I confess, that I could have gone. I do not think, then, that under these peculiar circumstances, the Judgment at Law is a bar; and that being removed, there is no difficulty; for, on the merits, the paupers are clearly entitled to their freedom. The first gift, and the Deed, (as the Chancellor says,) were clearly, by the mutual consent of the parties, destroyed by the second division, which might well be done, without Deed; this being personal property, and possession following the new arrangement. That the Appellant assented to this new division, was proved both by positive 163 *evidence, and by his long acquiescence in the freedom of Jenny and her children for ten years. The Decree should be affirmed.

JUDGE GREEN.

The Appellant claims under a voluntary Deed, by which his father conveyed to him Jenny and one of her children in 1792. The slaves remained in the possession of the father until 1803, when Jenny had, in all, six children, one of whom was very young; and Basil Talbert had five children.

It appears, that when Basil Talbert purchased Jenny, he promised her that whenever she had a child for each of his children, she should be emancipated, and Mrs. Talbert was anxious that this promise should be redeemed. After the death of Mrs. Talbert, it was agreed, that the Appellant and Mrs. Scott, (one of the children of B. Talbert, to whom a conveyance had been made in 1792, of one of Jenny's children) should give up their claims under those Deeds; and that the five oldest children of Jenny should be assigned, one to each of B. Talbert's children; and that Jenny should be set free, with her last child, which was accordingly done; and from this time (1803) until 1809, when B. Talbert died, and until 1813, Jenny lived as a free woman in all respects, and had two other children. In 1813, the Appellant seized the three last children of Jenny as slaves; and they being infants, Jenny sued for their freedom, but not for her own, the Appellant not having seized her. Upon a trial, the Jury found a verdict for the Defendant, and Judgment was accordingly given against the Plaintiffs. This Judgment is relied on as a bar to the Plaintiffs' claim in this suit, or at least, as to the children of Jenny, and is, I think, the only impediment to their right to freedom.

The transaction, at the last division of the negroes, was, in effect, a restoration of the legal title to Jenny and her children, to B. Talbert. Such a title may pass, 164 without *Deed, when the possession accompanies the transfer of the title, as it did in this case; B. Talbert never having parted with the possession. The Plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to recover at Law; and in an ordinary case, a Plaintiff so entitled could have no remedy in Equity, after a Judgment against him at Law. But, I do not think this Judgment ought to bar the remedy of these parties in Equity, considering their situation, infants held in slavery; and that the evidence which they now exhibit, was not then in their power; some of the witnesses, as they say, having determined to let out the truth, only since the trial at Law.

All the children of B. Talbert had a motive for not voluntarily communicating the true character of the transaction at the last division; for they apprehended that the Appellant might, as he threatened he would, claim against them the negroes, which they held under that division, by force of the original Deed to him, as he claimed Jenny and her children, if they let out the truth.

I am for affirming the Decree.

The PRESIDENT.

The Deed of gift from Basil Talbert to Charles Talbert, having been regularly recorded, and being of prior date to the two Deeds of emancipation, under which the Appellees claim their freedom, that Deed was an obstacle in the way of their title at Law, which could only be removed, upon the evidence in the record, by a Court of Equity. By that evidence. I think it sufficiently appears, that the Deed of gift was not intended to be effectual between the parties to it; but, to cover the property contained in it, from the consequences of a suit then pending against the donor, and for his benefit only. If this was at all doubtful on the direct evidence to this point in the record, it is rendered manifest by the subsequent conduct of the parties. The full exercise of ownership of the property by the donor, in continuing to hold the possession of it, *and in two instances making a division of it among his children, with the assent of the donee, though ineffectual, prove his entire and exclusive right to it. The Chancellor, I think, was therefore correct in decreeing the Deed of gift to be cancelled, and in liberating the Appellees.

Decree affirmed.*

Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society v. Digges, &c.

Pleading and Practice—Pleading without Bail—Joinder of Issue—Effect.—Where a Defendant is permitted to appear and plead without giving special bail, and the Plaintiff joins issue, without making any objection, such objections are waived by the Plaintiff, and the appearance bail is discharged.

Corporations—Suit by—Corporate Name.—A bond executed to the "President and Managers of the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society," may be sued upon by the "Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society," that being the legal style of the Corporation.

Same—Same—Same.—Corporations must sue in their true names; but contracts may be made by or with them, by a mistaken name if the mistake be only in syllabis et verbis, and not in sensu et reipsa.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Fauquier County.

The Culpeper Agricultural & Manufacturing Society brought an action of debt against William H. Digges and Whiting Digges, who were the obligors in a note under seal, executed to the "President and Managers of the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society." The Declaration avers that the said note was executed to the Plaintiffs, by the name and style of "The President and Managers of," &c.

The Writ was executed and appearance bail given. The Defendants appeared, 166 without having given special *bail, and pleaded, that the Plaintiffs were an unchartered Bank, and therefore an illegal company; to which plea the plaintiffs replied generally, and issue was joined. The Defendants afterwards demurred, and the Plaintiffs joined in demurrer.

On the demurrer, the Court gave judgment for the Defendants, and the Plaintiffs appealed.

Harrison, for the Appellants, objected, first, to the Defendants' being permitted to appear and plead, without having given special bail. Secondly, that the error in the style of the Corporation in the bond, is not such an one as to debar the Plaintiffs from suing in their proper corporate name. For this, he cited 10 Co. Rep. 125; 11 Co. Rep. 19, 20, 21; 2 Bac. Abr. 5, tit. "Corporation;" College of Physicians v. Dr. Salmon, Ld. Raym. 680; Sidney College v. —, 1 Wils. 184; Dutch East India Company v. Henriquez, Ld. Raym. 612; Mayor, &c. v. Blamire, 8 East, 492.

Leigh, for the Appellees, contended, that the variance here was material. 2 Com. Dig. 298, tit. "Capacity," B. 5. The addition of a name is material. Croydon Hospital v. Farley, 6 Taunt. Rep. 467. As to the Defendants' being allowed to plead without bail, the objection was waived by the plea and issue, and the bail, both common and special, were discharged. If the Plaintiff objected to this proceeding, he ought to have objected at the time; and if his objection was overruled, he ought to have excepted.

March 4. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.

The objection now taken by the Appellants, that the Appellees were improperly permitted to appear, plead and demur, without giving special bail, was waived by the Appellants' taking issue on the plea, and joining in the demurrer, 167 *without making this objection in terms; and the appearance bail was thereby discharged, as was decided in Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. 437. The appearance of the Defendants, and pleading without giving special bail, superceded the issue joined upon the plea put in by the bail for their appearance, and rendered it null. In strictness, perhaps, it ought to have been set aside; but, the omission to do so, is no error to the injury of the Appellants.

The Declaration alleges, that the Plaintiffs were incorporated by the name of "The Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society;" and avers that the Defendants executed their obligation to them, by the name of "The President and Managers of the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society;" and upon a demurrer to this Declaration, the question is, whether such an averment can be made, against the terms of the obligation as described in the Declaration? If it can, then, instead of demurring, the Defendants should have pleaded, that certain persons by name, were: "The President and Managers of the Society," and that the bond was made and delivered to those persons individually, and traversed this averment in the Declaration. For, by demurring, they admit the averment to be true, if it is competent to the Plaintiffs to make it. This averment might, I think, be well made. Although a Corporation cannot sue but in its true name, contracts may be made by and with it, by a mistaken name, if the mistake be only in syllabis et verbis, and not in sensu et reipsa, as is said by the Court in the case of The Mayor and Burgesses of Lynn Regis, 10 Co. 125; and such a mistake may be averred in pleading, or shown in evidence, upon the general issue. Ibid. and Gilb. Hist. C. B. 179, Cap. 17, cited 6 Vin.

Digges (1828), 6 Rand. 165. Yet if some words are added to or omitted in the true name of a corporation, this is not a fatal variance. Abr. 320. If some words are added to or omitted in, the true name of a Corporation, this is not a fatal variance, if there be enough to distinguish the Corporation from all others and to show, that the Corporation claiming, or against which a claim is asserted, was intended; of which many examples are given in the case cited from Coke's Reports.

168 "If, in this case, the bond had been given to 'A. B., President, and C. D., Managers of the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Bank Society,' or to the 'President and Managers of the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Bank,' I should have thought that it could not have been averred or shown by proofs, that it was in truth given to the 'Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society;' for, this would be an opposition to the legal import of the Deed itself. In the first case, the legal effect of the Deed would be, to create an obligation to the individuals named, and the addition of 'President and Managers' would be only a superfluous description of the particular individuals meant, or at most an indication that the obligation was made to them, for the benefit of the Corporation; and in the other, the name of the Corporation in the bond, would be different in sense, from the true name of the Corporation claiming it as made to them. But in this case, the naming of the 'President and Managers, without using their proper names, does not, in any degree, contradict the averment that the bond was made to the Corporation; but, is entirely consistent with it, since it clearly indicates that the bond was given to them and the other Corporators, not in their individual, but in their corporate characters.

I think the Judgment should be reversed, the demurrer overruled, and the cause remanded for a trial of the issue in fact joined between the parties.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment reversed, &c.

*Bond—Suit on—Partial Failure of Consideration.—In Fisher v. Burdett, 21 W. Va. 629. it is said: "Before the adoption of said act of 1881, the courts of Virginia held, that the defendant could not vacate a bond at law because he was imposed upon in a settlement of accounts which preceded its execution, or because the bond was founded on a false or fraudulent statement of facts. Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 368, or because the bond had been obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations made by the plaintiff. Wyche v. Macklin, 2 Rand. 426, or when the action was on a contract either by deed or by parol the defendant could not at law show, that the consideration had failed in part. *Tomlinson v. erty was of less value than it was represented to be, such defence, sounding altogether in damages, is bad; and the proper remedy would be an action of deceit.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Greensville County, where an action of debt was brought by the administrator of Tomlinson against Rives and Mason, on a bond executed by the Defendants to the Plaintiff, administrator as aforesaid. The Defendants pleaded several pleas, which, with the subsequent proceedings, are fully set forth in the following opinion. A conditional verdict was rendered, and Judgment given for the Defendants. The Plaintiff appealed.

Attorney General, for the Appellant, contended, that the verdict was insufficient, and destitute of the necessary precision. It submits to the Court a mere abstract principle of Law. It is not universally true, that the representations of an agent, without authority, are binding upon his principal. Fenn v. Harrison, 3 Term Rep. 757; 1 Camp. Rep. 258. A crier has less authority than an auctioneer. He is employed by the auctioneer, as a ministerial agent.

Johnson, for the Appellee, said that the bond was no bar to the evidence offered by the pleas; because, the issue being joined, the estoppel is waived. For this, he cited Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358; Chew v. Moffatt, 6 Munf. 120; Wyche v. Macklin, 2 Rand. 426. As to the finding being on an abstract point, it must be taken in connection with the pleas, which, taken together, explain the question propounded by the Jury. The case of *M'Michen v. 170 Amos, 4 Rand. 132, justifies a verdict of this sort. That principals are liable for their representations of their servants, made in execution of the duty assigned to them, is proved by Paley on Agency, 228, 229; Grammar v. Nixon, 1 Str. 653; Crockford v. Winter, 1 Camp. Rep. 124; Herne v. Nichols, 1 Salk. 289; 1 Com. Dig. 317, 312, (new edit.) Ib. 318; Earl Ardglasse v. Muschamp, 1 Vern. 239; Whitehead v. Tuckett, 15 East, 400.

March 3. JUDGE COALTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an action of debt on a bond taken by the Appellant on the sale of his intestate's estate. There are several pleas; 1. That of payment. 2. That the bond was obtained by fraud, covin and misrepresentation, in this, that it was given for the price of a slave (Judith) exposed to public sale: that she was, at the time of the sale unsound and of no value; and that the plaintiff, at the time of the sale, knew that she was unsound and of no value, but by imposed on him by the contract, or that the consideration failed, or that fraud and deceit had been practiced by the plaintiff in making the contract sued upon, on which his suit was based: in other words that he could not set up the defense of recoupment by plea. Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358; Wyche v. Macklin, 2 Rand. 426; Tomlinson's Adm'r v. Mason, 6 Rand. 169.

Pleading and Practice—Plea Raises No Defense—Effect of Statute of Jeofails.—The Virginia authorities hold that where a plea is so defective, as not to raise a substantial defense to the action, the plea is bad even under the statute of jeofails, and a repleader ought to be awarded by appellate court, though no objection was raised to the plea in the court below, and issue had been joined thereon. State v. Seabright, 15 W. Va. 506, citing the principal case as authority.

deceit, &c. fraudulently concealed the same. 3. That the bond was obtained by fraud, covin, and misrepresentation. 4. That it was obtained by fraud, covin, and misrepresentation, by the Plaintiff, and others in collusion with him, falsely and fraudulently representing to the Defendant, that the slave, for whose purchase the bond was executed, was then and there pregnant and healthy, in confidence of which false representation, the writing was given. This plea does not state, that she was not pregnant, and that she was not healthy, further than may be inferred from the allegation, that she was falsely represented to be so; nor does it aver a sale of the slave, either public or private, except so far as may be inferred from the allegation, that the bond was for her purchase; nor does it say, that the representation was made in the sale, but seems rather to confine it to the time of giving the bond.

171 *On issues made up on these pleas, the Jury find for the Defendant, subject, however, to the opinion of the Court on the following question: "whether the representations of a crier at a public sale, in relation to the property, under the hammer, are to be considered, in Law, as the representations of the principal, no authority being given by the principal to the crier to make such representation?"

The first two pleas go to the entire action. The first avers payment of the whole debt. The second avers a fraudulent concealment of unsoundness, which rendered the slave of no value. The third does not state whether the fraud and misrepresentation affected the consideration of the bond, or the manner of its execution; and therefore, presents no point on which an issue could be taken, or judgments rendered. The fourth is the one on which the verdict of the Jury shows that the cause turned. Independent of the above remarks as to this plea, it is not a plea to the whole action. It does not aver that the slave was of no value. She might have been sound, though not pregnant; or she may have been neither and still of considerable value. There is no averment that the Defendant offered to rescind the contract and return her, if that would have altered the case. The facts stated in the plea, giving them their utmost latitude could only entitle the Defendant to compensation for the difference in the value of the slave, if pregnant and sound, and her real value. This, sounding altogether in damages, was the proper subject of an action of deceit, and could not be adjusted on the issues joined in this cause. It was not enough to avoid the bond in toto, so as to produce the great injustice of leaving the Defendant in possession of the Plaintiff's property, without paying for it what it was really worth. In the case of Chew, ex'or of Wormeley v. Moffatt, 6 Munf. 120, the plea of fraud went to the whole consideration, and was an answer to the whole action.

This case presents a striking instance of the effects of the extremely loose practice, to say no more of it, which prevails tions for the decision of this Court. A general demurrer to the three last pleas would have been decisive of the case. The Statute of Jeofails cannot aid the party in such a case as this. Admitting all he says to be true, the Court cannot give Judgment according to the right of the case. He can have no right to hold the slave, though unsound, without paying her real value. Had the verdict of the Jury been for the Plaintiff, if the Law on the point reserved should be for him, otherwise for the Defendant, this would have shown that there was nothing in the case except what grew out of the fourth plea; and in that case, the Court might have rendered Judgment for the Plaintiff, non obstante veredicto.

Independently, therefore, of the objection, that the verdict presents an abstract question, and the strong views which might be taken on that and various other grounds taken in the argument against the Judgment of the Court below, those taken above preclude the necessity of going into them.

The Judgment of the Superior Court must be reversed, and the third and fourth pleas, and the issues thereon, set aside as immaterial, and a venire de novo awarded, to try the issues on the first and second pleas.

*Sawney v. Carter.

March, 1828.

Equity Jurisdiction—Enforcement of Promise of Emancipation.—A Court of Equity cannot enforce a promise by a master that he will emancipate his slave, after a certain condition is performed which condition has been complied with. The jurisdiction of Equity only extends to cases where the pauper has a legal right to freedom, but there is some impediment to the assertion of that right in a Court of Law.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg, where Sawney, a coloured man, filed his bill against Robert C. Carter, to recover his freedom. The facts of the case are sufficiently set forth in the following opinion.

Harrison, for the Appellant.

Stanard and Briggs, for the Appellee.

March 8. JUDGE COALTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The pauper, in this case, claims his freedom on an alleged contract between his master and him, at the time he was purchased at an executor's sale, that on paying his purchase money, he should be free. He alleges that he has paid accordingly; but, that his master would not emancipate him. The proof of the contract is by no means clear; although, if that was proved, and such a contract could be enforced in Equity, there is perhaps proof enough in the record, of his master having received some property, to wit, a waggon and three horses, which the pauper claimed as his own, and the proceeds of his earnings by waggoning, to send the case to an account.

Equity Jurisdiction—Enforcement of Contract for Future Emancipation.—A contract between a master and his slave for the future emancipation of the slave is utterly void and cannot be enforced against the master, although the slave may have fully complied with his part of the agreement. To this effect, the principal case is cited with approval in Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 73; Bailey v. Poindexter, 14 Gratt. 198; Williamson v. Coalter, 14 Gratt. 207; Shue v. Turk, 15 Gratt. 265, 275.

There is no case in this Court, that I can find, justifying the idea that a Court of Equity can enforce such a contract; but, the reverse has been decided, as will be seen hereafter. There is no doubt that a Court of Equity may entertain a bill, where the party has been detained in 174 "slavery and has a legal title to his freedom, but there is some impediment to the assertion of that right at Law which would, in any other case, justify the interposition of a Court of Equity; as, if the Will, by which he was emancipated, was fraudulently suppressed, or destroyed; or a Deed, prior to that of emancipation, and which had been abandoned, was fraudulently set up as a bar to the recovery at Law; as was lately decided in the case of Talbert v. Jenny, ante, 159.

In the case of Dempsey v. Lawrence, Gilm. 333, the pauper was not so before the Court, as that the merits could be decided, either by the Court below, or by this Court. The bill was dismissed; and this Court only sent the case back, to be placed in a situation in which it could be tried on the merits. How this Court would have decided, could the merits have been gone into, cannot therefore be known; and consequently, that case can give no rule in this.

The case of John Rose, a pauper, v. Haxall, adm'r of Duncan Rose, junr. was decided in this Court against the pauper. That was a very strong case for the pauper, as I find by my note of it, though I was not present when it was decided. According to these notes, it appears, that this man belonged to the estate of the late Col. Bainster, near Petersburg: that he was the son of Duncan Rose the elder, who, on his death bed, recommended him to the care of his nephew, the intestate of the Appellee. On the sale of Banister's estate, he was purchased by Dr. Wilson for 90l. who sold him to the intestate for the same sum. The intestate then put him apprentice to a carpenter. After his apprenticeship, he worked as a journeyman, and, down to the death of the intestate, worked for himself, and was treated as a free man by his employer, who paid him his earnings. The intestate frequently admitted that he was free, and said that he had paid him his purchase money, and more; and never interfered with him as a slave. His administrator always considered him as free; but finding that he had not been emancipated by Deeds, and not know-

175 ing *but that he would be necessary to pay debts, considered it his duty to take him as a slave. He says he is not hostile to his claim to freedom; but suggests, for the consideration of the Court, whether a contract for freedom can be set up in a Court of Equity, and whether any other mode of emancipation than that prescribed by Law can be sustained.

By the Act of May, 1723, 4 Stat. at Large, 132, it is enacted, that no negro, mulatto, or Indian slave, shall be set free on any pretence whatever, except for some meritorious service to be adjudged and allowed by the Governor and Council, and license therefor first had and obtained; and if they shall be otherwise set free, it shall be lawful for the Church-wardens, and they are required, to take them up and sell them as slaves, &c. This is re-enacted by the Act of October, 1748, 6 Stat. at Lar. 112.

By the Act of May, 1782, 11 Stat. at Large, 39, reciting, that application had been made to empower persons disposed to emancipate their slaves, to do so, it is enacted, that it shall hereafter be lawful for any person, by his last Will and Testament, or by any other instrument in writing under his or her hand and seal, attested and proved in the County Court by two witnesses, &c. to emancipate his slaves or any of them, &c. This act is brought into the revision of 1794, ch. 103, sec. 36, by the 26th section of which, 1 Rev. Code, 433, it is made unlawful to permit slaves to go at large, and hire themselves out, under penalty of being apprehended and sold; and is also brought into that of 1819, sec. 53, p. 433.

It has also been decided by this Court, that a Deed of emancipation, not recorded in the proper Court, but in some other, gives no title to freedom, until properly recorded. Givens v. Mann, 6 Munf. 191; Lewis v. Fullerton, 1 Rand. 15.

On the whole, the Decree must be affirmed.

176 *Kelly, &c. v. Kelly's Executors.

March, 1828.

Parent and Child.—Conveyance to Child.—Presumption.—Where a father, being indebted to his children, afterwards conveys property to them, which is more than equal to the amount of the debt, this conveyance shall be presumed to be in satisfaction of the debt, if there are no circumstances to prove a contrary intention.

Same.—Same.—Same.—Although the property conveyed, and the debt are not ejusdem generis, the one may be a satisfaction of the other, if the intention of the testator be apparent, that such should be the effect.

This was an appeal from the Fredericksburg Chancery Court, where James W. Kelly and others, filed their bill against William Stone and George Kemper, executors of John Kelly, deceased. The whole subject of controversy is fully explained in the following opinion.

Briggs and Leigh, for the Appellants.

Harrison and Stanard, for the Appellees.

March 8. JUDGE CARR, delivered his opinion.

John Kelly married a lady of the name of Paine, and received by her (it is said) twelve slaves. She died, leaving five children. In 1797, John Kelly, being about to marry a second wife, executed a Deed of gift conveying to his children, in different proportions, all the slaves he had received by their mother, which were to be delivered to them "at lawful age, or marriage." This Deed was duly recorded; and the slaves were, at different periods, delivered to the children. The second marriage took effect, and eight children were the fruit of it. In 1809, one Yates, by Will, bequeathed to the children of Kelly by his first wife $1000, to be equally divided among them. In 1810, Kelly was appointed guardian of his children as to this legacy, and not long after received the money. On the 31st of March, 1814, J. Kelly and his wife executed five Deeds, conveying to each of his 177 children by his first wife, one hundred acres of land, which it is agreed on all hands were worth more than their shares of the legacy. All these children were then of age, except one. The consideration expressed in the Deeds, is natural love and affection, and one dollar. The Deeds were accepted, recorded, and the children took possession of the land. In 1815, J. Kelly made his Will, in which he gives again to the children by his first wife, the slaves and land before conveyed. He gives the rest of his land and slaves to his wife, for life; and at her death, the land to be divided among his children by the last wife, and slaves, among all his children by both wives. In 1820, J. Kelly died; and in 1822, the children by the first wife filed their bill against their father's executors, to recover their legacy of $1000, left them by Yates. The Chancellor dismissed their bill, and they appealed to this Court.

The only question in the cause, is, whether this legacy must not be taken as satisfied by the land conveyed to the Plaintiffs in 1814? This, it will be observed, is not a question whether a debt is extinguished by legacy; nor, whether a provision secured to children by settlement, is satisfied by portions given them by the Will of a parent; nor yet, whether a legacy be deemed by an advancement made in the life of the testator; but simply, whether a parent, owing to his children a debt, and making them a Deed for property of greater value than the debt, shall be considered as having given them this property (leaving the debt still unpaid,) or as having discharged the debt by the conveyance of the property.

We will consider this question, first, on the presumption arising from the acts of the parties; secondly, on the evidence.

On the first head, I will cite some cases, which seem to me very strongly in point.

Wood v. Bryant, 2 Atk. 521: The Plaintiff's wife was entitled to the residue of her grandmother's estate under her Will, and likewise was left executrix, and 178 durante *minore etate her father was administrator. At the time of her marriage with the Plaintiff, he was, by agreement, to have 800l. from the father; which, in the settlement, is mentioned to be a portion, and in consideration of natural love and affection. The father being dead, this bill was filed against his representative, for a settlement of the grandmother's estate; and it was insisted, that the 800l. paid by her father on her marriage, was not in satisfaction of this residue, especially as it was expressed to be given for natural love and affection, and as the father, at the time of the marriage, was worth 8,000l. and had but this daughter and a son; and Chidley v. Lee, Prec. in Ch. 228, was cited, where a portion given in this way had been decided to be no satisfaction. There was evidence given of parol declarations made by the Plaintiff and his wife shortly after the marriage, that the 800l. were intended as a satisfaction of the residue, as well as a portion; and on the other side, declarations of the father, that the residue amounted to 500l. and that he intended to give the Plaintiff 1000l. more; and that six weeks before his death, he told the Plaintiff, "Thou knowest I owe thee a great deal of money, and thou shalt not be wronged of a farthing." Lord Hardwicke says, "The first question is, whether there is a presumptive satisfaction of the legacy to the Plaintiff's wife, under the grandmother's Will, by the 800l. being advanced to her by the father on her marriage. I do not think any rule can be laid down, but the cases must depend upon their particular circumstances. There are very few cases where a father will not be presumed to have paid the debt he owed to a daughter, when, in his life-time, he gives her in marriage a greater sum than he owed her; for, it is very unnatural to suppose, that he would choose to leave himself a debtor to her, and subject to an account. As to the case of Chidley v. Lee, the ground Sir John Trevor went upon was, that the husband knew nothing of the legacy to the wife from a collateral ancestor, and therefore held it was not 179 satisfied by *the portion. But, I must own, that I think that an extreme hard case; and I believe I should have been inclined to have decided it otherwise. If the present case, therefore, rested on the presumption only, I should be of opinion that the 800l. was a satisfaction of the residue, under the grandmother's Will." The parol evidence he considered as making the case still stronger for the defendant, and refused the account (as to the residue) prayed for.

Seed v. Bradford, 1 Ves. sen. 501: B. was indebted to his daughter 104l. being one-fifth of a legacy left her and her four sisters, by their grandfather. Upon the marriage of the Plaintiff with the daughter, B. agreed to give his daughter 400l. On the wedding day, B. brought forward the money, and one witness stated that he said, "There is the money I give my daughter, but that is not all." The marriage took place in 1740. The wife died in 1742; the father in 1746. No demand was made of the legacy during the father's life. The husband, as administrator of his wife, filed this bill to recover the legacy. The case of Wood v. Bryant, (quoted above,) was relied on for the Defendant. Sir John Strange dismissed the bill. He said, the demand should have been made in the life of the father, who was a party to the transaction, and could have given some account of it: that there was no occasion for an express stipulation, that the 400l. were paid in full satisfaction of the legacy, and not out of his own pocket; but, every case must be taken with the circumstances upon which the Court goes, to see whether, from the nature of the transaction and demand, it is not implied that the money thus given in the lump, included what the father gave by bounty, and also, what came to his hands, as belonging to his child. That is the natural transaction; and otherwise, the Court must suppose he meant to give the 400l. out of his own pocket, and suffer himself still to remain liable to that demand and interest.

The only other case I shall cite, is Chave v. Farrant, 18 Ves. 8: B. gave by Will to his grand daughters, Mary, 180 *Sarah and Betty Farrant, 150l.

each. These legacies came to the hands of their father. His daughters all married during his life, and he gave to, or in trust for, each, a marriage portion of 1,000l. No demand of the legacies was made in his life time; but, the three daughters and their husbands filed the bill for their legacies of 150l. with interest. Sir William Grant says, "Upon looking into the settlements, I find nothing from which any inference can be drawn as to the intention of the parties. In Mrs. Chavis's, her father covenants to pay 1,000l. for the portions of his daughters. It does not appear, that the husbands knew of the debts. My opinion is, that the father giving the portion, must be taken as meaning to satisfy the debt he owed as executor of the grandfather. That is established, in opposition to Chidley v. Lee, by the more recent cases of Wood v. Bryant, and Seed v. Bradford;" (the two before cited.) He then repeats the words of Lord Hardwicke, in Wood v. Bryant.

These cases, it will be observed, clearly establish this point; that in the absence of all explanatory evidence, a father advancing his child, to whom he is at the same time in debt, shall be presumed to do so, with a view to the discharge of the debt, if the sum advanced be sufficient; and that, even though it is a portion given in marriage. The case before us is much stronger than those cited, to raise the presumption of payment; for, the advancement here, was not made on the marriage of the children, nor when there was any other reason for it, than the wish of the father to discharge his debt. It was made by five Deeds, bearing the same date, conveying to each child the same quantity of land, one of them being still an infant, and giving them, exclusive of this, an equal, and some witnesses say, a better portion of his estate, than his younger children.

If it be objected that the legacy was a money debt, and the property conveyed, land, and that therefore, upon the doctrine of ejusdem generis, the latter cannot 181 be considered "as a satisfaction of the former; I answer that this conclusion is by no means sound. A careful examination of the cases on his subject will show, that all depends upon intention. This intention you must ascertain in the best manner you can, from all the circumstances attending the act. When a child is entitled to a portion of 500l., or the father has left him 500l. by Will, and afterwards, in his life, advances him 500l.; this sum being the same in amount and the same in kind, these are taken as circumstances tending to show, that the advancement was made in satisfaction of the portion or legacy. On the contrary, if the advancement was land, it is taken as prima facie going to show, that it was not intended as a satisfaction of the 500l., they being different things. But yet, these are mere presumptions, liable to be rebutted and overthrown. For, if it be made to appear, that the father did not intend the 500l. advanced, to go in satisfaction of the portion or legacy, it will be no satisfaction, though ejusdem generis; and if we be convinced, that he did mean the land as a satisfaction, it will be so taken, though not ejusdem generis. For the cases showing this to be the Law, I refer to Jones v. Mason, ex'r &c., 5 Rand. 577. Now, I have stated the strong facts in this case, which show so clearly the intention of the father to discharge his debt by the conveyance of the land.

But if, leaving the ground of presumption, we come to the evidence, the case is put beyond doubt; for, it is proved, that the father, in the first place, offered to sell to his children, this same land at $8 per acre; thus clearly proving, that he did not intend to give it. They refused to give that price, but said, that they would take the land for their legacies, and on no other terms; and soon after the Deeds were executed and sent to them, and they received them upon the understanding, as every one must see, and as two or three of the Plaintiffs declared, that they were made to discharge the debts. But, they were a payment and a bounty too; for, they overpaid the legacies double and 182 *treble. In addition to this, the Deeds were made in 1814, and the father lived till 1820, and during all that time we hear not a word from the Plaintiffs about the legacy; no demand. Why? Because they were conscious that they were paid.

I am clear, therefore, on every ground, to affirm the Decree.

The other Judges concurred, and the Decree was affirmed.

A verdict which finds an erroneous sum, "that being the debt in the Declaration mentioned," is substantially good, the sum being surplusage, and the conclusion of the verdict being, of itself, sufficient to show the real sum demanded.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Stafford County.

The administrators of William Drummond, deceased, brought an action of debt against the administrator of Alexander Roane, deceased, on a Judgment which had been obtained against Roane and Alcock for the sum of 50l. 19s. 10d., and one penny damages; which Judgment 183 was to be discharged by the payment of 25l. 7s. 4¼, and the damages and costs, to wit, $8 1 cent. The Declaration alleges, that this Judgment still remains in full force and effect, and in no wise satisfied, recovered and annulled. It further states, that the Judgment, with the damages and costs, are of the value of 60l.; whereby an action hath accrued to the Plaintiff "to demand and have of the Defendant," the sum of money last mentioned, the amount of the Judgment aforesaid.

The Defendant pleaded payment and no such record, payment by Roane, and payment by Alcock; to which pleas, the Plaintiffs replied generally, and issues were joined.

At a subsequent Term, the Defendant asked leave to demur generally to the Declaration; which the Court refused to grant.

The Defendant then filed a plea of the Act of Limitations, to which the Plaintiffs replied, that a Writ had been issued within one year and a day, &c.

The Defendant filed another plea, that Alcock survived Roane; to which plea, the Plaintiffs demurred generally.

The Court sustained the demurrer, and overruled the plea. They also decided the plea of no such record in favor of the Plaintiffs.

On the trial of the issues, the jury found for the Plaintiffs the sum of 50l., "that being the debt in the Declaration mentioned," and $60 in damages. The Court gave Judgment accordingly, and the Defendant appealed.

March 14. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.*

This was an action of debt upon a joint Judgment, obtained by Drummond, in his life-time, against one Alcock and 184 *Alexander Roane, upon their obligation. Among other errors alleged in the record, the most material one relied on was, that the demurrer to the plea by Roane's administrator, that Alcock survived his intestate, was sustained by the Court. Whether this decision was correct or not, involves the question, whether joint Judgments are within the provision of the Act concerning partitions and joint rights and obligations, 1 Revised Code, 359; and this depends on a sound construction of the provisions of that Act.

At the common Law, joint obligations and joint Judgments could only be enforced against the surviving obligors or Defendants. The death of any of such obligors, or Defendants, absolved their personal representatives from all responsibility. In the case of a joint Judgment, though it bound the lands of the deceased Defendant, it did not bind the personality, or affect his personal representative. A Scire Facias only lay against the survivor and the heir of the deceased Defendant as terretenant, and the other terretenants, if there were such, to charge the lands of the survivor, and those which descended to the heirs of the deceased Defendant. But, in the case of a joint and several recognizance, a Scire Facias lay against the survivor and the heir of the deceased Defendant, in respect to the lien of the Judgment on the land; or, it lay severally against the survivor and the personal representative of the deceased Defendant, with or without the heir; such a recognizance having the effect of a joint and several Judgment, the Judgment on the Scire Facias not being a new Judgment, but that the Plaintiff should have execution of the original Judgment, according to its terms; 20 Vin. Abr. 149; the Common Law, in this respect, accommodating itself to the nature of the obligation of the parties. See also, 10 Vin. Abr. title "Executors," N. p. 4, note p. 8, 27.

Applying these principles to the construction of the 3d section of the Act concerning partitions, joint rights and 185 *obligations, it seems to me that joint Judgments, if not within its letter, are clearly within its spirit. The reason of the Legislature for abrogating so much of the Common Law, as changed the condition and responsibility of the parties, on the death of either, was, to make obligations and responsibilities more certain, and to leave nothing to a contingency which made no part of such obligation or responsibility; and it applies with as much force to a joint Judgment, as to any other joint obligation or responsibility. The words of the 3d section are, "The representative of one jointly bound with another, for the payment of a debt, or for the performance or forbearance of any act or thing, or for any other thing, and dying in the life-time of the latter, may be charged, by virtue of such obligation, in the same manner as such representative might have been charged, if the obligors had been bound severally as well as jointly." If Roane, in the case before us, had died before the suit on his and Alcock's obligation, though joint and not several, the case would have been within the literal provision of the section. His personal representative would have been responsible, as if he were severally bound, in the obligation; and there can be no good reason why the Judgment should vary his responsibility under the Act. But, it is not necessary to lay any stress on this, except for the purpose of showing, that upon a literal construction of the Act, if a joint Judgment is to be excluded in some cases, as in the one before us, the Judgment would defeat the plain intention of the Law. But, it is impossible, I think, that any words more comprehensive in their meaning could have been used; "bound jointly with another for the payment of a debt, or for performance," &c. These words describe accurately the condition and responsibility of parties, bound by a joint Judgment, for the payment of a debt; nor are the words "obligation" and "obligors" in the section, so exclusive as to forbid a construction of it, which would include joint Judgments. It is true, these imply contract; but, even Judgments are sometimes confessed 186 *by contract. Though they have their force by Law, parties are in no less degree jointly bound by them, than by written contracts or obligations. The change of responsibility by the death of one of them, is as much within the mischief to be obviated by the Act, as in the case of one of two or more joint obligors by contract. Upon a sound construction of a Statute, persons and things, not embraced in its terms, are often included, as being within its principle, though not within its specifications. The general rule of construction, applicable to his subject, is laid down in Co. Litt. 24, 26. It is said, that Equity is a construction made by the Judges, that cases out of the letter of a Statute, yet being within the same mischief or cause of making the same, shall be within the same remedy. As, when a Statute mentions executors, it shall extend to administrators. 19 Vin. Abr. 55. The case of a joint Judgment is, in like degree, within the same mischief as joint obligations, which are literally provided for by the Act, and is, by Equity, within the same remedy. The demurrer to the plea was, therefore, properly sustained by the Court.
